Reid also indicated that he wants to rein in independent campaign expenditure groups, known as 527s, even though many of them have helped Democrats even out the edge in hard-dollar fundraising that Republicans have typically enjoyed.

"We're going to have to take a real close look at 527s," said Reid, acknowledging that some in his party may not like it.

As they assess the rest of their agenda — much of which they already have talked about in broad terms — Democratic Senators and aides said choices still have to be made about what specific legislation should be included under the rubric of their election-year themes of energy independence, modifying the Medicare prescription drug benefit, making college more affordable, raising the minimum wage, passing terrorism prevention measures and protecting employee pensions.

"We're going to be working on that over the next several weeks," said Sen. Patty Murray (Wash.), who was elected this week to serve as secretary of the Democratic Caucus.

Murray added that the party leadership would be consulting with all the incoming chairmen of Senate committees and would be "working with the entire Caucus to put that together."

Reid also indicated that he would be deferential to members of the Caucus, and chairmen in particular, on many legislative issues, saying, "I believe in the committee system."

On the Medicare prescription drug benefit, Democrats already have said their main concern is to give Medicare officials the ability to use the government's buying muscle to negotiate lower prices for medicines. However, Democrats may want to couple legislation to do that with bills allowing the importation of prescription drugs from Canada or eliminating the coverage gap (also known as the "doughnut hole") that some Medicare beneficiaries are experiencing with the drug benefit.

On college affordability, Democrats have been pushing to lower student-loan interest rates, but that could be attached to a proposal to expand Pell Grants, among other things.

Reid said he already had begun talks with incoming Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) about how to press forward with legislation implementing the recommendations of the 9/11 commission, which outlined ways in which the government could make the country safer following the devastating terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

But Reid acknowledged that he may not be able to secure enactment of the entire package of recommendations and noted that some have already become law.

"I'm not going to say we'll do all of them, but we certainly need to do most of them," he said. "We'll move forward as expeditiously as possible in enacting those."

While immigration and trade are unlikely to make the Democrats' top-10 list, party leaders said they would still address the issues as they crop up.

On immigration, Reid said the comprehensive approach that passed the Senate earlier this year would likely be the model for any Democratic reforms to the system.

As for trade deals, Democratic leaders indicated that such pacts would get more scrutiny under now that they are in power.

New Majority Whip Dick Durbin (D-Ill.) said he voted for free trade pacts, such as the North American Free Trade Agreement, but now feels "betrayed."

"We have not created enforceable agreements," Durbin said.

Meanwhile, Democrats are still looking to push a lobbying and ethics reform bill that includes a provision requiring Senators to acknowledge their pet projects, or earmarks, in spending bills, Reid said.

Reid also promised to institute strict internal budget rules, known as pay as you go, and to repeal tax breaks for major oil companies that have seen record profits in recent years.

In addition to charting the waters Democrats want to traverse, Reid also talked a bit about what Democrats won't be doing. He said talk within his party of removing Bush from office was easily quelled by the realization of who would succeed him.

"One of the things we're able to cut off pretty quickly was the 'impeach Bush'" talk, Reid said. "That was because of two words: Dick Cheney."

Time Of Testing For Harry Reid (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, November 16, 2006

When Virginia Sen. George Allen conceded to Jim Webb last week, giving the Democrats their 51st seat in the Senate, the responsibility for the work of the legislative branch shifted definitively -- and a potential weak point for the new majority was exposed.

Hours earlier it became clear that the Democrats had won a majority in the House of almost the same size that Republicans had enjoyed for the past two years -- a working margin large enough to support a fairly ambitious agenda. Nancy Pelosi, who will be speaker of the House, has the personal strength and political skills to hold that majority together at least as well as Dennis Hastert did in his time at the helm. House rules favor majority control, so Pelosi can be generous toward the minority without jeopardizing her chances of success.

The 51-49 Senate is a very different proposition. As Republicans learned to their chagrin in the past few years, it takes 60 votes to accomplish almost anything controversial or substantive in the Senate -- the number needed to bring debate to a close and force an up-or-down vote. That means persuading or pressuring at least nine Republicans to go along. Otherwise, Sen. Mitch McConnell, the crafty Kentuckian elected to be the Republican minority leader, will have veto power over legislation -- before it goes to the White House, where President Bush will wield a veto pen of his own.

That reality puts an enormous strain on Harry Reid, the Nevadan who has struggled these past two years to master the less arduous duties of Senate minority leader. The risk for Democrats is that Reid may not be up to the challenge.

We saw how weakness in the majority leader could hurt a party in the recent example of Sen. Bill Frist. More than once Frist was unable to hold his own troops together on big issues or to thwart Reid and the Democrats when they built roadblocks to administration bills. Now the situation is reversed, and it is Reid who will be tested.

The modern Senate is a haven for freelancers, for senators who play to national constituencies outside the Capitol and whose energies are focused on their personal ambitions. That is especially true during the presidential campaign season, which unfortunately is already upon us.

The Senate is chockablock with presidential wannabes. On the Democratic side, they include the leading contender, Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, as well as Evan Bayh of Indiana, Joe Biden of Delaware, Chris Dodd of Connecticut, Barack Obama of Illinois and -- in his own mind, at least -- John Kerry of Massachusetts. On the Republican side, the potential leading candidate, John McCain of Arizona, has many friends, among them such influential and ambitious senators as Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, Trent Lott of Mississippi, Lindsey Graham of South Carolina and John Sununu of New Hampshire. Another possible candidate is Sen. Sam Brownback of Kansas, who represents the religious right.

In addition to those egos and ambitions, Reid will have to contend with a few real mavericks and independent spirits in his caucus. Sen. Joe Lieberman of Connecticut, elected last week as an independent Democrat after losing his party's primary to Ned Lamont, has reiterated his intention to follow his own path rather than accept party discipline. He has staked out a position on Iraq -- opposing any timetable for withdrawal -- that is at odds with the prevailing inclination of the new majority.

And Webb, the man who gave the Democrats that majority, will now give their leadership anxious moments. A newcomer to elective politics and resentful of the conventions and demands of the political game, Webb is also a newcomer to the Democratic Party. His previous government experience was as Navy secretary in the Reagan administration. His campaign showed him to be a populist on economic issues and a sharp critic of U.S. involvement in Iraq -- but often unpredictable or uncertain about other questions. Most of all, he resisted being managed or directed, so Reid will have to handle him with kid gloves.

As minority leader, Reid was remarkably effective in keeping the Democratic caucus united but far less successful as a public spokesman for his party. His partisan comments were often too sharp, his television appearances less than commanding. In his new role, he will be far more exposed, and his flaws more conspicuous.

With a House majority and nominal control of the Senate, the Democrats will be expected to deliver on their promise to bring the Iraq war to some kind of conclusion and redirect domestic policy to the benefit of the middle and working classes.

That is a large order for the Senate Democrats and their tiny majority -- and their leader, Harry Reid.

Can The Democrats Deliver? (WP)

By Robert J. Samuelson

The Washington Post, November 16, 2006

Among Washington lobbyists, policy analysts, congressional staffers and journalists, the game last week was to figure out how the Democrats' capture of Congress will refashion legislative agendas. One answer is that we won't know until the leadership sets its political strategy, canvasses its members and consults interest groups. Another answer is: Temper your expectations. Even forgetting possible vetoes by President Bush, the Democrats have less leeway to alter policy than their rhetoric implies.

Although Democrats didn't promise much -- they benefited heavily from unhappiness with the war in Iraq -- they still succumbed to exaggeration. Their sound bites ran ahead of plausible solutions. Consider three familiar themes. Bush's tax cuts for the wealthy; inaction on the minimum wage; and Republican opposition to negotiating Medicare drug prices with the pharmaceutical companies. All are of a piece: The Republicans are lackeys for the wealthy business class; they don't care much about the poor.

But what can the Democrats do? Let's see.

Â· Tax cuts for the rich. Yes, Bush and Congress cut the top two income tax rates from 39.6 percent and 36 percent under Bill Clinton to 35 and 33 percent. They also cut the top tax rate on capital gains (mostly stock profits) from 20 percent to 15 percent and the top rate on dividends to 15 percent (before, dividends were taxed as ordinary income with rates up to 39.6 percent). Because stock ownership is heavily concentrated among the rich, they benefited most from these cuts.

Suppose Democrats repealed them. The top rate would revert to 39.6 percent -- and so on. Given the Democrats' thunderous denunciation of these tax cuts, you might imagine that budget deficits would vanish and there'd be more money for health and education spending. Well, no. In fiscal 2007 and 2008, federal revenue would increase $42 billion and $63 billion, estimates the Tax Policy Center of the Urban Institute and Brookings Institution. Though big sums, they don't even cover the deficits. The Congressional Budget Office projects these at $286 billion (2007) and $273 billion (2008).

Note: Most of Bush's tax cuts expire at the end of 2010, but Democratic leaders haven't pledged to repeal the tax cuts for the rich before that -- and they have pledged to protect Bush's middle-class tax cuts. Even undoing all of Bush's tax cuts probably wouldn't eliminate budget deficits. Altogether, the tax cuts cost the government about $200 billion annually, estimates the congressional Joint Committee on Taxation.

Â· The minimum wage. It hasn't changed since Sept. 1, 1997, when it went to $5.15 an hour. Looks bad for the Republicans. Democrats say they'll increase it immediately, possibly to $7.25 in two steps by 2008. Unfortunately, the minimum wage isn't a powerful way to help the poor.

One problem: If you raise the minimum wage too much, you destroy jobs for the young and unskilled -- the people you're trying to help. Companies won't pay workers more than they're worth. Another problem: Higher wages won't help many poor families, because 40 percent have no workers and 35 percent have only part-time or part-year workers. Finally, many workers with wages around the minimum aren't poor. They're young or part-time workers from middle-class families.

Economist Jared Bernstein of the Economic Policy Institute, a liberal think tank favoring a higher minimum wage, thinks that almost 15 million workers might get a pay increase if the minimum wage went to $7.25. That would represent about 10 percent of all workers and would include those now at the minimum (1.9 million), those between the old and new minimums (4.7 million) and some just above the new minimum (8.3 million). But less than 40 percent of the wage gains would go to the poorest fifth of households.

Â· Drug prices. Democrats will move to lift the prohibition against the government negotiating directly with pharmaceutical companies over drug prices paid by Medicare. Some Democrats want to use the savings to expand benefits, but just how much could be saved is in dispute. The Department of Veterans Affairs already negotiates directly with drug companies. A study by Families USA, a liberal advocacy group, contends that the VA's prices on major drugs are 48 percent lower than Medicare's.

The administration says the comparison is misleading. The VA program serves a smaller population (4.4 million vs. 23 million for Medicare), and drug companies wouldn't provide such steep discounts for a bigger program. Moreover, the VA often gets lower prices by offering only one drug in a class -- and running a competition among suppliers. Medicare wants to provide more choice. Direct negotiations couldn't be easily grafted onto the existing drug benefit, which uses insurance companies. The insurers, the administration says, have already negotiated low prices.

Even if more savings could be had, they shouldn't be used to expand coverage. Over the next decade, the CBO estimates that the drug program will cost $900 billion; none of that is covered by dedicated taxes. Expanding coverage could worsen budget deficits. For example, the CBO has informally estimated that closing the "doughnut hole" -- a coverage gap in many Medicare drug plans -- would cost $450 billion more over the decade.

On domestic policy, Democrats have few big opportunities. This creates a dilemma. They can either concentrate on symbolic acts (the minimum wage, the drug benefit) that sharpen their differences with Republicans. Or they can find less controversial matters, where cooperation seems possible, to advertise their fitness to govern and their credentials as centrists. It will be difficult to do both. There's only one solace -- the Republicans face the same dilemma.

Pension Deficit Narrows At PBGC (WP/AP)

By Jeannine Aversa

The Washington Post/AP, November 16, 2006

The federal agency that insures private pension plans for millions of Americans logged a deficit of $18.1 billion this year, a big improvement from last year as a new law helped to put the agency on better financial footing.

The deficit for the 2006 fiscal year reported by the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corp. yesterday was down from a shortfall of $22.8 billion recorded in 2005 and a record $23.3 billion in 2004.

"The PBGC's financial condition appears to have stabilized for the time being," said Vincent K. Snowbarger, interim director of the agency, which insures pensions for 44 million workers and retirees.

The agency disclosed in its annual report to Congress that as of Sept. 30 it had assets of $60 billion to cover liabilities of $78.1 billion.

The PBGC attributed the shrinking deficit mainly to a provision in the new pension law that gives airlines that are in bankruptcy protection and have frozen their pension plans extra time for their pension plans to become financially whole. That led to a sharp reduction in probable liabilities on the agency's balance sheet, the agency said.

"From the individual worker's standpoint, you are still looking at a big deficit," said Greg McBride, senior financial analyst at Bankrate.com. "The message here is even if you have a pension, you still need to save on your own because the health of that pension when you go to retire could be tenuous."

The report comes as Americans are feeling anxious about their retirement security. In recent years, the number of ailing companies turning their pension liabilities over to the PBGC has exploded. The problem has been especially pronounced in industries such as steel and the airlines, which are heavily unionized.

Organized labor wants the new Democrat-controlled Congress, which will convene in January, to provide more pension protections, including for defined-benefit plans, which are increasingly being replaced by 401(k) plans.

The PBGC was created in 1974 as a government insurance program for traditional, defined-benefit pension plans. Those plans give retirees a fixed monthly amount based on salary and years of employment. Companies that sponsor these traditional pension plans pay insurance premiums to the agency. If a company can't support its pension obligations, the agency takes over the plan and pays promised benefits up to certain limits.

The maximum annual benefit for plans taken over in 2006 is $47,659 for workers who wait until 65 to retire. Workers who retire before 65 get smaller benefits.

Traditional pension plans are still underfunded but not by as much as in the past, the agency said. These pensions now are underfunded by $350 billion, compared with $450 billion last year. Higher interest rates, a better-performing stock market, improved credit ratings and better plan funding by some companies were among the factors that helped narrow the gap, economists said.

President Bush signed a bill in August to shore up funding for traditional pensions. Supporters hope the changes will help prevent a multibillion-dollar taxpayer bailout of the PBGC.

In addition to insurance premiums paid by companies, the PBGC's operations are financed by money it earns from investments and funds from pension plans it takes over. The agency is not financed through tax revenue.

Government Admits Improper Farm Payments (AP-Y)

By Libby Quaid, Ap Food And Farm Writer

AP, November 16, 2006

The Agriculture Department on Wednesday acknowledged making improper payments to farmers worth more than $2.8 billion last year.

Officials explained that most of the payments involved missing or incomplete paperwork.

"We take this very seriously," said Chuck Christopherson, the department's chief financial officer. "We know this is something that we can address and that we can fix."

Federal law requires agencies to track erroneous payments, such as checks sent to farmers who were not eligible for a particular program, or payments for the wrong amount of money.

The amount of improper payments in fiscal 2006 was about 11 percent of farm program payments, the department said. The fiscal year ended on Sept. 30.

Officials said nearly all of that, 10 percent, was because of missing or incomplete paperwork. As of last year, officials included in their tracking payments for which paperwork was missing or incomplete, such as a form that went unsigned.

"While I certainly take seriously our jobs to ensure that every T is crossed and every I is dotted, I believe it's noteworthy to distinguish between the two types of errors here," said Teresa Lasseter, administrator of the Farm Service Agency, which runs most farm programs.

FSA is pursuing a plan to consolidate more than 2,300 county offices in an effort to modernize a Depression-era network with too few trained employees and some computers so old they can't connect to the Internet.

The local offices are where farmers sign up for government payments and loans.

"We can't really tell you that smaller-staffed offices or larger-staffed offices fared any better" at preventing improper payments, Lasseter said. "But certainly, better-trained staff with more tools to do their jobs would help us."

The department found fewer than 1 percent of improper payments in its farm programs in 2005, but it tracked fewer programs, reviewing about $38 billion in payments, versus $65 billion in 2006.

Separately, the department found $1.6 billion in improper payments made through the food stamp program. That amount was about 5.84 percent of all payments, Christopherson said, down from 5.88 percent a year before.

In April, the department's inspector general said the agency loaned $9 million over six years to farmers who shouldn't have gotten loans. The audit followed a 1999 report by the inspector general that identified $24.1 million in improper or questionable loans.

Rumsfeld Adviser Leaving For Think Tank (AP)

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld's top international policy adviser is leaving his post, in the first announced Pentagon departure since the secretary's resignation last week.

Peter W. Rodman, the assistant secretary of defense for international security affairs, will join the Brookings Institution as a senior fellow. Rodman's move has been in the works for months and was not triggered by Rumsfeld's resignation, according to Pentagon press secretary Eric Ruff.

Rodman, who began his career in government as an assistant to Henry Kissinger, has worked in five presidential administrations, including stints at the National Security Council and the State Department.

He has served as Rumsfeld's senior adviser on security strategy and policy involving the Middle East, Asia and Europe. He traveled recently with Rumsfeld on diplomatic visits to China and southeast Asia.

Rodman will be working with the Foreign Policy Studies Program at Brookings in the new year.

No date has been set yet for Rumsfeld's departure. President Bush has chosen former CIA director Robert Gates to replace Rumsfeld, and the Senate is expected to conduct a confirmation hearing as soon as next month.

Pentagon's Travel System Is Hardly Used (AP)

By Larry Margasak

AP, November 15, 2006

The Defense Department's computerized travel reservation system has turned into a half-billion-dollar fiasco, so flawed that only 17 percent of the travelers are using it as intended, Senate investigators say.

The system was designed as the Pentagon's version of an Internet travel site, where flights, hotels and rental cars can be booked without the need for fee-based travel agents.

The Senate's Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations, in checks this year of 41 military installations and the Pentagon, found that 83 percent of travelers have been contacting professional travel agents first — and then using the new system to book the travel afterward.

At the Pentagon, less than 20 percent of travelers used the Defense Travel System as intended. Virtually no travelers used the system at Dugway Proving Grounds in Utah, and Fort Leavenworth, Kan., investigators found.

Once the computer system is activated at an installation, the travelers must use it to make their reservations, the Pentagon said.

Travel agents told the subcommittee they could have booked everything in five minutes. Investigators said using the two-tiered method could take a half-hour, adding that the new system is missing flight and hotel information and does not always provide the cheapest options.

The investigators and Congress' Government Accountability Office are now questioning the Pentagon estimates of how much it saved by replacing the old paper form system with the expensive computerized one.

A senator plans legislation to force the Pentagon to use travel agents, saying military staff is wasting too much time using the cumbersome new system and therefore erasing any cost savings.

Sen. Norm Coleman, R-Minn., chairman of the investigative panel, said the Pentagon's idea of eliminating travel agents "would be the same as directing all DoD personnel to speak Arabic in order to save money on translation services. DoD is claiming the savings from reduced travel agent fees without considering the cost of having the troops do the work."

Pentagon officials insist the new system is working fine.

"If my boss said I had to leave in a couple of hours, I could do that," said Marine Maj. Stewart Upton, a Pentagon spokesman. "The future is in Internet booking. The system is effective, it's efficient, it gives you options on airlines, rental car agencies and hotels. We're very impressed."

For 2006, the Pentagon estimated savings at between $13.9 million and $33.4 million. After 2007, the savings would range between $56 million and $177 million annually, with recent estimates supporting the higher figure, the Pentagon said.

But the cost of the Defense Travel System has skyrocketed, from an initial estimate of $263 million to $474 million.

The subcommittee investigated about 755,000 trips from January through September this year. Besides failing to find all the necessary flight and hotel information, the system is unable to process two-dozen categories of temporary travel, including trips by National Guard and Reserves troops, the subcommittee found.

Coleman said further efforts to save the computer system are a waste. "I am appalled that DoD did not pull the plug on the travel function" of the new system long before now, he said.

The contract was awarded in 1998 to a company that is now part of Northrop Grumman Mission Systems.

Detroit And Bush (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 16, 2006

Auto executives from the Big Three finally got their sit-down with President Bush this week, where they (surprise!) pleaded for federal relief. The press billed it as a meeting between the President and "American" car makers, which is true as far as it goes. But what does it mean to be a domestic auto manufacturer today, and do Ford, General Motors and DaimlerChrysler alone still speak for the industry?

The Big Three still dominate U.S. auto production, but foreign makers continue to gain market share, currently accounting for some 40% of all passenger cars and light trucks sold in the U.S. Foreign auto makers also continue to invest and expand their presence stateside. In 2004 foreign-owned plants in the U.S. accounted for nearly 29% of all vehicles produced domestically; in 1984 it was less than 3%. Auto imports are rising, but they remain lower than they were at their peak in the 1980s.

In a study published earlier this year, the Cato Institute's Daniel Griswold and Daniel Ikenson report that each of the top 10 selling cars and trucks in the first half of 2006 is produced at U.S. facilities. "Toyota Camry, Honda Accord, Chevy Impala (GM), Ford Taurus, Nissan Altima, Ford Explorer, Chrysler Town & Country, and other models that round off the most popular 20, regardless of the location of company headquarters, are produced in U.S. plants by American workers who contribute to the local, state, and national economies through their employment, expenditures, and taxes," the authors note.

All of which suggests that the U.S. auto industry as a whole is healthy and that the troubles of GM, Ford and Chrysler are by and large unique to those Detroit players. This is an important distinction, because the auto executives who met with Mr. Bush are keen to present their current woes as industry-wide. And the Big Three are counting on Michigan's Democrats in Congress, who now find themselves in the majority, to help make the case.

GM posted a $10.6 billion loss last year and has closed plants and offered union-worker buyouts. Ford is downsizing its workforce in the wake of weak sales. Both companies are responding to self-inflicted wounds that result from weak product lines, plus labor deals with the United Auto Workers that include generous benefits and pensions, as well as GM's notorious Jobs Bank that pays thousands of workers for not working. GM is paying for the health care of more retired workers (and their dependents) than of active employees.

These legacy costs, which don't burden foreign competitors, are gobbling up cash at the Big Three and explain their eagerness to seek political benediction. Mr. Bush had been resisting their overtures and appears to be standing his ground, agreeing to little more after this week's meeting than a "continuing dialogue." But with Michigan Democrats Carl Levin and John Dingell filling leadership posts, there's likely to be increased pressure for some kind of government aid. And if these Democrats have their way, that will involve some taxpayer assumption of legacy costs.

The President's inconsistency on bailouts won't help matters. The airlines have received between $15 billion and $20 billion in cash to help keep them afloat in the wake of 9/11. And in 2002 the Bush Administration enacted steel tariffs, even as large bankrupt steel firms dumped their own legacy costs on the federal Pension Benefit Guaranty Corporation.

Detroit auto makers are angling for a similar deal, but it would only retard the necessary if painful transformation that is currently taking place at the Big Three. It would also reward bad management decisions -- and union intransigence -- by allowing car companies to toss health care costs over to taxpayers.

Claims that U.S. auto manufacturers are at a competitive disadvantage due to an undervalued Japanese yen also don't hold up. Last year, both the Treasury and Federal Reserve looked into accusations of currency manipulation and found no evidence that it was taking place. Over the past three years the Japanese yen has appreciated against the dollar by about 12%. In any case, the value of the yen has nothing to do with GM competing with the Hondas made in Marysville, Ohio.

With respect to Korea, a huge country with a closely protected auto market, the Big Three have a trade point. But the proper government response is to urge Korea to open its markets more, not to reply in kind. And, by the way, the car makers are also right about U.S. anti-dumping trade laws, which steel makers and their lawyers have used to raise domestic steel prices. How about Democrats and Mr. Bush calling for the repeal of those laws?

GM, Ford, Chrysler and their enablers in the new Congress would have you believe otherwise, but outside of Michigan the U.S. remains a great place to produce vehicles. Consumers have more choices in what to drive and better quality than ever. And prices are competitive. Government intervention in a market this healthy can only increase the chances that it won't stay that way.

Fed Points To Soft Landing For Economy (FT)

By Krishna Guha And Michael Mackenzie

Financial Times, November 16, 2006

Federal Reserve policymakers are becoming a little more confident about their ability to engineer a soft landing for the US economy, minutes published on Wednesday reveal.

The minutes, from the last Fed policy meeting on October 25, show that most Fed policymakers thought the downside risks to growth had "diminished a little" since the previous meeting, while some thought the upside risks to inflation had also declined, though "only slightly".

However, the outlook for both inflation and growth remains very uncertain.

Policymakers underscored that – not withstanding weak third quarter growth – they are still focused on the risks to inflation, sounding, if anything, more hawkish than in the previous minutes for September.

All members of the committee "expressed concern about the outlook for inflation" and all "agreed that the risks to achieving the anticipated reduction in inflation remained of the greatest concern."

They talked openly about the need to assess whether they should be raising rates at the next policy meeting in December.

Stocks rallied after the minutes were released, while the futures market priced in a reduced probability that the Fed would cut interest rates early next year.

"They are telling us that they are certainly not leaning that way right now," said Peter Hooper, chief economist at Deutsche Bank Securities.

Tom Di Galoma, head of trading at Jefferies & Co, said the Fed's tough talk would "up the ante" ahead of today's consumer price inflation report.

The minutes show that Fed policymakers viewed the weakness in the third quarter "broadly as anticipated."

While growth had slowed a bit more abruptly than they expected, they attributed this to "temporary influences" that would not have an ongoing effect on economic activity.

Many Fed policymakers "drew some comfort" from recent housing market data. With retail spending "relatively robust" the housing slowdown "also did not seem to be spilling over into consumer spending."

Most expected core inflation to "edge lower" as pressure from past increases in energy prices waned, shelter costs slowed and pressure on overall levels of resource utilisation eased a little.

The committee noted that "recent changes in core prices had declined slightly from earlier in the year."

However, the labour market was "tight" and presented an upside risk to inflation.

There were hints that the patience of some committee members is being stretched.

Fed Keeps Policy Attention Firmly On Inflation (WSJ)

By Greg Ip

The Wall Street Journal, November 16, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Federal Reserve officials remain firmly focused on inflation, minutes of their last policy meeting show, suggesting that a near-term cut in interest rates remains unlikely. Since the Oct. 24-25 meeting, markets have begun to see a greater probability of a rate cut by May, in part because of softer-than-expected data on wholesale prices, manufacturing activity and retail sales.

Still, the meeting minutes, released yesterday with the usual three-week lag, suggest the central bank is sufficiently preoccupied with inflation that the latest data would have little effect on its rate intentions.

Lou Crandall, chief economist at Wrightson Associates, said the pattern in recent months has been for investors to mark up the odds of a rate cut on economic data, then mark them down on commentary from the Fed, such as speeches or statements. Investors, he said, are "overreacting to the bond-friendly news and underreacting to the unfriendly news."

Bond-friendly news is news that suggests lower interest rates.

At the October meeting, the policy-making Federal Open Market Committee left its target for short-term interest rates at 5.25%, where it has stood since late June.

At that meeting, "most" committee members felt "downside risks to economic activity had diminished a little, and likewise some members felt that the upside risks to inflation had declined, though only slightly," the minutes said. "All members agreed that the risks to achieving the anticipated reduction in inflation remained of greatest concern."

They noted that a lot of economic data would be released before the next meeting, on Dec. 12, to help decide "whether any additional firming was needed to address those risks." Even though another rate increase appears unlikely, the fact that officials see their choice as between an increase or no change suggests that odds of a near-term rate cut are remote. Thus, the Fed could stay on hold for some months to come.

Even though monthly core inflation rates, which exclude food and energy, have moderated from earlier this year, inflation is still higher than what most Fed officials would define as "price stability." Some define price stability as inflation of about 2%, some as 1% to 2% and some wouldn't put a number on it.

Nonetheless, "nearly all participants viewed the current rates of core inflation" -- between 2.4% and 2.9%, depending on the price index used -- "as uncomfortably high and stressed the importance of further moderation."

The minutes said FOMC members expect core inflation to decline, as the indirect effects of the retreat in energy prices feed through to other goods and services, and the cost of housing ceases to be a source of upward pressure. They also said the decline in housing activity is unfolding as expected and that the "risk of an even larger contraction in this sector had ebbed." Some, however, fretted that it could yet spill over to other areas of consumer spending.

While the October meeting was lengthened to two days to discuss improving its communications with the public, little progress was made on that front. Members debated the merits of an explicit numerical objective for inflation -- what they used to call an inflation target -- but selecting such an objective "raised a number of complex and interrelated issues that required considerable further discussion."

Fed insiders have said setting an inflation objective raises questions about what number to use, whether to pick a single number or a range, what time period, if any, in which to commit to achieving that number, and how to update the public on progress toward that objective, such as through a forecast.

Fed Bankers All Show Inflation Concerns (USAT)

By Barbara Hagenbaugh

USA Today, November 16, 2006

WASHINGTON — Investors and others hoping for an interest rate cut from the Federal Reserve early next year may be disappointed.

Minutes from the Fed's meeting three weeks ago show that “all” of the central bankers were concerned about inflation and said the risks that price pressures would not diminish were “of greatest concern.”

That, along with fading concern among Fed members about a softening in economic activity, suggest the Fed is nowhere near cutting interest rates, Lehman Bros. chief U.S. economist Ethan Harris says.

“We're a long way from an ease based on what the Fed is saying,” says Harris, who anticipates the Fed will actually raise rates in the first quarter in order to stem inflation pressures.

Recent data on prices have suggested that inflation pressures have eased in recent months. That has led to increased expectations that the Fed would be cutting interest rates early in 2007.

Expectations for a rate cut in the first quarter of 2007 peaked Oct. 4. Investors in a market in which participants bet on future Fed moves at that time were pricing in a nearly 80% chance that the Fed would cut rates in March, the second meeting in 2007, according to Moody's Economy.com.

But those expectations have eased. The odds of a rate cut in March fell to 18% following release of the Fed minutes Wednesday, down from 28% earlier in the day.

Stock prices gave back some of their earlier gains after the minutes were issued midafternoon Wednesday as expectations of a rate cut eased.

The Fed in particular noted that a tight labor market could lead to a “sustained increase in wage pressure,” and thus inflation. Although high profit margins meant some companies could absorb the added wage costs, rather than raise prices, that was by no means a given.

"All meeting participants expressed concern about the outlook for inflation," the minutes said. "Participants were concerned that inflation expectations could begin to drift upwards if core (excluding food and energy) inflation remained elevated for a protracted period."

Although "most" of the Fed officials expected inflation to ease, "they were quite uncertain as to the likely pace and extent of that moderation," the minutes said.

Economists at Moody's Economy.com still expect the Fed will cut rates twice in the first half of 2007. A softening economy will lead to a weaker job market and a reduction in inflationary pressures, says Dan Jester, associate economist at the economic consulting firm.

The Fed left its target for short-term interest rates, which influence borrowing costs across the economy, steady at its meeting last month, marking the third-consecutive meeting without any changes. Fed officials previously raised interest rates at 17 consecutive meetings. The current target, at 5.25%, is the highest in nearly six years.

Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke and his colleagues next meet to discuss interest rates on Dec. 12. Investors are expecting the Fed will keep rates unchanged next month, as well as at the following meeting in January.

What Slowdown? Stocks March On To Fresh Highs (WSJ)

By Peter A. Mckay

Investors bid stocks to fresh highs, their hopes for a less-than-traumatic economic slowdown buoyed by newly released comments by Federal Reserve policymakers.

Minutes from Fed officials' October meeting showed that the central bank's rate setters still are concerned about whether inflation will indeed slow in the months ahead as they have projected. But the minutes also portrayed the housing market's slowdown as orderly, saying the risk of a steeper downturn had "ebbed."

The Dow Jones Industrial Average rallied 33.70 points, or 0.3%, to a record 12251.71, up 14.3% on the year. Shares in Altria Group, one of the blue-chip average's largest individual components, rose 1.3% after Goldman Sachs upgraded its rating on the company to "buy" from "hold."

The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index crossed 1400 for the first time in more than six years but finished shy of that psychologically important number. The index ended 0.2% higher, up 3.35 points at 1396.57, its highest close since Nov. 9, 2000, and up 11.9% on the year. It still would have to rise more than 9% to top its record set in early 2000.

The technology-heavy Nasdaq Composite Index rose 0.5%, or 12.09 points, to 2442.75, up 10.8% on the year. It was the best close since Feb. 15, 2001, though the index would have to more than double to reach a new record.

"We're seeing a self-fulfilling prophecy take place in the market right now," said S&P strategist Sam Stovall. "You have money managers saying, 'I don't want to be left behind,' " while their competitors rack up big year-end gains.

An $8 billion offer by US Airways Group to acquire Delta Air Lines also helped the market, especially the transportation sector. But on a downbeat note, crude-oil prices rose on supply concerns.

Contracts for December delivery rose 48 cents, or 0.8%, to $58.76 a barrel, still off 2.8% on the year at the New York Mercantile Exchange.

In other economic news, the Fed's New York branch released results of this month's Empire State Manufacturing survey, which showed surprisingly strong industrial activity in the state. Contrary to analysts' expectations for a monthly drop in the survey index, it rose this month to 26.66, the highest reading since June.

Today, the market will receive fresh data on inflation at the consumer level, which could set off another round of heated speculation about the Fed's next move. Analysts expect the government's Consumer Price Index to show a 0.2% increase in October, not including volatile food and energy prices.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks rose1 and bond prices fell2: The 10-year note fell 11/32 point, or $3.44 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield up to 4.619%. The 30-year bond fell 16/32 to yield 4.697%.

The dollar was mixed3. Against the Japanese currency, the dollar rose to 118.04 yen, compared to 117.51. The euro rose to $1.2826, compared to $1.2822.

In Second Coal Rush, New Mind-Set In The Mines (WP)

By Dale Russakoff

COULTERVILLE, Ill. -- Billy Vandom was 220 feet underground, but to him, it was the top of the world. He is a coal miner, a species of well-paid American worker that was on the verge of extinction in these parts for more than a decade.

Now global economic forces have realigned, and coal mining is back. And a new generation of miners is living the good life not seen here since coal was king.

"I was able to buy me a new truck and I got my wife a new car," said Vandom, 22, from the helm of an enormous ram car, hauling tons of freshly mined coal through the low-lit darkness of the Gateway Mine here. "We have a new baby boy, and we moved into a new apartment and we fixed up a nice room for him."

Vandom has gone from struggling to pay bills with two low-wage jobs -- cooking at the Elks club and changing oil at the local Pennzoil -- to making $20 an hour plus benefits.

Those are union wages, but there is no union here. As the industry withered east of the Mississippi River, so did the United Mine Workers of America -- from 167,000 active members in 1980 to 16,000 today. The shift is profound in Southern Illinois, where being a miner used to begin with pledging allegiance to the UMWA for leading miners into the middle class.

Now the union is trying to come back, too, beginning with an organizing campaign targeting Peabody Energy Corp., owner of the Gateway Mine and the world's largest coal company.

It is proving to be a tough slog, and not just because the weakened union is up against a multibillion-dollar company. The UMWA is struggling to bridge a gap between young workers like Vandom, giddy over high wages in this long-depressed region, and older ones focused on pensions and gold-plated health care in retirement.

It is the same generational divide that defines the national debate over Social Security, but it is starker here because there is no one in the middle. As Midwestern coal production crashed in the 1980s and 1990s, young workers fled. People here refer to a "lost generation of miners." At Gateway, as at mines throughout the area, almost everyone is over 50 or under 30.

It falls to UMWA organizer Ron Huff to try to straddle the generation gap. He said he is making headway with middle-aged miners but very little with younger ones.

"All they can see is the money," he said. "I was the same way when I was their age."A Generation Gap

The miners here come not only from different generations but different worlds. Those in their 50s mostly began mining as union men from union families, following grandfathers, fathers and uncles.

Their towns erected memorials to men who died in mine accidents alongside memorials for fallen soldiers. They relied on the union to protect them in a dangerous workplace and were raised to revere John L. Lewis, the longtime UMWA president.

"I have three pictures side by side in my house: John L. Lewis, Franklin Delano Roosevelt and Jesus," said Jack McReynolds, 70, a retired miner eating lunch recently at Lola's Uptown Restaurant in West Frankfort, once home to seven coal mines, all now closed. "I draw Social Security on account of FDR. I draw a pension on account of John L. Lewis, and I'm going to Heaven because of Jesus."

Minutes later, in walked an embodiment of the rupture in the union culture. Carl "Bubba" Vincelette, 27, another Gateway miner, was in grade school as mines closed and once-proud union men clamored to be janitors. His father never mined coal. "A lot of the young guys see all these places were union before and they all closed, so it's all part of what went wrong," he said.

If older miners say the union made them middle class, Vincelette credits Peabody, which he sees as a progressive firm that pays four times what he made at his previous job and invests heavily in safety and training. In two of the past three years, Peabody mines have won the Mine Safety and Health Administration's top award for safety.

Bobby Townsend, 46, one of the youngest union supporters at Wildcat Hills, a strip mine 80 miles southeast of here, sees Peabody very differently. He speaks with outrage about a company whose stock soared with energy prices and rewarded its departing chief executive with $46 million last year but won't pay for the health insurance of miners like him when they retire.

"It's out of balance between the corporate world and the workers, and we have to make a stand," he said. "We work ourselves to the bone and they go to a gym to get exercise. They look 50 when they're 70. We look 70 when we're 50. We spend our life making these people millions of dollars; we ought to at least have pension and medical."Not Quite Golden

A dozen men in miners' boots filed into a meeting hall in Harrisburg, Ill., after their 10 1/2 -hour shift at Wildcat Hills. All had publicly pledged to support the UMWA, and all were over 50 but Townsend, his dark hair a striking exception among the gray and the bald.

"Nobody younger than me is up for the union," Townsend said. "They're buying houses and motorcycles. They think it'll run forever."

"It won't," said Larry Robbins, a miner for 26 years. His last union mine closed in the 1990s, three months before he would have logged a golden 20 years -- golden because that's when union miners qualify for lifetime retiree health insurance. Every year worked in a UMWA mine counts toward the 20. Time in a nonunion mine does not.

Around the room, one after another miner said he needed only a year or two or three of union time to hit the 20-year mark. All had voted as young men to limit wage increases in favor of retiree benefits -- only to see the clock stop before their time came.

Gary Wheeler, 53, had 17 years when his mine closed in 1994. Danny Droit, 59, said he had "roughly" 20, but worried that his total time would fall just short of the mark. Dick Bearden had 17 years.

"That medical card is worth its weight in gold," Townsend said. "My father-in-law retired with it, and he didn't have to worry what the doctor or the medicine cost. My father is in construction and is still working at age 76 to pay for health insurance."

The former union miners were among thousands east of the Mississippi River whose mines closed after Congress mandated acid rain controls in 1990, shattering demand for high-sulfur coal. To comply, utilities switched en masse to low-sulfur coal from the vast Powder River Basin in Montana and Wyoming.

The shift effectively broke the union. Mines closed or went bankrupt across the Midwest and northern Appalachia, where the union was dominant, and opened throughout the nonunion West.

Court rulings hastened the union's decline. Gateway, for example, was for decades a union mine doing business as Zeigler 11. But its previous owner won the right in bankruptcy court to shed its union contracts in 2004. Peabody bought the mine out of bankruptcy, changed its name and reopened it in 2005 under a nonunion subsidiary, Black Beauty Coal Co.

Eighty percent of Peabody's miners were unionized in the 1980s. With its operations now mostly in the West, chief executive Gregory Boyce reported this year to shareholders that 85 percent of Peabody's coal comes from "union-free operations."'I Just Want the Cash Now'

Coal's rebound here is a direct result of soaring U.S. demand for electricity, half of which currently comes from coal. The Bush administration is promoting coal as a "freedom fuel" -- in contrast to foreign oil -- and utilities are on a coal binge, with 154 new coal-fired plants on the drawing board. New plants must have scrubbers that remove sulfur before it reaches the atmosphere, so high-sulfur coal is back in the game. Meanwhile, coal states and the industry are investing heavily in technologies to convert coal into liquid fuel to power cars and jet planes.

The Illinois Office of Coal Development forecasts 3,000 new mining jobs statewide in the next three years, and another 2,000 as older miners retire, but that is just a shadow of the roughly 20,000 coal mining jobs that were here before the crash. And other high-paying production jobs are vanishing; a nearby Maytag plant with 942 workers is closing next month.

Younger workers interviewed throughout the area said they felt they had little leverage to complain about long hours or difficult working conditions because so many people were waiting in line for jobs that pay well. Gateway had 1,300 applicants for its 200 jobs, according to operations manager Thomas A. Benner.

Aaron Wright, 37, a son and nephew of union miners, said he would happily work without a union if he could get a coal-mining job.

"I'm tired of making $8 to $9 an hour, not enough to support myself, not enough to support my kids," Wright said. "I just want the cash now."

Middle-aged union supporters say younger workers are naive to think they won't face supervisors who underestimate danger or play favorites in assigning work, or try to deny their rights if they are injured or lay them off without explanation. They say they've seen all this and more.

But Vic Svec, Peabody's senior vice president for communications, said the company works hard to show workers they don't need a union. Peabody pegs its wage scale to match or exceed the UMWA's, he said. It also provides a 401(k) with a generous company match, and pays bonuses at mines that meet productivity and safety targets. Vandom said he gets a $700 to $800 bonus about every three months.

"Our strategy is to have the best possible relationship with employees," Svec said. "We don't feel it benefits our employees or our operations to have third parties involved."Thinking Long Term

With so many miners nearing retirement age, Peabody also has a major financial interest in keeping the union at bay: Retired miners have much higher than average medical costs, according to a union study.

This was easy to believe from the collective ailments of UMWA pensioners who gathered on a recent morning at the Knights of Columbus hall in Pinckneyville. Robert McCrary, 72, who retired from Arch Coal Inc. after 36 years, said he has black lung disease, and heart disease that has required multiple stents, a defibrillator and a pacemaker. He said he takes 16 prescription drugs.

Larry Bruns, 63, who retired from Peabody after more than 37 years, said he has had hip replacements, a hernia, carpal tunnel syndrome, arthritis, high blood pressure and an enlarged prostate -- "and I'm just a young pup."

With so few active union miners, many retirees say they worry the UMWA will have trouble defending their increasingly costly health care at the bargaining table. Retiree medical care is negotiated in each union contract.

"If they take the insurance away, they'll just need enough to bury me," said Rick Harrison, another Zeigler retiree, who has had three open-heart surgeries and is due for a fourth.

Back at Lola's Uptown Restaurant, Vincelette recalled that he had listened with an open mind when a UMWA organizer visited him recently. The organizer said union coal miners elect safety committees that have authority to shut a mine if they judge it unsafe. But Vincelette said he trusted Peabody to be vigilant about safety.

The organizer also said that with 20 years in a union mine, Vincelette would get retiree health insurance for life. But 20 years sounded like an eternity.

"The way everything's going -- wars and stuff like that -- it's hard to think long term," he said.

McReynolds, the retired UMWA miner with John L. Lewis's picture in his living room, listened from across the table in pained silence.

When the young miner left, McReynolds rose slowly from his chair and straightened his Mason's hat bearing a UMWA pensioners' emblem and a gold pick-and-shovel pin the union gave him. "That young man has no idea what he's talking about," he said.

Most Students In Big Cities Lag Badly In Basic Science (NYT)

By Diana Jean Schemo

The New York Times, November 16, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 15 — A least half of eighth graders tested in science failed to demonstrate even a basic understanding of the subject in 9 of 10 major cities, and fourth graders, the only other group tested, fared little better, according to results released here Wednesday.

The outcome of those tests, part of the National Assessment of Educational Progress, often called the nation's report card, showed that student performance in urban public schools was not only poor but also far short of science scores in the nation as a whole.

Half or a little more of the eighth-grade students in Charlotte, San Diego and Boston lacked a basic grasp of science.

In six of the other cities — New York, Houston, Chicago, Cleveland, Los Angeles and Atlanta — the share of eighth graders without that knowledge was even higher, ranging from about three-fifths in New York to about four-fifths in Atlanta. By comparison, the corresponding share for the nation as a whole was 43 percent.

Among the 10 cities, only in Austin were the eighth graders who lacked a basic understanding in the minority, and just barely there.

"It's a national disgrace," said Rodger W. Bybee, director of the Biological Sciences Curriculum Study, which develops and evaluates science curriculums and promotes the teaching of science. "We as a nation should be able to do better than that."

At the fourth-grade level, a majority of students in all the 10 cities except Austin, Charlotte and San Diego failed to demonstrate basic understanding in science, compared with 34 percent nationwide. According to a report accompanying the scores, this meant they lacked the skills and reasoning needed to learn science, and could not read simple charts or follow elementary experiments. A similar definition, though with expectations of a higher level of skill, applied to eighth graders.

Students in New York were on a par with those in other large cities, though white students there scored lower than whites in other cities and in the nation. The scores of blacks and Latinos in New York were not significantly different from those of similar students in the other cities.

New York's schools chancellor, Joel I. Klein, pointed out in a statement that low-income students there had done better than those in most other cities, but added, "We, like the rest of the country, have a lot more work to do in this critical area" of teaching science to the poor.

He noted that beginning with the next academic year, the city would begin testing students annually in science in Grades 3 to 8. Another innovation for the 2007-8 school year is that under the No Child Left Behind Act, public schools across the country must begin testing students in science at least once from Grades 3 to 8. But the results of these tests, like those of New York's, will not determine whether schools have made sufficient progress under the law, which counts only reading and math to determine a school's standing.

While states use a hodgepodge of tests to measure student achievement, the national assessment is the only exam given to students nationwide. The science test — in earth, physical and life sciences — was given in early 2005 to 280,000 students, including an extra 30,000 at public schools in the 10 cities, which had volunteered so that they could get a comparative snapshot of performance. The scores were grouped in four categories, from below basic to advanced.

The results prompted the Council of the Great City Schools, which represents the nation's largest school districts, to call for national standards in science, and in reading and math as well.

Michael Casserly, the group's executive director, acknowledged that political resistance to national standards was strong in a nation that generally considers education a prerogative of localities. But Mr. Casserly said such standards would lend clarity to efforts to improve achievement.

The fourth-grade national assessment, he said, tests students in subjects like electrical circuitry, the difference between plant and animal cells, and the formation of rocks. "But some state standards," he continued, "don't teach them until the fifth grade. It is not clear, then, what our teachers are supposed to teach when."

Gerald Wheeler, executive director of the National Science Teachers Association, who wrote some of the questions asked on the national assessment, said he found the test results "extremely disappointing."

"There's no way these kids are going to be able to survive in our technological society," Dr. Wheeler said.

With the exception of fourth graders in Austin, low-income students in urban schools performed significantly below the average for low-income students nationwide. "Student poverty, parent education, home resources, English-language proficiency and other factors outside our control work in tandem like a perfect storm to dampen our results in ways that few others have to contend with," Mr. Casserly said.

But the results suggested that performance was influenced more by the disparities associated with race and income than by whether students attended school in cities or in other settings, said Darvin M. Winick, chairman of the National Assessment Governing Board, which oversees the test.

For example, while Atlanta was below the median in the ranking of urban performance, its white fourth graders not only did better on the exam than did 86 percent of fourth graders across the country but also outperformed the nation's white fourth graders as a whole, who reached only the 62nd percentile. At the same time, the city's black fourth graders were in the bottom 22 percent of fourth graders nationwide — two points below the national average for blacks.

Only in Austin, Houston and Charlotte did black and Latino fourth graders score higher than similar students in the nation as a whole. Still, their scores were in the bottom 25 percent to 32 percent of all students taking the exam.

Urban Students Perform Worse At Science (AP)

WASHINGTON (AP) -- Children in major U.S. cities perform worse than other students around the country on science tests given in elementary and middle school, a snapshot released by the government Wednesday shows.

Ten urban school districts volunteered to take the tests and have their scores compared to public school students nationwide for the first time.

Fourth-graders in nine of the 10 city districts had lower average scores than public school students nationally. The only exception was Austin, Texas, where they performed at the national average.

In eighth grade, all 10 urban districts had average scores below the national average.

The science scores are from the 2005 National Assessment of Educational Progress, a test given nationwide periodically on a range of subjects. It is viewed as the best way to compare student achievement across state and district lines.

Besides Austin, the urban districts that participated in the comparative look were: Atlanta; Boston; Charlotte, N.C.; Chicago; Cleveland; Houston; Los Angeles; New York and San Diego.

The districts enroll a disproportionately large share of minorities, children who have limited English ability, and children from low-income families. Taking this into account, the results showed minorities in the city schools often performed similarly to students with the same backgrounds in the national sample.

The topics covered on the tests include earth science, physics, chemistry and biology.

The new scores emphasize how much room for improvement remains across a range of urban districts -- just as is the case for most of the nation's schools.

Nationally, for example, just a little more than a quarter of students in both grades could handle challenging subject matter -- a skill level educators call "proficient".

Among the city schools, only Austin had about that proportion of students testing at that level in both grades, with Charlotte not far behind.

Cleveland had the smallest percentage of fourth- and eighth-grade students who were proficient -- no more than 6 percent.

Fourth-graders working at a proficient level can relate the relative amount of time a candle burns to the amount of air available. Proficient eighth-graders can identify the energy conversions that occur in an electric fan.

Nationally, 34 percent of fourth-graders fell into the bottom achievement category, unable to perform at even a "basic" level. That category also applied to 43 percent of eighth-graders.

The urban districts all had more students in the lowest-scoring category than the nationwide sample.

Chicago and Los Angeles had the most fourth-graders in that group, with 65 percent falling below basic levels.

Atlanta fared the worst among eighth-graders, with 78 percent of students recording below basic scores.

Gerry Wheeler, executive director of the National Science Teacher Association, called the report discouraging.

"There's no way these young adults are going to be able to survive in this scientific and technological society," Wheeler said. He cited high teacher turnover and a lack of emphasis on teacher training as problems in urban school districts.

The government could not point to specific trends for the urban group, since this was the first time those cities have volunteered to have their scores put under a microscope.

The national science scores were released earlier this year and showed improvements among elementary school children nationwide in science since 2000, but not among middle and high school students.

"We need to devote more time and energy to science instruction, not just in the cities but nationwide, because nobody has much bragging rights on science performance anywhere in the country," said Michael Casserly, executive director of the Council of the Great City Schools -- a coalition of urban public school systems.

Casserly said the test results demonstrate a need for national standards in science to clarify what students are expected to know. The group also is advocating national standards for reading and math.

Urban students generally also scored lower than students nationwide in reading and math on national tests given last year.

The No Child Left Behind law, which Congress passed in 2001, requires states to administer their own assessments in math and reading, with penalties for schools that fail to improve.

State science testing under the law will begin in the 2007-08 school year, although schools will not face consequences for their performance -- something President Bush wants Congress to change.

The new report of lackluster performance underscores a deep concern among political and business executives who see eroding science achievement as a threat to the U.S. economy.

KBR Becomes Separate Stock (USAT)

By Matt Krantz

USA Today, November 16, 2006

The investor on the street is about to get a chance to own a piece of Iraq Inc. The question is, will he want to?

Today, KBR, which runs almost every aspect of the Iraq war except the fighting, will trade as a separate stock after an initial public offering. It raised $473.3 million Wednesday, after pricing the 27.8 million shares it's selling at $17 a share.

KBR isn't a household name, but it's the unit of Halliburton that handles everything in Iraq ranging from operating cafeterias for soldiers to providing fuel, laundry and other services. Vice President Cheney used to be CEO of Halliburton, a fact that was a political lightning rod in the 2004 election.

And that's the problem. With Democrats in control of Congress, largely due to voters' displeasure with Iraq, KBR must persuade investors to take part of its IPO.

For investors, “KBR is the demon spawn of Halliburton,” says Ben Holmes, publisher of MorningNotes.com, a market and IPO research firm. “That will have some effect.”

·Revenue at risk. KBR gets 56% of its revenue from its efforts in Iraq and Afghanistan, says William Smith, CEO of Renaissance Capital.

Last year, 65% of KBR's $10.1 billion in revenue came from U.S. government contracts. With Democrats in charge, the windfall will likely dwindle. “The Iraq situation has been a financial plus for this organization,” Smith says. KBR “isn't picking up arms, but it's picking up everything else.”

The company says in a regulatory filing that a “decrease in the magnitude of work we perform for the United States government in Iraq” would have a “material adverse effect on our business.”

·Potential for investigations. A Democratic Congress may further investigate the company, already at the center of several probes, Holmes says.

In June 2005, the Defense Contract Management Agency recommended withholding $55 million until KBR further documented billings for housing soldiers. Another $95 million in bills have been questioned regarding dining facilities in Iraq. KBR's procurement matters are being investigated by the U.S. Department of Justice and an assistant U.S. Attorney in Illinois.

But KBR has been broadening its business outside Iraq, says Francis Gaskins of IPOdesktop. Its backlog of business jumped 42% from last year to September, largely on non-Iraq jobs. The backlog is the salvation of a company that normally would struggle to win over investors. But it's unclear how profitable it is and whether investors are willing to pay up. “When investors really analyze the valuation, they aren't going to like it,” he says.

Dems May Expand Senate Majority In ’08 (HILL)

By Aaron Blake

The Hill, November 16, 2006

Senate Democrats will have a wider field of possibilities and probably more open seats available to expand their majority in 2008, though Senate Republicans will have several chances to pick off red-state Democrats.

Of the 33 seats up for election two years from now, 21 are held by Republicans. Eight of those 21 were elected with 55 percent of the vote or less in 2002, and in seven of them the incumbent is a freshman. The party also faces several retirement questions.

Democrats might not lose any incumbents to retirement now that they are in the majority — a crucial first step to maintaining and growing that majority.

Two big Democratic retirement risks, 82-year-old Sen. Frank Lautenberg (N.J.) and 69-year-old Sen. Jay Rockefeller (W.Va.), intend to run again in 2008, according to their offices. Sen. Tom Harkin (D-Iowa), who turns 67 on Sunday, could announce whether he will run for a fifth term by the end of the week, his office said.

Harkin, Sen. Carl Levin (D-Mich.), 72, who has not decided, and Sen. Max Baucus (D-Mont.), 64, who did not respond to inquiries, may be re-energized by capturing prized committee chairmanships. Levin will lead the Armed Services Committee, Baucus will run the Finance Committee and Harkin will head the Agriculture Committee.

All five of those seats would be attractive to Republicans if they were open, though Harkin has never garnered more than 55 percent of the vote in his four campaigns, and his seat will draw Republican attention regardless of whether he stays or goes.

Lautenberg's decision to run again is particularly important for Democrats because he already retired once, in 2000, only to run again in 2002; does not have a chairmanship because his seniority was not restored; and could face tough opposition from Tom Kean Jr., the Republican candidate this year, who ran strongly even though he was defeated.

Jennifer Duffy of the Cook Political Report expects Democrats to skate into 2008 with all five of these potential retirees. "Given that Democrats have the majority, I don't expect anybody to retire," Duffy said. "I think Harkin was thinking about it, but now that he has Ag, what's his incentive to retire? Maybe Rockefeller was thinking about it, but now he's got Intelligence, so what's his incentive?"

On the Republican side, Sens. Pat Roberts (Kan.), 70, Pete Domenici (N.M.), 74, and Ted Stevens (Alaska), who turns 83 on Saturday, have all told The Hill they intend to seek reelection. But speculation is rampant about Sens. John Warner (Va.), 79, and Wayne Allard (Colo.), who is at the tail end of a two-term-limit pledge.

Warner spokesman John Ullyot said the senator generally decides whether to run about a year and a half before an election. Allard, who has raised the least and has the second-least cashonhand ($120,000) of the 33 senators up for reelection in 2008, will wait until after the New Year to decide, spokeswoman Laura Condeluci said.

Both states would be prime pickup territory for Democrats, who will hold the other Senate seat in each come January. Allard's seat is a target whether he runs or not, and Democrats already have a strong candidate in Rep. Mark Udall, who declared for the race in March 2005 and had more than $1 million on hand as of October.

In purple Virginia, former Gov. Mark Warner (D), who decided against a presidential bid recently, would be a strong candidate to replace Republican Sen. John Warner.

The most vulnerable incumbents are Allard, Sen. Norm Coleman (R-Minn.) and Sen. Mary Landrieu (D-La.), according to the Cook Political Report. No races are yet listed as tossups.

Along with Landrieu, Baucus and Sens. Mark Pryor (D-Ark.) and Tim Johnson (D-S.D.) give Republicans four possible red-state pickups. Landrieu, who intends to run for a third term, is listed as "lean Democratic," while the latter three and Harkin are "likely Democratic."

But Republicans failed to field strong challengers against red-state Democrats Ben Nelson (Neb.), Kent Conrad (N.D.) and Robert Byrd (W.Va.) this year, drawing their biggest recruiting successes in blue states Maryland and New Jersey. They did not pick up any Democratic seats.

For Democrats, Allard and Coleman are listed as "lean Republican," while four other Republicans — Susan Collins (R-Maine), John Sununu (R-N.H.), Elizabeth Dole (R-N.C.), and James Inhofe (R-Okla.) — are listed as "likely Republican."

Dole, a 70-year-old freshman and outgoing head of the National Republican Senatorial Committee, intends to run again, according to her office. Inhofe, who turns 72 on Friday, did not respond to requests for comment but has talked about assuming the Armed Services chairmanship in 2009, suggesting he expects to be around after 2008.

Roberts, 70, intends to seek reelection, according to his office, and Sen. Thad Cochran (R-Miss.), 68, will make a decision a year from now, spokeswoman Jenny Manley said. Sen. Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.), 60, has not decided, but has expressed interest in running for president.

Two Democratic senators, Joseph Biden Jr. (Del.) and John Kerry (Mass.), may retire and run for the White House. Biden's office said he is taking the necessary steps to run for Senate, and Kerry's presidential prospects took a hit this month when his "botched joke" appeared to insult the intelligence and education of soldiers in Iraq. Kerry later apologized.

Republican Rep. Mike Castle (Del.), who just won statewide reelection by 18 points in his at-large House seat, would have a strong shot at succeeding Biden, but both Delaware and Massachusetts are blue states.

Biden will lead the Foreign Relations Committee, and Kerry will lead the Small Business Committee. Another blue-state Democrat, Sen. Dick Durbin (Ill.), who didn't face a strong challenge in 2002, will be assistant majority leader.

Early retirements within the realm of possibility include: Hawaii, where Democratic Sens. Daniel Inouye and Daniel Akaka will both be 84 on Election Day; Pennsylvania, where Republican Sen. Arlen Specter, 76, has battled Hodgkin's disease; and Wyoming, where Republican Sen. Craig Thomas, 73, last week revealed he has leukemia. Thomas and Akaka were both reelected last week, and Akaka will now chair the Veterans Affairs Committee.

Family-friendly Agenda Urged (WT)

By Cheryl Wetzstein

The Washington Times, November 16, 2006

Democrats closed a so-called "parent gap" in this month's election and should seize the moment by pushing family-friendly legislation, analysts told a Capitol Hill briefing yesterday.

Married parents -- especially married mothers -- have voted Republican in recent years, partly because of a perception that Democrats don't care about family issues, said Michele Stockwell, a social policy analyst with the Progressive Policy Institute.

This month's election results show that Democrats "closed this parent gap, at least temporarily," she said. But the gap needs to be closed permanently by addressing families' concerns.

Sen. Blanche Lincoln, Arkansas Democrat, told those at the briefing that Democrats are up to the task, even though they need to be "a little more expressive" about it.

"Getting results is the most important thing we can do in leadership," she said, citing employee flextime, easier access to health care, more trained health care workers in geriatrics and more Internet safety tools to protect children as important legislative goals.

Some family advocates, however, expressed dismay at the lack of attention to family issues in Democratic platforms. For instance, the House Democrats' "Six for '06" agenda laid out goals for changing Iraq policy, raising the minimum wage, making college tuition a permanent tax deduction, lowering gas prices, promoting stem-cell research and blocking partial privatization of Social Security.

But expanded paid sick leave for workers? A Democratic Senate staffer recently said an issue like that wouldn't be considered for "several years," said one audience member.

Pollster Anna Greenberg of Greenberg Quinlan Rosner told the Progressive Policy Institute event that the war in Iraq and the economy were voters' top issues, but political leaders -- especially the new Democratic majority -- shouldn't let those issues obscure the "underlying discontent" that most voters feel about their personal finances.

Polls find that "the biggest source of stress is work [and] the biggest source of stress about work is how much you make," said Ms. Greenberg, adding that both low-income and middle-income families are feeling "squeezed" as expenses outstrip incomes.

In many households, both parents are working to get ahead, but this only feeds into another huge concern, which is "not having enough time with their kids," Ms. Greenberg said.

"And this is not just the problem of married parents," she added. "This is the No. 1 concern of single parents, especially single moms. They are the least likely to feel they have control over what their kids are doing."

Democrats have a huge opportunity to act on these issues, especially by working with Republicans and finding common ground, said Shelley Waters Boots, a policy leader at the Parents Action for Children, a parents' advocacy group founded by actor-director Rob Reiner.

These "shouldn't be one-party issues," she said. "These issues are ripe for the taking."

Stan Greenberg And James Carville (CSM)

By David Cook

The Christian Science Monitor, November 16, 2006

Sweet as it was to win control of the House and the Senate in the 2006 election, some Democratic operatives think their victory could have been bigger if national party chairman Howard Dean had been willing to spend more in districts where races were close.

According to Democratic pollster Stan Greenberg, "there were two dozen seats in which Republicans got 51 percent or less....There is a very big difference between defending these seats as incumbents or still trying to pick these up while they are being protected by Republicans."

James Carville, who along with Greenberg co-founded Democracy Corps, a Democratic strategy group, told a Monitor breakfast on Wednesday, "We beat the hell out of them at the committees, at the congressional [campaign] committees. The DNC [Democratic National Committee] left the money on the table."

Carville said DNC Chairman Howard Dean should be dumped. Carville added that Dean "should be held accountable" and described his leadership as "Rumsfeldian in its competence."

Chairman Dean has been investing in a strategy of rebuilding the party in all 50 states and hiring local operatives to help with that task. DNC member Don Fowler sent fellow DNC members a message on Tuesday saying that talk of replacing Dean was "nonsense. The 50-state strategy is exactly what the Democratic Party needed and continues to need. Why do the Washington people think that they have a special prerogative to dictate what the Democratic Party needs?"

While saying he has no problem with the 50-state strategy, Carville quipped that, "the point of a political party is not to hire people, it is to elect people."

Beyond the question of party leadership, both Republicans and Democrats face dangers as they turn their attention to the 2008 presidential election. "The big Republican problem going into '08 is Bush. I mean, he is just unpopular," Carville said. "Unless he has a really good two years, which maybe he does, he is in danger of being a complete albatross on the Republican Party."

"The biggest danger for Democrats is that we do what we kind of do sometimes [and] fracture ...if it looks like we are kind of fighting and incapable and don't get anything done, that is our biggest danger," Carville said.

Flush Of Victory Past, Democrats Revert To Finger-Pointing (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney

The New York Times, November 16, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 15 — One would think that after their biggest electoral triumph in about a decade, Democrats would finally break their usual postelection syndrome — a November loss followed by recriminations, finger-pointing and infighting.

Well, think again.

The Democrats are celebrating their big victory of Nov. 7 with recriminations, finger-pointing and infighting, no matter that they won control of the Senate and the House for the first time since 1994.

State Democratic leaders are saying Howard Dean, the party chairman, is not receiving the credit he deserves for the triumph.

Offering a rather different view, two leading party strategists rebuked Mr. Dean on Wednesday, saying the Democrats could have captured 40 House seats rather than 29 had Mr. Dean bowed to demands by Representative Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, leader of the effort to recapture the House, to put more money into Congressional races.

“I would describe his leadership as Rumsfeldian in its incompetence,” one strategist, James Carville, said of Mr. Dean.

Liberal bloggers say they are not receiving the credit they deserve and are chafing at how what they call the mainstream media has showered too much credit on Mr. Emanuel and his Senate counterpart, Charles E. Schumer of New York, for the sweep.

“Rahm won everything” was the headline on a sarcastic post on MyDD, a liberal Web site.

On Capitol Hill, soon-to-be Speaker Nancy Pelosi of California has waded into a leadership fight that has divided her caucus, providing the public — in its first glimpse of the incoming Congress — with a reminder of just how much Democrats like to rumble. Democrats, if grimacing, sought to put the best face on the latest episode of that familiar Washington series, Democrats in Disarray.

“We are a diverse party,” said Donald Fowler, a veteran South Carolina Democratic leader. “We have different people from different backgrounds, and we see things differently both in terms of style and issues.”

Mr. Fowler sighed before letting out: “We’re nuts! We’re all nuts!”

Larry Gates, the Democratic chairman in Kansas, where Democrats stunned Republicans by capturing a once very-red seat, said: “This is what we Democrats do. A little bit of success, and we start to fight.”

So it was that Stan Greenberg, the Democratic pollster, and Mr. Carville used the forum of a Monitor Breakfast, a gathering of newsmakers and reporters, to say Mr. Dean wasted an opportunity to make historic gains by refusing to take resources out of his effort to build up parties in all 50 states and put them into Congressional races.

Mr. Greenberg said that Republicans held 14 seats by a single percentage point and that a small investment by Mr. Dean could have put Democrats into a commanding position for the rest of the decade.

"There was a missed opportunity here," he said. "I've sat down with Republican pollsters to discuss this race: They believe we left 10 to 20 seats on the table."

Mr. Carville, whose close ties to former President Bill Clinton and Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York have prompted speculation that he is attacking Mr. Dean on their behalf, said the Democratic National Committee had taken out a $10 million line of credit and used barely half of it.

"They left money on the table," he said.

Asked whether Mr. Dean should step down, he responded, loudly, in the affirmative. "He should be held accountable," Mr. Carville said.

In an interview later, he asked, "Do we want to go into '08 with a C minus general at the D.N.C.?"

Aides to Mr. and Mrs. Clinton said Mr. Carville had not cleared his attacks on Mr. Dean with them.

The attacks set off recriminations in Mr. Dean's base, state parties that have benefited from his decision to channel millions of dollars to them.

"Asking Dean to step down now, after last week, is equivalent to asking Eisenhower to resign after the Normandy invasion," Mr. Fowler said. "It's just nonsense.

"Carville and Greenberg — those people are my friends — they are just dead wrong. They wanted all that money to go to Washington consultants and speechwriters and pollsters. This kind of nonsense is destructive of the party."

The Democratic chairman in Michigan, Mark Brewer, said party money had allowed Michigan to re-elect its Democratic governor and senator.

"This is a zero-sum game," Mr. Brewer said. "That money would have had to come from somewhere. We should be looking forward to future endeavors, and not attacking at this moment of great triumph."

Mr. Dean was traveling and not available for comment, aides said.

At Democratic National Committee headquarters, the communications director, Karen Finney, insisted that Mr. Dean had spent money on House races through the final hours, notwithstanding his announcement in the campaign that his top priority was rebuilding state parties, even in longtime Republican states.

Ms. Finney expressed incredulity that Democrats would be going after Democrats in this of all weeks.

"Did he not see that we won?" she said of Mr. Carville. "Did he not read the results? If James and Stan are interested in knowing what the D.N.C. is doing and has done, they can pick up the telephone and give me a call."

Mr. Emanuel warred with Mr. Dean over his refusal to provide as much money as Mr. Emanuel said he needed.

He said Wednesday that a favored candidate, Tammy Duckworth, the severely injured Iraq war veteran running for an open Republican seat in Illinois, had lost because the Republicans had spent $1 million on negative advertisements against her in the final weekend and that he did not have the money to respond.

Mr. Carville and Mr. Greenberg have been close to Mr. Emanuel since they worked in the Clinton White House in 1992. Asked about the criticism of the two, Mr. Emanuel said he would offer precisely these two sentences: "More resources brings more seats into play. Full stop."

There was also some lesser blame passing. Mr. Emanuel suggested that Democrats had fallen just short of picking up the seat held by Representative Christopher Shays, Republican of Connecticut, because Senator Joseph I. Lieberman, a registered Democrat, had sought re-election on an independent line after losing the Democratic primary. That brought out more Republican votes.

Mr. Greenberg fumbled when asked in a two-part question whether he agreed with some Democrats that a botched joke by Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts and the White House attack on it might have made the difference in very close races where Democrats lost, like the effort to defeat Representative Heather A. Wilson in New Mexico.

"Bah-bah-bah-bah, let me go to the first question," Mr. Greenberg said haltingly before returning, with prompting, to the original question, allowing that the Kerry episode might have "moved the needle a little bit."

Carville Says Dems Should Dump Dean Over "Rumsfeldian" Incompetence (AAS)

By Scott Shepard

Austin American Statesman, November 16, 2006

Democratic strategist James Carville says his party should dump Howard Dean as chairman of the Democratic Party because of incompetence.

Carville, during coffee and rolls with political reporters today, said Democrats could have picked up as many as 50 House seats, instead of the nearly 30 they have so far.

The reason they didn't, he said, is the Democratic National Committee did not spend some $6 million it could have put into so-called "third tier" House races against vulnerable Republicans.

Carville said the other Democratic campaign committees had borrowed to the hilt.

He said he tried to meet with Dean to argue for additional spending for Democrats in the final days of the campaign, but Dean declined and gave no reason why.

Asked by a reporter whether Dean should be dumped, Carville replied, “In a word, do I think? Yes.”

He added, “I think he should be held accountable.” He added, “I would describe his leadership as Rumsfeldian in its competence.”

Carville likened the Democratic takeover of Congress to the civil war battle at Gettysburg, which the Union army won but failed to pursue the Confederate army when it retreated.

“We should have chased them down,” Carville said. There was no immediate response from Dean or the DNC.

GOP's Simmons Concedes Conn. House Race (AP-Y)

By Susan Haigh, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 16, 2006

More than a week after Election Day, Republican U.S. Rep. Rob Simmons conceded to Democrat Joe Courtney on Wednesday, but did not rule out running again in two years.

Simmons spoke to supporters — some tearful — who packed his headquarters Wednesday afternoon, a few hours after Secretary of the State Susan Bysiewicz confirmed that Courtney had won by 91 of nearly 250,000 votes cast.

"Unfortunately, the tide was against us," said Simmons, who sought a fourth term in what had been the nation's most heavily Democratic-leaning district represented by a Republican.

On Election Day, Courtney, who lost to Simmons in 2002, led by 167 votes. But recounts in the district's 65 towns uncovered some flaws, including a 100-vote mistake in the small town of Lebanon that lowered the margin to 66 votes at one point.

Courtney, speaking at a press conference in Washington, D.C., thanked Simmons for what he called a "gracious statement by a very tough opponent" and said he looks forward to getting started.

"I'm going to fly home without a plane, I'm so excited," he said.

The deadline to file any legal challenges is Nov. 21, but Simmons said he does not want a repeat of the unease he sensed in the district in 1994, the last time there was a recount in the 2nd District. Then-Democratic Rep. Sam Gejdenson defeated Republican Ed Munster by 21 votes in a race that dragged on for five months. Simmons first won the seat in 2000 by ousting Gejdenson.

State Republican Party Chairman George Gallo said Simmons made the right choice by not contesting the election. But he said the party was considering filing a complaint after receiving tips that a handful of college students may have voted twice. Even if proven, it did not appear the complaint would significantly change the results.

Both Courtney and Murphy are in Washington, D.C., this week for orientation. Courtney learned of the final recount results from speaker-to-be Nancy Pelosi on Tuesday night.

The recount was automatically triggered because Courtney's unofficial victory margin was less than half of 1 percent of the votes cast.

Simmons Concedes Defeat To Courtney In Connecticut 2 (CQ)

By Marie Horrigan

Congressional Quarterly, November 16, 2006

Three-term Republican Rep. Rob Simmons officially conceded the race for Connecticut’s 2nd District Wednesday afternoon, just hours after state officials announced Democrat Joe Courtney had clinched a razor-thin victory in a recanvass of the district’s vote.

“I’m disappointed by the outcome, but not by the effort,” Simmons told supporters in his Mystic, Conn., campaign headquarters Wednesday afternoon after conceding the race, the Norwich Bulletin reported.

Courtney’s victory ensures him a place in the large and historic Democratic freshman Class of 2006 — and almost certainly a place near the top of the Republican Party’s initial target list for the 2008 battle to control the House. Courtney won by just a 90-vote margin, with 121,247 votes to 121,157 votes for Simmons, according to the Connecticut Secretary of State’s office on Wednesday.

The Courtney-Simmons contest was the closest of many tight races in a midterm election cycle that boosted Democrats to control of both chambers of Congress. Many of the Democratic takeovers came in districts held by moderate Republicans such as Simmons; a similarly positioned Connecticut Republican, 12-term incumbent Nancy L. Johnson, was unseated in the 5th District by Democratic state Sen. Chris Murphy.

Courtney had declared victory on Election Night, when returns indicated he led Simmons by 167 votes. He has been in Washington this week, attending freshman orientation.

The narrow victory margin, less than one-half of one percent of the vote, triggered an automatic recount that began Nov. 8 and wrapped up Tuesday night.

This was the second face-off between Simmons and Courtney. Simmons won his second term in 2002 with an 8 percentage-point edge, 54 percent to 46 percent, over Courtney.

Voter turnout was higher this year than four years ago: 242,000 people cast a ballot in the 2006 rematch, versus 217,000 in the candidates' first showdown.

One difference this election cycle was the the difficult national political atmosphere for Republicans, with voters expressing disapproval of congressional scandals, the war in Iraq and President Bush.

Democrats, including Courtney, argued that while their Republican opponents — particularly centrists like Simmons — might not be directly responsible for ethical scandals and troubles in Iraq, their re-elections would effectively endorse Bush's conduct and empower Republicans to continue to pursue their agenda.

In a statement Tuesday night, Courtney announced the recanvass had confirmed his victory and said he would focus on demanding accountability from the White House on the Iraq war, as well as improving the prescription drug benefit program provided to seniors through Medicare.

Connecticut's 2nd District also hosted an extremely tight race during the last election that saw both chambers of Congress change hands — the 1994 Republican landslide. That year, however, the incumbent prevailed: Democrat Sam Gejdenson defeated his Republican opponent by 21 votes.

2 Incumbent Dems Keep House Seats In Ga. (AP-Y)

By Shannon Mccaffrey, Associated Press Writer

Reps. John Barrow and Jim Marshall were certified the winners of their respective races Wednesday, all but ending GOP hopes of knocking off at least one Democratic incumbent in the Nov. 7 congressional races.

Barrow defeated Republican Max Burns in eastern Georgia's 12th District by just 864 votes out of 142,438 cast, according to the final tallies released by Secretary of State Cathy Cox. In middle Georgia's 8th District, Marshall defeated Republican Mac Collins by 1,752 votes out of 159,568 cast.

Both GOP challengers are former congressmen who had been considered among Republicans' best chances to counter what became a Democratic landslide last week.

Neither had conceded defeat as of Wednesday afternoon, but only Burns could demand a recount because he lost by less than 1 percent of the vote. He has two business days to do so, under state law.

"As of right this second, we do not know if we're going to ask for a recount or not," Burns' campaign manager, Tim Baker, said Wednesday.

Barrow and Marshall had previously claimed victory, and political experts said that in the age of electronic voting, it would be unlikely for a recount to alter the result.

Two Democrats Win In Georgia (NYT)

By Shaila Dewan

The New York Times, November 16, 2006

ATLANTA, Nov. 15 — Georgia officials certified the votes on Wednesday in two extremely close Congressional races, putting the Democratic incumbents, Jim Marshall of Macon and John Barrow of Savannah, officially in the winners' column.

Neither of the Republican challengers had conceded, and Mr. Barrow, who won by 864 votes, could face a recount if his opponent, Max Burns, requests one. Georgia law allows a recount if the margin of victory is less than 1 percent of the votes cast.

Mr. Marshall won his race against his Republican challenger, Mac Collins, by more than 1 percent, 1,752 votes. "I know who each and every one of them are, and I've sent them all cards," said his spokesman, Doug Moore.

The incumbents, the only white Democrats in the Georgia delegation, faced an uphill battle because their districts had been redrawn to include more Republicans and their challengers were former congressmen. Democratic turnout in the state was low, and President Bush campaigned twice in each district for the challengers.

Tim Baker, Mr. Burns's campaign manager, said the campaign would announce on Thursday whether a recount would be requested.

Grading The Pollsters (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 16, 2006

Political polling has come a long way since "Dewey Defeats Truman."

Pollsters earned high marks in last week's elections: Surveys correctly predicted that the Democrats would win control of the House of Representatives, that the Senate would be closely contested and that Democratic gubernatorial candidates would sweep into statehouses.

That doesn't mean that some pollsters didn't do better than others, however, and firms haven't hesitated to trumpet their results. "Rasmussen Reports is the winner in polling accuracy!" read a news release from the Asbury Park, N.J., polling firm. The headline from a Zogby International release1 said the Utica, N.Y., pollster batted "10 for 10" in its telephone polls of competitive Senate races, and asserted the results from its online polls showed its "interactive polling model shines."

I crunched the results from pollsters on dozens of races, and found that some did indeed appear to be more accurate than others. I'll share my results later in the column, but before I do, I want to explain why I'm more reluctant to crown a winner than some of the polling firms were in their PR. The science of evaluating polls remains very much a work in progress.

"A small cottage industry has looked at these issues, but not a large number of people have bothered with it," said Charles Franklin, a professor of political science at the University of Wisconsin who blogs about polls at Political Arithmetik2.

Until recently, measuring poll accuracy was time consuming, and analyses often followed long after the election. Jay H. Leve, founder and chief executive of Verona, N.J.-based SurveyUSA -- one of the companies I evaluated -- said it took seven employees of his firm a full month to analyze the 2004 polls.

But two months ago, the Web site Pollster.com5 launched, compiling public reports from several polling firms. Some individual firms have also been quicker to post their own results on their Web sites.

While data are now easier to obtain, there remains disagreement about how to calculate accuracy. Is picking the winner enough? Most experts agree it isn't, and focus instead on measuring how close the predictions were to the actual spread -- the difference in percentage points between the two candidates. But what if a poll accurately predicts an election will be decided within a one-percentage-point margin, but incorrectly identified the victor?

Today's preferred methods haven't changed much since political polling's nadir, in 1948, when erroneous pre-election surveys were relied on by the credulous press to predict a victory for Republican Thomas Dewey over Harry Truman. In one of its editions printed on election night, the Chicago Daily Tribune ran the infamous headline, "Dewey Defeats Truman."6

To assess what went wrong and to regain credibility, the nonprofit Social Science Research Council7 outlined ways to measure poll accuracy. Among eight methods the researchers considered, they chose to measure the difference between the predicted percentage vote for the leading candidate, and the actual share for that candidate. However, this method doesn't spot big errors in predicted victory margins, and can be skewed by independent candidates. As it happens, in 1948, Strom Thurmond and Henry Wallace influenced both the polls and President Truman's victory.

More recently, a study8 of 2002 polls by Prof. Franklin showed that the holder of a five-point lead in a poll won only 60% to 65% of the time, and polls showing the leader ahead by 10 points or more were dead wrong 10% of the time.

Pollsters expected a rout by incumbent Bill Clinton in the 1996 presidential election, but he beat Republican Bob Dole by just 8.5 percentage points in the popular vote. Political scientist Everett Carll Ladd Jr. criticized the polls in the press, calling them worse than the 1948 fiasco, and prompting veteran pollster Warren Mitofsky to analyze the results.

Mr. Mitofsky found that "no standard metric for gauging poll accuracy had been adopted by the polling community." So he went back to the SSRC's work after the 1948 election, and found another method he preferred: comparing the predicted victory margin to the actual margin, or the error on the margin. If a poll finds Candidate A ahead by three points and he wins by 10 points, that's an error on the margin of seven points. If Candidate B wins by five points, that's an error of eight points. There's no penalty for picking the wrong winner; pollsters are graded only on their error margin. (Mr. Mitofsky, a pioneer of exit polling and a helpful source for my Numbers Guy columns, died Sept. 1 at age 71. He was remembered online by several9 polling10 organizations11.)

I opted to use Mr. Mitofsky's method in my own number crunching. I looked at five pollsters that were among the most prolific: Rasmussen, SurveyUSA, Zogby (which releases separate telephone and online polls) and Washington, D.C.-based Mason-Dixon. For all but the latter, I used the numbers posted on the organizations' own Web sites. For Mason-Dixon, which keeps some of its poll data behind a subscriber wall, I used Pollster.com to find polls from the two weeks before the election. I checked the results against vote counts as of this Tuesday.

(I chose the firms because they were active in many statewide elections. More familiar names such as Gallup and CBS News/New York Times polled in fewer races, focusing more on national attitudes such as approval ratings for Congress.)

There were some interesting trends: Phone polls tended to be better than online surveys, and companies that used recorded voices rather than live humans in their surveys were standouts. Nearly everyone had some big misses, though, such as predicting that races would be too close to call when in fact they were won by healthy margins. Also, I found that being loyal to a particular polling outfit may not be wise. Taking an average of the five most recent polls for a given state, regardless of the author -- a measure compiled by Pollster.com -- yielded a higher accuracy rate than most individual pollsters.

On to the results: In the Senate races, the average error on the margin of victory was tightly bunched for all the phone polls. Rasmussen (25 races) and Mason-Dixon (15) each were off by an average of fewer than four points on the margin. Zogby's phone polls (10) and SurveyUSA (18) each missed by slightly more than four points. Just four of the 68 phone polls missed by 10 points or more, with the widest miss at 18 points.

But the performance of Zogby Interactive, the unit that conducts surveys online, demonstrates the dubious value of judging polls only by whether they pick winners correctly. As Zogby noted in a press release, its online polls identified 18 of 19 Senate winners correctly. But its predictions missed by an average of 8.6 percentage points in those polls -- at least twice the average miss of four other polling operations I examined. Zogby predicted a nine-point win for Democrat Herb Kohl in Wisconsin; he won by 37 points. Democrat Maria Cantwell was expected to win by four points in Washington; she won by 17. (Zogby cooperated with WSJ.com on an online polling project that tracked some Senate and gubernatorial races.)

The picture was similar in the gubernatorial races (where Zogby polled only online, not by phone). Mason-Dixon's average error was under 3.4 points in 14 races. Rasmussen missed by an average of 3.8 points in 30 races; SurveyUSA was off by 4.4 points, on average, in 18 races. But Zogby's online poll missed by an average of 8.3 points, erring on six races by more than 15 points.

Zogby's online polls "just blew it" in Colorado and Arkansas governor races, Chief Executive John Zogby told me. (See Zogby's scorecard.12) In other races, such as the two Senate races I mentioned, "we had the right direction but a closer race than the final." One explanation, he said, may be that Zogby's final online polls collected responses one to two weeks before the election, whereas other polling firms were active until the final week. "We have more work to do" to improve online polling, Mr. Zogby said, but he added, "we believe it's not only the wave of the future, but the future is very close to now."

"I don't think there's anyone out there who did better than us," Rasmussen Reports President Scott Rasmussen told me. (Read its own scorecard for its Senate13 and gubernatorial14 polls.)

Larry Harris, a principal with Mason-Dixon, said of his firm's numbers: "We had another good year."

Meanwhile, SurveyUSA has posted a detailed scorecard15 on its Web site, listing how its results compared with those of competitors in different states. "We won't be satisfied until we have an error of zero across our entire body of work," Mr. Leve said. "We're obviously proud of what we did. But I don't think any pollster whose error is greater than zero should be bragging, and we're not."

Remember, my analysis didn't penalize pollsters for picking the wrong winner, which happened nine times, though that's something that other evaluators might take into account. I ignored it partly because some races were decided by a few points or less -- a gap smaller than the statistical margin of error on these polls. For example, Rasmussen's final poll in the Minnesota governor's election showed Democrat Mike Hatch leading Republican incumbent Tim Pawlenty by two points. Mr. Pawlenty won by one point. Rasmussen also missed the Missouri Senate race by a small margin, with the loser, Republican Jim Talent, leading by one point in its final poll. * * *

Putting Faith Before Politics (NYT)

By David Kuo

SINCE 1992, every national Republican electoral defeat has been accompanied by an obituary for the religious right. Every one of these obituaries has been premature — after these losses, the religious right only grew stronger. After the defeat of President George H. W. Bush in 1992, the conventional wisdom held that Christian evangelicals would be chastened. As one major magazine put it, Mr. Bush's defeat meant that "time had run out on their crusade to create a Christian America." Yet in the next two years, the Christian Coalition grew by leaps and bounds; in 1994, it helped usher in the Gingrich revolution.

In 1996, after Bill Clinton defeated Bob Dole, Margaret Tutwiler, a Republican strategist, declared that in order for Republicans to win, "We're going to have to take on the religious nuts." Two years later, after Republicans failed to gain any ground on Democrats — despite Mr. Clinton's impeachment — John Zogby, the pollster, concluded that "Christian absolutism" scared voters. Wrong again. Those same Christian "absolutists" helped sweep George W. Bush into office in 2000.

Jesus was resurrected only once. The religious right has been resurrected at least twice in just the past 15 years.

The conventional wisdom about the Democratic thumping of Republicans last week says something a little different about the religious right — that its members are beginning to migrate to the Democratic Party. The statistic that is exciting Democrats the most is that nearly 30 percent of white evangelicals, the true Republican base, voted Democratic. In addition, the red-blue split of weekly churchgoers has narrowed. Commentators are atwitter about the shrinking "God gap."

Once again, the conventional wisdom is wrong. Yes, it is true that almost 30 percent of white evangelicals voted for the Democrats, up from the 22 percent Senator John Kerry received in the 2004 presidential race. But that 2004 number was aberrantly low. More typical were exit polls from the 1996 Congressional election, where 25 percent of white evangelicals voted for Democrats.

So before rearranging their public policy agenda in hopes of attracting evangelicals, the Democrats would be wise to think twice. There has been a radical change in the attitudes of evangelicals — it's just not one that will automatically be in the Democrats' favor.

You see, evangelicals aren't re-examining their political priorities nearly as much as they are re-examining their spiritual priorities. That could be bad news for both political parties.

John W. Whitehead of the Rutherford Institute, the conservative Christian organization that gained notoriety during the 1990s when it represented Paula Jones in her sexual harassment suit against Bill Clinton, wrote this after the elections: "Modern Christianity, having lost sight of Christ's teachings, has been co-opted by legalism, materialism and politics. Simply put, it has lost its spirituality."

He went on, "Whereas Christianity was once synonymous with charity, compassion and love for one's neighbor, today it is more often equated with partisan politics, anti-homosexual rhetoric and affluent mega-churches."

Mr. Whitehead is hardly alone. Just before the elections, Gordon MacDonald, an evangelical leader, wrote that he was concerned that some evangelical personalities had been seduced and used by the White House. He worried that the movement might "fragment because it is more identified by a political agenda that seems to be failing and less identified by a commitment to Jesus and his kingdom."

Certainly, the White House showed the heartlessness of politics in Ted Haggard's fall. Mr. Haggard had once been welcomed at the White House, relied on to rally other evangelicals and invited to pray with the president.

Yet his downfall provoked only this reaction from a low-level White House spokesman: "He had been on a couple of calls, but was not a weekly participant in those calls. I believe he's been to the White House one or two times." To evangelicals who know that this statement was misleading, and know from the Bible what being kicked to the curb looks like, it was a revealing moment about the unchristian behavior politics inspires.

Perhaps that's why a rift appears to be growing in what was once a strong alliance. Beliefnet.com's post-election online survey of more than 2,000 people revealed that nearly 40 percent of evangelicals support the idea of a two-year Christian "fast" from intense political activism. Instead of directing their energies toward campaigns, evangelicals would spend their time helping the poor.

Why might such an idea get traction among evangelicals? For practical reasons as well as spiritual ones. Evangelicals are beginning to see the effect of their political involvement on those with whom they hope to share Jesus' eternal message: non-evangelicals. Tellingly, Beliefnet's poll showed that nearly 60 percent of non-evangelicals have a more negative view of Jesus because of Christian political involvement; almost 40 percent believe that George W. Bush's faith has had a negative impact on his presidency.

There is also the matter of the record, which I saw being shaped during my time in the White House. Conservative Christians (like me) were promised that having an evangelical like Mr. Bush in office was a dream come true. Well, it wasn't. Not by a long shot. The administration accomplished little that evangelicals really cared about.

Nowhere was this clearer than on the issue of abortion. Despite strong Republican majorities, and his own pro-life stands, Mr. Bush settled for the largely symbolic partial-birth abortion restriction rather than pursuing more substantial change. Then there were the forgotten commitments to give faith-based charities the resources they needed to care for the poor. Evangelicals are not likely to fall for such promises in the future.

Don't expect conservative Christians in politics to start to disappear, of course. There are those who find the moral force of issues like abortion and gay marriage equal to that of the abolition of slavery — worth pursuing no matter what the risks of politics are for the soul. But the advocates working these special interests may, I think, be far fewer in coming years than in years past. Gay marriage was a less mobilizing force in 2006 than it was in 2004. In Arizona the ballot measure to outlaw it was defeated. The South Dakota abortion ban failed.

We will have to wait until 2008 to see just how deep this evangelical spiritual re-examination goes, and how seductive politics will continue to be to committed Christians. Meanwhile, evangelicals aren't flocking to the Democratic Party. If anything, they are becoming more truly conservative in their recognition of the negative spiritual consequences of political obsession and of the limitations of government power.

C. S. Lewis once warned that any Christian who uses his faith as a means to a political end would corrupt both his faith and the faith writ large. A lot of Christians are reading C. S. Lewis these days.

Alabama Lazarus Act (WSJ)

By Quin Hillyer

The Wall Street Journal, November 16, 2006

BIRMINGHAM, Ala. -- In Birmingham they love the governor. And in Mobile and Huntsville, too.

As Republicans coast to coast were burying their many political dead, a Republican governor once given up for dead was enjoying a landslide victory. Alabama Gov. Bob Riley was re-elected last week, beating long-popular Lt. Gov. Lucy Baxley with more than 58% of the vote, including an impressive 20% of the black vote. His victory was not simply the result of Alabama being a Republican state: Democrats won the two next most prominent statewide races, those for lieutenant governor and Supreme Court chief justice. In Alabama as elsewhere, this was a Democratic year -- with the notable exception of Mr. Riley, a conservative reformer in cowboy boots, with a cheerful, Reagan-like demeanor.

Three years ago, few observers believed that he could ever win again. A businessman who began his post-college career by selling eggs door-to-door (literally), later to sell his hens and build a business of car dealerships and a trucking company, Mr. Riley was a relatively obscure three-term congressman when he ran for governor in 2002. In that race, he barely squeaked past scandal-plagued Democratic incumbent Don Siegelman by a lawsuit-challenged 3,120 votes.

During his first year in office, Mr. Riley pushed an ambitious, complicated tax-reform proposal that was part of a multiyear plan to shift revenues to under-funded departments such as law enforcement while relieving the tax burden on low-income workers. Derided (a bit misleadingly) by opponents as a huge tax increase -- although far more people would have enjoyed a tax cut than endured a tax hike under the proposal -- the initiative was destroyed in a statewide referendum, receiving only 32.5% of the vote. Pundits immediately pronounced the governor a total goner.

How, then, did Mr. Riley recover from such political disaster to win re-election so resoundingly? Not just Mr. Riley but editorial writers across the state will readily identify his successes in the "Three Es": economic development, education and, not least, ethics. Consider the statistics: An unemployment rate that dropped to an astonishingly low (especially for Alabama) 3.3% from 5.3%; school test scores rising, especially in reading proficiency in at-risk schools blessed with the Riley-backed (and nationally copied) Alabama Reading Initiative; and public standards of ethics combined with radically open government records, along with measurable performance standards imposed on every department of state government.

These accomplishments stand in marked contrast to the record of Mr. Siegelman, who presided over a budget crisis and now stands convicted of bribery and other infractions.

In his Birmingham hotel suite an hour before the polls closed Nov. 7, during a lengthy conversation sandwiched around a friendly phone call from Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, Mr. Riley explained with great depth and detail -- not to mention a guileless enthusiasm -- how it was that his administration so impressed the voters.

"I think people appreciated that after [the tax reform initiative] failed, we turned around and did exactly what the people told us to do. We cut half a billion dollars out of [an already tight] budget . . . We put a new economic model together for Alabama, and it has been remarkably successful . . . We found a way to cut taxes anyway [chiefly by raising the earnings threshold below which workers pay no income tax], and we got really good grades when the hurricanes came through."

Alabama has been ravaged by three hurricanes during Mr. Riley's tenure, and the state's response each time was a model of effectiveness. Listen to Howard Shell, since 1986 the mayor of Atmore (pop. 8,000): "Ivan and Dennis both hit us hard. . . . For the city of Atmore, Gov. Riley was really responsive when we really needed it. Just one phone call to him, and he began to make things happen. He got us extra law enforcement right away, he got forestry experts , he got all the state agencies to help in every way. . . . He's one of the most proactive governors we have had, the best we've had since I've been here."

Mr. Riley's particular genius, meanwhile, has been evident in his efforts at business development. He consolidated nine different state agencies charged with economic development into just one, hired top-notch administrators and used federal grants more wisely by paying attention to small details such as re-routing small roads, building water tanks and improving the state's job-training agencies so that they provide what he calls "job-specific, product-specific, even company-specific training."

For four years running, Southern Business and Development Magazine has named Alabama its "state of the year." Site Selection magazine ranked the Alabama Development Office as the top such agency in the nation. And even in the state's rural, long-impoverished "Black Belt" (so named for the color of its loamy soil), unemployment has dropped to 7.7% from many years in the double digits, largely due to initiatives by the Riley-created Black Belt Action Commission.

Elsewhere, Mayor Harold Crouch of Chatom (pop. 1,204), a self-described political ticket-splitter, tells of how Mr. Riley has made the state capitol "acceptable to rural Alabama again." Just by helping with infrastructure such as water service and a little paving and earth-moving, Mr. Riley's team made it possible for Chatom to land a plant of A.C. Manufacturing, a garment company, with 152 jobs. "It would not have occurred if the governor had not personally stepped in to help," Mr. Crouch said.

Thus did Mr. Riley run for re-election as a genial, tax-cutting, budget-cutting, crisis-handling, job-creating, education-boosting, utterly scandal-free reformer. Every major newspaper in the state -- conservative, moderate and liberal alike -- endorsed him for another term. Interesting how that works.

In his victory speech on election night, Bob Riley put himself on the line by urging the people of the state to "demand a higher level of excellence from state government than you have ever demanded before." Judging from the election results, Alabamians think that type of excellence already is housed in their governor's mansion.

McCain Committee Lays Groundwork For '08 Bid (USAT)

By Jill Lawrence

WASHINGTON — Arizona Sen. John McCain, a leading White House prospect, today is forming a presidential exploratory committee in order to start amassing money for the 2008 Republican nomination contest.

The committee, to be registered with the Federal Election Commission, will allow McCain to promote a potential candidacy before he officially enters the race. He says he'll make a final decision with his family over the Christmas holidays.

McCain, 70, was a prisoner of war in Vietnam. He showed appeal to moderates and independents in his bid for the 2000 GOP nomination against George W. Bush.

Since then, McCain has made overtures to conservatives and built a national network of activists and fundraisers. He appeared at 346 events and raised $10.5 million for GOP candidates this year.

McCain's new committee will file quarterly reports to the FEC. It already has a website — www.exploremccain.com — that will do a live webcast of a major speech McCain is giving today to GOPAC, a group that fosters Republican candidates at the state and local level.

“We are not under the radar,” said Rick Davis, director of the committee. “We wanted to get people paying attention to the speech.”

Asked to choose a presidential nominee in a USA TODAY/Gallup Poll in the past week, 26% of Republicans and independents who lean toward the GOP picked McCain. Former New York mayor Rudy Giuliani, who formed an exploratory committee last week, was first at 28%.

Another Republican, former Wisconsin governor Tommy Thompson, said he will create an exploratory committee after Jan. 1, the Associated Press reported Wednesday. Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack, a Democrat, has done so already.

New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton leads potential Democratic nominees in polls. Among Democrats and independents who lean toward the Democrats surveyed, 31% supported Clinton.

If Clinton runs, she would start with millions of dollars left from her Senate race this year. McCain could put about $1 million toward a bid.

Primaries begin in January 2008, so candidates must raise most of their money in 2007. They can get federal help if they limit primary-season spending, but major candidates ignored the limits in 2004. Bush raised about $270 million before he was nominated; Democrat John Kerry raised $235 million.

McCain Takes Step Toward White House Bid (AP-Y)

Republican Sen. John McCain will file paperwork with the Federal Election Commission on Thursday to create a presidential exploratory committee, his aides said Wednesday.

The Arizona senator also launched a Web site — http://www.exploremccain.com — that allows supporters to donate and join his effort. His speech before the conservative group GOPAC on Thursday will be broadcast on the site.

The move was expected — the senator discussed it Sunday on national television. McCain insists he won't make a final decision about running for president until after the Christmas holidays.

McCain, a former Navy pilot who was a prisoner of war in Vietnam, ran for president against George W. Bush in 2000 and lost in a bitter two-way race.

If McCain were to run again, he would turn 72 on Aug. 29, 2008, at the height of the campaign. Only President Reagan was older — 73 at the start of his second term.

McCain Moves Toward '08 Presidential Run (LAT)

By Janet Hook

The Los Angeles Times, November 16, 2006

WASHINGTON — Striding through the wreckage of the midterm election, Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) will take a major step today toward a 2008 presidential bid by announcing he has established a committee to formally explore a campaign and making two major speeches laying out his vision for the future of the GOP.

McCain has been considered the front-runner for the Republican nomination in a field that changed rapidly after the tumultuous midterms.

In response to the party's big losses, McCain has been moving to make a fresh appeal to the surly voters who helped end GOP control of the House and the Senate — Republicans and independents angry about government corruption and excessive spending.

That anger contributed to Democratic gains in 2006, but it may open a political opportunity for McCain in 2008 by highlighting concerns about lax ethics and pork-barrel spending — his signature issues.

"For years he's been on a one-man crusade against wasteful spending in Washington," says a biography of McCain on http://www.exploremccain.com , the website launched Wednesday by his exploratory committee. "Because of his crackdown on waste in government, he's been nicknamed 'The Sheriff.' "

But the midterms underscore a growing risk for McCain on another front: Polls show that a majority of voters disapprove of the war in Iraq and want at least some troops withdrawn, and McCain is almost alone in calling for a larger deployment. He reinforced that position Wednesday when, at a Senate hearing, he upbraided military leaders for not calling for more troops.

"I'm of course disappointed that basically you're advocating the status quo here today, which I think the American people in the last election said … is not an acceptable condition," he said.

Other potential White House contenders are jockeying for position as well. On Wednesday, former Wisconsin Gov. Tommy G. Thompson, secretary of Health and Human Services in President Bush's first term, said he intended to form a presidential exploratory committee.

Earlier this week, former New York Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani also took a step in that direction. Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney is courting evangelical Republicans. Rep. Duncan Hunter (R-El Cajon) has announced a longshot White House bid.

But allies of McCain, whose maverick streak is thought to have cross-party appeal, say he is in the best position to thrive in the aftermath of election results that illustrated the GOP's weakness among independents.

"John is probably emboldened to run for president because our party is adrift in areas where I think he has a lot to offer," said Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.), a McCain ally.

McCain has said he will make no decision about running until he and his family discuss it over the Christmas holiday. But rarely does a person set up an exploratory committee and decide not to run. Having such a committee allows potential candidates to raise money and begin establishing a political organization while they are testing the waters for a formal run.

McCain's speech today to GOPAC, a conservative political group, is intended as his first broad assessment of the state of the GOP and how he would lead it. A source familiar with the speech said McCain aspired to fill the post-midterm political vacuum in the same way Ronald Reagan did in a fabled speech after the GOP lost the White House in 1976.

McCain has been arguing that Republicans lost ground this year because the party strayed from its conservative principles of fiscal restraint and political reform with a spate of scandals, the creation of expensive programs like the Medicare drug benefit and the proliferation of pork-barrel spending.

"We Republicans have lost our way," McCain has said. "We came to Washington to change government, and government changed us."

McCain also will speak today to the Federalist Society, an organization of conservative lawyers that has been at the heart of bitter Senate debates over confirmation of Bush's judicial nominees. That faction of the party was furious with McCain and others in a bipartisan group of senators, nicknamed the Gang of 14, who last year blocked a bid by GOP leaders to deny Democrats the right to filibuster judicial nominations.

Conservative lawyers aren't the only ones in the GOP base who view McCain with suspicion. He alienated social conservatives with a 2000 speech harshly critical of the influence of evangelical leaders in the GOP. His support for giving illegal immigrants a path to citizenship, his concern about global warming and his opposition to Bush's tax cuts have earned him ire from many on the right.

On the war, McCain risks alienating another constituency — the majority of Americans who said in exit polls that they wanted U.S. troop strength in Iraq reduced. McCain has been one of Bush's most stalwart supporters of the mission in Iraq, although he has been critical of the way the administration has prosecuted the war.

He has argued that ending instability in Iraq requires a larger U.S. military presence. His advisors contend that whatever political risk McCain runs by taking that position, he would take a bigger risk of looking like a political opportunist if he reversed field and called for withdrawal.

"It's classic McCain," said Mark McKinnon, one of his advisors. "He's always willing to do the unpopular thing. Even people who disagree with him about the troops will feel, 'At least he's being straight with us.' "

But his critics say that because voters' emotions about Iraq run so deep, his views on the war will probably undercut his appeal to independents.

"Independents are concerned and angry about the war in Iraq, and John McCain has consistently said that we should stay the course," said Stacie Paxton, a spokeswoman for the Democratic National Committee. "If John McCain's political strategy is to appeal to independents, his position on the Iraq war is a serious problem for him."

Ex-Bush Aide To Explore Presidential Run (AP-Y)

By Mike Glover, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 16, 2006

Former Wisconsin Gov. Tommy Thompson, who served as Health and Human Services Secretary in President Bush's first term, said Wednesday he intends to form a committee to explore a possible run for the White House in 2008.

"I intend to do so after the first of the year," the Republican said in reference to establishing an exploratory committee.

Thompson made the comments in Iowa, where he met with about 100 members of a group called Iowans for Wellness and Prevention. The state holds the first votes of the presidential nominating process.

Thompson, who will turn 65 on Sunday, spent nearly four decades in politics and government, including 14 years as governor. He resigned as HHS secretary in December 2004 shortly after Bush won a second term. His tenure at HHS was marked by anthrax attacks, a flu vaccine shortage and passage of the Medicare prescription law.

"We touched the third rail of politics and delivered on our promise to modernize Medicare with prescription drug coverage," Thompson said.

During his stop in Iowa, Thompson argued that his background as a Midwest governor and HHS secretary would appeal to voters.

"The three big issues in 2008 are going to be health, energy independence and the war in Iraq," he said.

Thompson faces a daunting task in what's expected to be a crowded field of Republican presidential candidates. Front-runner Sen. John McCain planned to file the paperwork for an exploratory committee on Thursday and former New York City mayor Rudy Giuliani recently took the first step in his bid.

Other potential candidates include Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, Tennessee Sen. Bill Frist, Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee and New York Gov. George Pataki. California Rep. Duncan Hunter also has announced a presidential bid.

Thompson said more than 90 percent of spending on health care — roughly 16 percent of the gross national product — is for treating disease, while only about 8 percent is spent on prevention.

"To me that's just backwards," he said. "I want to try and transpose that."

Thompson had been the state's longest-serving governor when Bush named him to lead the department. He made his mark as governor by pushing for an overhaul of Wisconsin welfare laws, well before Congress and President Clinton took up the issue on the national level.

But a month after the Sept. 11 attacks, the nation faced its first case of bioterrorism in the form of anthrax attacks against government and media targets in Washington, Florida and New York.

Thompson generally escaped criticism, but lawmakers complained that the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention reacted slowly to the crisis.

In 2004, similar criticism was leveled at the Food and Drug Administration for its reaction to the loss of half the U.S. supply of flu vaccine because of contamination at a manufacturing plant in England.

The FDA also has come under fire for its handling of safety concerns about Merck & Co.'s Vioxx painkiller.

Thompson, meanwhile, was a key player in President Bush's AIDS initiative, a commitment of $15 billion over 5 years for treatment and prevention of the scourge overseas.

He traveled frequently to Africa. Thompson also used his AIDS role to trumpet his idea of medical diplomacy, investing in health care and medical facilities around the world.

Born in Elroy, Wis., Thompson prided himself on his small-town roots as he won an unprecedented four terms as Wisconsin's governor. His father was a grocer. Thompson introduced himself to voters during his first gubernatorial campaign in 1986 as a proud son of Elroy — "located between Kendall and Union Center, north of Wonewoc and south of Hustler."

During his tenure, Thompson pushed the Milwaukee School Choice program, in which religious and private schools received up to $5,000 per pupil from the state to cover tuition for low-income Milwaukee students who otherwise would attend public schools.

Thompson occasionally flirted with the idea of going to Washington. He ran for Congress in 1979 but lost in the Republican primary and considered briefly running for president in 2000 but dropped the idea, saying he didn't have the necessary financial backing or support.

Analysis: Clinton Undecided On '08 Run (AP-Y)

By Beth Fouhy, Associated Press Writer

Democratic Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton's professed indecision about a presidential bid seems a bit disingenuous. After all, she has millions in the bank, a national network of supporters and an unrivaled team of political strategists. Not to be trumped by other potential candidates/authors, the former first lady plans to rerelease her best-selling book, "It Takes a Village."

Fresh off her landslide Senate re-election victory, the New York lawmaker has been inundated with questions about her political future. Although polls show her the front-runner for her party's 2008 presidential nomination, Clinton insists she's just starting the process of making a final decision.

"I will look at the possibilities, but I ... haven't really had the time to talk to people about it," Clinton said in New York earlier this week — the latest non-answer to the question that's dogged her incessantly since the midterm elections.

Clinton is under less pressure to disclose her intentions early thanks to money and her standing in several polls that put her ahead. An Associated Press-AOL News poll in late October found that, among registered Democrats, she essentially was tied with Illinois Sen. Barack Obama as the person they would most like to see elected president in 2008. The other White House hopefuls were in single digits.

Among registered black Democrats, she led Obama 29 percent to 10 percent on the same question in an AP-AOL Black Voices poll.

She has as much as $13 million remaining from her Senate run that can be used in a presidential bid, far more than lesser known candidates such as Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack, who recently formed a campaign committee.

Advisers also insist it's Clinton's nature to deliberate, reaching out to activists, donors and operatives — particularly in states with key early contests such as Iowa and New Hampshire — before reaching a final decision.

As a roadmap, they point to her decision to run for the Senate in New York in 2000, when she was still first lady. Then, she spent months seeking counsel from numerous friends and advisers and went on a "listening tour" of the state.

Clinton's inner circle continues to operate in a virtual cone of silence, divulging little information and letting no stray words escape that could be seized upon or misinterpreted. Among those most knowledgeable about her plans are longtime political director, Patti Solis Doyle; communications director Howard Wolfson; strategist Ann Lewis; pollster Mark Penn, media adviser Mandy Grunwald; and former Democratic National Committee chairman Terry McAuliffe.

"The people who know what's going on aren't saying anything, and the ones who are talking don't know what's going on," said Jay Carson, a spokesman for another confidante — former President Clinton.

While Bill Clinton has been one of the biggest boosters of his wife's presumed presidential ambitions, even he has said publicly — as recently as last weekend — that he doesn't know what her final decision will be. He leaves shortly after Thanksgiving for a two-week tour of Asia on behalf of his foundation, suggesting a major announcement about Sen. Clinton's political future won't come anytime soon.

"Senator Clinton made it clear that she will begin focusing on this decision after the election, and she will," Wolfson said.

In the coming weeks, Hillary Clinton's best-selling book on raising children, "It Takes a Village," will be rereleased by Simon and Schuster. She has penned a new introduction describing how the "village" has changed in the 10 years since the book was first published. An audio version, with Clinton reading the book, also will be released.

In 1996, the book sold 700,000 copies and a year later, Clinton captured a Grammy award for her audio version.

This time, she will be competing with Obama's "The Audacity of Hope: Thoughts on Reclaiming the American Dream," which recently vaulted to No. 1 on The New York Times best-seller list. John Edwards, the 2004 Democratic vice presidential nominee, has embarked on a book tour to promote "Home: The Blueprints of Our Lives," a coffee-table collection of mini-memoirs that he edited.

One factor influencing Clinton as she contemplates a presidential bid is the shift of power on Capitol Hill. Not only is Clinton poised to be part of a new Democratic majority, she likely will chair the Environment and Public Works Subcommittee on Fisheries, Wildlife and Water. The job will give her a platform on environmental issues, which former vice president Al Gore has largely claimed.

One New York Democrat familiar with Clinton's thinking said people have underestimated her desire to be a senator and the impact of the newfound majority status. Those factors may work against a presidential bid.

Still, many skeptics laugh off any suggestion Clinton might not run.

Dick Morris, a longtime political strategist for both Clintons who has become a vehement critic in recent years, said she has made a pretense of indecision because she didn't want to risk her re-election to the Senate. He calls her current process of deliberation "a charade."

Morris puts it this way: "If I were still an adviser of hers, and I called her up and said 'Hillary, I think you should run for president in 2008,' I would be laughed off the phone. It would be like saying, 'I think you should breathe.'"

Political Lessons (WP)

THERE ARE lessons for both political parties in the conduct and outcome of the U.S. Senate race in Maryland this year. Republicans, whose Senate candidate was an African American man, discovered that identity politics and fraudulent campaign literature are not enough to drive African American voters into jettisoning their loyalty to the Democratic Party en masse. Democrats, who nominated white candidates for the Senate and every other marquee statewide race, were put on notice not to take their indispensable core constituency, African Americans, for granted. Both parties might profit from treating black voters, who account for between 20 and 25 percent of the state's electorate, with more respect.

In nominating Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele to run for the Senate, the Republicans clearly hoped that his race would win black votes. Mr. Steele campaigned heavily in Prince George's County, where he lives, trying to drive a wedge between the county's largely black voting population and the Democratic Party. But his appeal was dimmed by his insistent fuzziness on matters of substance, coupled with an economic platform based on tax giveaways to the rich. At the same time, he used a sleek, gimmicky advertising campaign that sought to substitute personality for policy. It didn't work. Just 23 percent of Prince Georgians who voted, and a quarter of all African Americans in Maryland, cast ballots for Mr. Steele.

It is true that Mr. Steele attracted more black votes than Republican candidates generally do in Maryland. But even that was tainted by a crude, eleventh-hour trick engineered by Republicans: the distribution of pamphlets in Prince George's blurring Mr. Steele's Republican affiliation and falsely suggesting that key black Democrats were supporting him. The pamphlet took Prince George's African American voters -- among the nation's best-educated -- for fools. Little wonder that many of them reacted with indignation and hostility. If Republicans are truly interested in wresting African American voters from the Democratic Party, they should try nominating candidates who campaign on substance, not symbols, and who treat all voters with equal respect.

The Democrats, who swept the statewide races, may feel they have less cause for introspection. That would be a mistake, because clearly some African American Democrats in Maryland feel the party has taken them for granted, despite the successful candidacy of the lieutenant governor-elect, Del. Anthony G. Brown, a rising star who is black. The Democrats' troubles began last year when the entrance of Kweisi Mfume into the Senate race was greeted with a profound silence by many in the party's hierarchy. Party elders, notably Rep. Steny H. Hoyer and state Senate President Thomas V. Mike Miller Jr., rushed to endorse Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin, the eventual winner, for the job. That was their right; after all, Mr. Cardin has been a leading political figure in Maryland for decades. But Mr. Mfume -- who had served on the Baltimore City Council, as a member of the House of Representatives and as president of the NAACP -- thought it unseemly that he received so little consideration from the party, and some black party stalwarts agreed. They have sent the party a message that its leadership would be wise to heed.

Bush's Asia Trip To Focus On Trade, Terrorism (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, November 16, 2006

SINGAPORE — President Bush arrived here today to begin an Asian tour knitting together the twin issues of economic security and counter-terrorism that are at the center of his agenda for the final two years of his presidency.

Over five days, the trip will take Bush from Singapore to Hanoi, for a Pacific Rim economic summit, and to Ho Chi Minh City and Indonesia, where he will seek cooperation in the campaign against terrorism.

Bush, who left Washington on Tuesday, spent two nights aboard Air Force One, flying by way of Moscow.

During a refueling stop Wednesday at Vnukovo II International Airport, the president and First Lady Laura Bush spent about 90 minutes with Russian President Vladimir V. Putin, and his wife, Lyudmila, lunching on Kamchatka crab, pancakes with red and black caviar, and other Russian delicacies.

The Russian news media said the presidents discussed efforts to persuade Iran to freeze its nuclear enrichment program and Russia's accession to the World Trade Organization, which will probably get a boost in Hanoi.

Bush's trip is centered on a three-day visit to Vietnam, his first and the second by a U.S. president since the end of the Vietnam War. President Clinton visited in November 2000, two months before leaving office.

Although the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation summit is focused on economic and trade issues, it takes place against the backdrop of the anti-terrorism campaign, the rise of China as an economic and diplomatic presence, and the loss of Republican Party foreign policy dominance after the congressional election.

"All Asian friends will be watching initially President Bush and his team in terms of his body language, his statements, to see whether he will be weakened or committed to going forward with a broad and purposeful agenda in Asia as a whole," said Kurt Campbell, a former senior Pentagon official and senior vice president of the Center for Strategic and International Studies, a Washington think tank.

One of the first tests of Bush's ability to move forward is the challenge posed by North Korea's explosion of a nuclear device on Oct. 9. It will probably be a central topic on the sidelines of the summit.

Speaking with reporters last week, Stephen Hadley, Bush's national security advisor, said there was a possibility that the government in Pyongyang "would take some action" during the summit to demonstrate its belligerence.

As the place where the foreign policy of several U.S. presidents went awry, Vietnam will prove a challenge for Bush.

Critics may find it easy to draw parallels between the war in Iraq and the war in Vietnam: fighting with no sign that the administration's political goals are being met; a steady drain on the U.S. military; daily casualty reports in the news media; popular opinion in the United States and beyond turning against the president; and growing evidence of civil war.

For Vietnam, Bush's visit is part of a diplomatic coming-out party more than 31 years after the communists' victory led to the country's unification.

The 21-member Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation forum is being held in Vietnam for the first time, lending legitimacy to the Hanoi government and recognition to its powerful economic engine.

Vietnam's economy has grown dramatically after the introduction of market reforms. Last year, it grew at a rate of 8.4%, although per-capita income was a meager $638.

The annual meeting of the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation forum, which was established in 1989, brings together leaders from the Pacific Rim with the goal of advancing economic growth, opening trade and promoting trade-related security.

The participating countries account for 40% of the world's population, 56% of its economic output and 48% of world trade.

For Bush, Singapore is an appropriate launching point for a trip linking economic, diplomatic and security concerns.

The country has been a historic center of Southeast Asian trade, has maintained close ties with the United States, particularly to Republican presidents, and is an ally of the administration in the U.S.-declared war on terrorism.

With connections throughout the region, Singapore also offers Bush perspectives on China's growth and conditions in Indonesia, the most populous Muslim nation, said Campbell, the think tank analyst. Bush's final stop there Monday has been limited to about six hours because of security concerns.

The president scheduled a series of meetings with Singaporean leaders today, followed by a speech at the National University of Singapore that is expected to focus on economic security and the fight against terrorism, disease and poverty.

Before the afternoon meetings, the president was expected to tour the Asian Civilizations Museum, which features 1,300 artifacts of Chinese, Southeast Asian, South Asian and West Asian Islamic cultures.

Asians Ask How Elections Affect Trade (USAT)

By David Jackson

USA Today, November 16, 2006

SINGAPORE — As President Bush sorts out his relationship with the incoming Democratic Congress, some Asian leaders wonder whether last week's elections were a vote against free trade and their countries' economic opportunities.

The new Democratic majority in the U.S. House of Representatives and Senate, including members who say free trade leads to American job losses, makes trade a timely topic for Bush's visits this week to Singapore, Indonesia and an economic conference in Vietnam.

"I know people in various governments around the region who are concerned," said Edmund Sim, a Singapore attorney who has worked on trade agreements.

In Indonesia, Foreign Minister Hassan Wirajuda told reporters that "like some other countries that are currently discussing free-trade areas, we are very worried."

The United States had a $373 billion trade deficit with Asian countries in 2005, representing nearly half of its overall $767 billion trade deficit. The red ink was led by a $202 billion deficit with China.

The United States had small trade surpluses with a few Asian nations, including Hong Kong and Singapore.

Bush arrived this morning (local time) in Singapore, a gleaming city synonymous with international barter since Britain's Sir Thomas Stamford Raffles established a trading post here in 1819.

As Air Force One refueled in Moscow, Bush had lunch with Russian President Vladimir Putin. The two leaders discussed the nuclear ambitions of Iran and North Korea.

Tonight, Bush delivers a major speech on U.S.-Asian relations that will include a renewed commitment to what national security adviser Stephen Hadley called "trade liberalization."

Delegates to the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation forum, to be held this weekend in Hanoi, will assess Bush's political strength in light of the election victories by the Democrats.

"They're going to be all looking to see how he plays the game after this political setback," said Michael Green, a former member of Bush's National Security Council.

Though the Iraq war dominated the midterm elections, some successful Democrats argued that American companies have used lower trade barriers to move jobs overseas.

Rep. Sherrod Brown, D-Ohio, who defeated Republican Sen. Mike DeWine, called for "renegotiating job-killing trade agreements." Brown wrote a book called, Myths of Free Trade: Why American Trade Policy Has Failed.

Sim, a native of Louisiana who has worked in Singapore for nearly a decade, says, "American consumers benefit tremendously from free trade," in terms of lower prices and product variety.

In what may be a preview of debates to come, the House failed Monday to muster the two-thirds vote necessary to approve normal trade relations with Vietnam, something Bush wants before the APEC summit. Ninety-four Democrats voted against the trade deal, along with 66 Republicans. The House may try again in December.

Another test will come next summer, when the new Congress decides whether to continue giving presidents the power to negotiate trade agreements that cannot be amended and require only an up-or-down vote. This is known as "fast track" authority.

Democrats plan to seek greater oversight and enforcement capabilities to protect U.S. jobs. Sen. Max Baucus, D-Mont., in line to be chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, wants to create a chief enforcement officer in the U.S. trade representative's office.

"Moving forward on aggressive trade initiatives requires that we tackle — with equal vigor — their domestic consequences," Baucus said recently.

Rep. Jim McCrery, R-La., who will be the top Republican on the House Ways and Means Committee, says the trend away from unfettered free trade has been building for some time. He notes the coalition that supported President Clinton's effort on the North American Free Trade Agreement between the United States, Canada and Mexico has shrunk.

Simon Tay, chairman of the Singapore Institute of International Affairs, notes the Bush administration has discussed an overall "free-trade area" for Asian nations, an idea to be reviewed at the economic forum in Vietnam. Tay said a Democratic Congress and the "looming end of fast-track approval" puts a lot of "pressure" against that concept.

Paul Rosenthal, an international trade lawyer in Washington, predicted Democrats will probably seek restrictive trade agreements that would include requirements that trading partners abide by international labor and environmental standards.

"I don't think there will be an end to free-trade negotiations," Rosenthal said. "But I do think there's going to be a lot closer scrutiny."

Bush Seeks To Reassure Allies On Trade (AP-Y)

By Terence Hunt, Ap White House Correspondent

AP, November 16, 2006

President Bush is seeking to reassure nervous Asian allies that the United States will remain a reliable partner in liberalizing trade, confronting North Korea's nuclear threat and fighting terrorism after an election upheaval back home.

In Bush's first overseas trip since Republicans lost the House and Senate, world leaders are looking for any sign of change since the election repudiation of his Iraq policy.

In an early embarrassment for Bush, the House failed to approve normalized trade relations with Vietnam — a move Bush wanted completed this week. Instead, Congress probably will consider it in December.

Bush's eight-day journey takes him to Singapore, Vietnam and Indonesia. A week later, he will be in Europe for a summit of NATO leaders. The two trips will take him away from Washington at a crucial time when the postelection, lame-duck Congress is dealing with issues the White House has deemed vital.

The president planned to outline the themes of his trip with a speech in Singapore on Thursday, emphasizing how the United States and Asian nations can work together.

"The Asian leaders will be looking at President Bush's body language," said Mike Green, who until earlier this year was senior director for Asia at the National Security Council. "They know he's the commander in chief. They know that he has two years left, but they're going to be all looking to see how he plays the game after this political setback."

En route to Singapore, Air Force One stopped in Moscow for refueling. Russian President Vladimir Putin and his wife, Lyudmila, came out to the airport to greet Bush and his wife, Laura, on a red carpet. Bush's stop was a pointed gesture of friendship toward Putin, whose support Bush needs in dealing with North Korea and Iran. Typically, U.S. presidents heading for Asia fly west, not east, and refuel in Alaska.

National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley, talking to reporters aboard Air Force One after Bush left, said the presidents "talked a little bit about proliferation generally" with regard to Iran and North Korea.

Russian news agencies quoted Kremlin spokesman Alexei Gromov as confirming that a bilateral agreement on Russia's accession to the World Trade Organization was being readied for signing in Hanoi.

While the Republican election defeat was cheered by many in Europe, where Bush is highly unpopular, it is a different story in Asia. Many Asian nations are nervous about the rise of China and look to the United States to be a force of strength and continuity. They will be watching for Bush for possible signals.

Along with trade and regional security, the trip will deal with issues such as avian flu, the battle against government corruption, the promotion of freedom and curbing of poverty. Southeast Asia also is an area with active al-Qaida-linked terrorists.

On Friday Bush will travel to Vietnam for the annual summit of 21 Pacific Rim leaders.

On the summit's sidelines, Bush will meet individually with his partners in talks aimed at persuading a defiant North Korea to abandon its nuclear weapons program. He will meet on Saturday with Japan's new prime minister, Shinzo Abe, and South Korea President Roh Moo-hyun and on Sunday with Putin and Chinese President Hu Jintao.

The leaders will explore how to proceed in the start-and-stop talks on North Korean disarmament. After testing a nuclear bomb Oct. 9, North Korea declared its willingness to return to the negotiations; no date has been set.

Worried about angering Pyongyang, South Korea has balked at Washington's demand that it fully join a U.S.-led effort to intercept North Korean ships suspected of carrying supplies for the North's nuclear and missile weapons programs.

Meanwhile, this week's setback on normal trade relations with Vietnam could portend tough times for other trade legislation when the Democrats take over Congress in January. Many Democrats see trade liberalizing legislation as a threat to American jobs. Bush's authority to negotiate a "fast-track" agreement that can be submitted to Congress for a simple yes-or-no vote without amendments is due to expire on July 1, 2007.

Regarding congressional inaction on Vietnam trade relations, Hadley said, "It is unfortunate that it could not have been done before the president arrived, but I think the message for the Vietnamese people will be, 'This is going to get done.'"

After 3 1/2 days in Vietnam, Bush will visit Indonesia, the world's largest Muslim-majority nation. The president will stop in Hawaii on his way back to the United States and have breakfast Tuesday morning with troops at Hickam Air Force Base before returning to Washington.

Blow To Bush As Vietnam Trading Bill Rejected (FT)

By Alan Beattie And Amy Kazmin

Financial Times, November 16, 2006

The administration of President George W. Bush scrambled on Wednesday to play down the significance of the US House of Representatives defeating a motion to treat Vietnam as a full trading partner.

The leadership of the House, which remains in Republican hands until the newly elected Democrat-controlled Congress takes over in January, decided on Tuesday night not to call for another vote on the bill to grant Vietnam so-called “permanent normal trade relations” after it failed to get the requisite two-thirds majority on Monday.

Though the bill is very likely to pass when Congress reconvenes in December, the timing of the vote, days before Mr Bush attends the Asia-Pacific Economic Co-operation (Apec) forum in Vietnam is highly unfortunate for the White House.

Susan Schwab, US trade representative, used a press conference in Hanoi on Wednesday to argue that the defeat arose from procedural problems, not fear of Vietnam or rejection of trade deals.

“You have to be a student of our congressional system to understand the vote,” she said. “The fact is that there was strong bipartisan support in favour of permanent normal trade relations for Vietnam in the House of Representatives.”

The House of Representatives voted 228 to 161 to pass the bill. But it failed to reach the two-thirds majority required under the expedited procedures used.

The bill commits the US to giving Vietnam the same privileges as any other member of the World Trade Organisation, which Vietnam is due to join next year. It is largely symbolic but observers said Hanoi may not quickly forget the diplomatic embarrassment the US has caused it at a moment when it is under intense global scrutiny as the host of an important regional economic forum.

"What a screw-up," said Fred Burke, a partner at the law firm Baker & McKenzie in Ho Chi Minh City. "It's a disaster. It undermines so much of the goodwill and co-operative atmosphere that is really strong right now."

The failure to pass the bill caused irritation within the administration about Republican mismanagement of the House. But there was also dissent from the party that will make it harder to form a bipartisan majority on trade. Ted Poe, a Texas congressman, said he and other Republicans would continue to vote against the pact and might challenge future bilateral deals, such as the free trade agreement with Peru.

Adam Sitkoff, executive director of the America Chamber of Commerce in Hanoi, said he was disappointed the vote would be delayed but confident it would pass in December. "There is strong bipartisan support and the new Democrat leadership voted in favour of this bill," he said.

Trade Bills Now Face Tough Odds (NYT)

By Steven R. Weisman

The New York Times, November 16, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 15 — The Bush administration says it has no higher global economic priority than to combat rising protectionism. This week the challenge became harder and more complicated.

Like a lightning bolt that illuminates a dark landscape, the failure by the House to pass what should have been a routine measure sought by President Bush to extend normal trade relations with Vietnam shows how much harder it will be to win approval of trade bills from now on.

Administration officials said Wednesday that they still hoped the Vietnam trade bill would be approved by the end of the year in the lame-duck Congressional session that continues to be led by Republicans. They said the same for other bills that would grant trade preferences to poor countries in Asia, Africa and Latin America.

But after an election in which many winning Democrats ran on promises to look more skeptically at trade measures, Democratic leaders and trade lobbyists agreed that, at least next year, the administration is going to have to adjust to a new environment and make concessions in order to get such bills through a Democratic-controlled Congress.

Among the concessions might be greater efforts to get trading partners to crack down on sweatshops and labor abuses and to respect environmental standards and other types of regulations in their countries. Trade deals may also have to address what sorts of goods the American government can procure from overseas.

"The election was a reaffirmation of public skepticism on trade deals," said Lori Wallach, director of Public Citizen's Global Trade Watch, a group founded by Ralph Nader. "There's going to be a majority for trade deals, but it's going to be a different majority than the one we're used to. The skeptics are going to have a say."

This was also the view of groups advocating trade agreements representing big business.

"We're optimistic about working with the new Congress, but we're going to have to show some flexibility," said Christopher Wenk, director of international trade policy at the National Association of Manufacturers. "Labor is going to have to play a more prevalent role, and environmental issues are going to have to be addressed."

The Vietnam bill passed by a majority, but it fell short of the two-thirds majority needed under special rules invoked to speed its consideration on the eve of Mr. Bush's trip to Hanoi, his first visit to the country with which the United States fought a war a generation ago.

The result was an embarrassment for the White House, suddenly deprived of a tangible way to prove that relations with Vietnam were improving under Mr. Bush. Even administration officials said they were not sure why the bill failed and seemed ready to blame Republicans as well as Democrats.

A day after Republican leaders decided not to even try to pass the bill before Mr. Bush's visit, new details of the inner workings of the House bill were emerging. Legislative aides said Republican skeptics of the bill were furious with their leaders that it was being scheduled so soon after an election in which trade was an issue.

More than 60 Republican voted against the measure, an unusually high number for a party that stands for free trade. Misgivings about improving relations with Vietnam three decades after the war were cited as a factor in their dissent.

So was a general feeling of resentment toward Representative Bill Thomas, the California Republican who is outgoing chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, whose style of running the committee is criticized by Republicans and Democrats as autocratic and doctrinaire.

On the Democratic side, the issue was complicated as well. Democratic leaders like Representatives Nancy Pelosi, set to become House speaker, and Charles B. Rangel, the expected chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, supported the Vietnam bill. Their offices noted that more than 90 Democrats voted for it.

Mr. Rangel said he would handle trade legislation differently from Mr. Thomas and consult lawmakers about their ideas before the vote. He said trade actually offered more of a prospect for bipartisan cooperation than other issues like taxes, Social Security and Medicare.

"With all the other big-ticket items we're facing, trade is one issue that could be more easily dealt with in a bipartisan way," Mr. Rangel said in an interview. "In the past, Republicans never welcomed working with us, except to tell our trading partners that it was the Democrats who were holding up trade deals."

Mr. Rangel said, however, that he did not think trading partners would object to the kinds of concerns on labor, environment and other issues that Democrats would be raising. "I have not heard one representative of any government objecting to any suggestions by Democrats," he said.

Trade officials say that dictating labor, environmental and regulatory standards of American trading partners is not as easy as Mr. Rangel and the Democrats assert in the current environment as European, Latin American and Asian countries are making trade deals with each other that could freeze out the United States.

"We do not have the luxury of standing on the sidelines," said an administration trade official, asking not to be identified discussing tactics in Congress. "We have got to be in the game. We have to get preferential access."

The Vietnam deal was especially upsetting to the American textile industry, which has been reeling from a succession of trade deals with Mexico, the Caribbean and China over the last 10 years. Some worried that the Vietnam arrangement might allow cheating by China to circumvent curbs on its exports by going through that country.

Democrats denied Republican claims that they were under pressure from their labor supporters to vote against the Vietnam deal. They said the vote on Monday evening demonstrated that, while about half the Democrats in Congress might vote against future accords — and indeed most Democrats opposed trade deals even under President Bill Clinton — there should be enough Democrats to join with Republicans to pass some measures. Whatever happens on Vietnam and the pending deals with poor countries, the vote this week was not seen as good news for a future global trade accord, which is hung up on the issue of farm subsidies and tariffs.

The Bush administration has made it clear that it cannot offer to reduce its current level of $20 billion in farm subsidies in return for modest access to European, Indian, Indonesian and Brazilian markets for American goods. Such access seems not to be in the offing, and therefore many trade experts are pessimistic about getting a global deal.

Bad Start For Bipartisanship On Trade Issues (FT)

By Alan Beattie And Eoin Callan

Financial Times, November 16, 2006

Never mind the Democrats: it's those Capitol Hill Republicans you need to watch out for. That was the conclusion of frustrated Bush administration officials as they blamed the ineptitude of the Republican leadership of the House of Representatives for trying and failing to rush through the Vietnam trade bill on Monday.

As one frustrated official put it on Wednesday: "The bottom line is that we can't blame this one on the Democrats." While some Democrats have been warning that they will scrutinise trade agreements much more closely when they take over the House and Senate in January, the Democrat vote on Monday divided almost evenly for and against – more favourable than for many trade bills. It was the failure of some Republicans to turn up, along with 66 who voted against, that did for the bill. Some speculated that the votes against might have reflected congressional Rep-ublican resentment towards the White House after the heavy defeats of the mid-term elections.

"If they had not used the suspension calendar, this would probably have been seen as a huge bipartisan victory," the administration official said. The official was referring to the accelerated "suspension" process chosen by the House Republican leadership to push the vote through before this weekend's Asia-Pacific Economic Co-operation (Apec) meeting in Hanoi. Though the bill will very probably be passed when it comes up again early next month, it is a bad start for the administration's attempts to achieve cross-party support for trade liberalisation on Capitol Hill.

The White House will face a tough challenge selling any new trade deals to a House and Senate both controlled by Democrats. In particular, it looks ever more quixotic to attempt to turn the Apec forum, which meets this weekend in Hanoi, into a giant free trade agreement of Asia-Pacific (FTAAP), as suggested by some.

The Apec heads of government will call for feasibility studies of the possibility of melding the 21 members of Apec into a trade pact. But since such a deal would involve the US promising even more trade liberalisation with China, a key member of the bloc, it looks to most like a non-starter. Even some Democrats promising bipartisanship on trade issues balk at going any further with China until they are happy it is playing by the rules it has already signed up to.

Barack Obama, a contender for the 2008 Democratic presidential nomination, said frustration over relations with Beijing had emerged as a hot-button issue for "congressmen from states that have been hit by job losses in manufacturing". "There are a number of incoming congressmen that want a new approach to engagement with China," he said.

Even so-called "Blue Dog" Democrats – those with centrist pro-business policies – declare the first order of business on China is addressing outstanding differences over global imbalances, monetary policy, and enforcement of existing trade obligations.

"Democrats are anxious to start by sitting down with the Bush administration and hammering out these issues," said an aide to John Tanner, a leading Blue Dog in the House of Representatives.

US business groups also rejected suggestions of a regional FTA, saying the Doha round of trade talks remained the best hope. "We need to press China for results on unmet obligations," said Myron Brilliant, of the US Chamber of Commerce. And when even the fervently pro-trade hosts don't think a deal is a runner in the near future, it seems unlikely many will dissent. "Establishment of the Free Trade Area in Asia-Pacific cannot be realised in the near future," Tran Thu Hang, deputy director-general of the Vietnamese trade ministry's multilateral section, told the state-controlled Vietnam News. "The orientation of the current free trade agreements are such that it would require major changes in Apec's mechanism."

Bush, In Asia, Faces A Test Of Diplomatic Muscle (NYT)

By David E. Sanger

The New York Times, November 16, 2006

SINGAPORE, Thursday, Nov. 16 — President Bush arrived here Thursday morning in one of Asia's most prosperous corners, opening a five-day visit that will test whether the Republican defeat last week diminished his influence as he presses other nations to confront Iran and North Korea.

Stopping Wednesday in Moscow for refueling, Mr. Bush and his wife, Laura, had a 90-minute visit with President Vladimir V. Putin, which the White House described as largely social.

But it included some exchanges on efforts to get Russia to join a resolution imposing United Nations sanctions on Iran for its continued defiance regarding its nuclear program.

On the way here, Mr. Bush's national security adviser, Stephen J. Hadley, acknowledged that the two countries were still well apart on such sanctions.

"The issue is just what should be in the resolution," Mr. Hadley said after talking to his counterpart, Igor Ivanoff, in Moscow. "It's a little bit like sausage making — it's not pretty, and a lot of it spills out into the public. But I think the international community has held together on this issue, and I think we will again."

Russia has deep economic ties to Iran's nuclear power program — it is the supplier of nuclear reactors now under construction — and it has been the most reluctant to impose sanctions, saying they would undercut efforts to reach a negotiated settlement. Administration officials make little secret of their frustration that the year is coming to a close and Iran is continuing to enrich uranium.

Asked about seeking Iran's help with ending violence in Iraq while pressing the nuclear issue, Mr. Hadley said the administration had no intention of letting up the pressure to win Iran's help. "There's not a tradeoff between the two," he said. "Iran ought to have an interest in having a unified and stable Iraq."

In Moscow the Kremlin's spokesman, Dmitry S. Peskov, described the meeting of the presidents and their wives as brief but "very positive." He said that among the subjects they took up was an agreement, already announced, for Russia to enter the World Trade Organization.

When Mr. Bush arrives Friday in Hanoi, the Vietnamese capital, for an annual Asian summit meeting, he will face a more difficult trade issue: Congress balked at final passage of normal trade relations with Vietnam.

Mr. Bush had intended to bring news of the approval with him, but Mr. Hadley said that instead, he would tell Hanoi that he believed the problems in Congress — some with Mr. Bush's own Republican allies — would soon be resolved.

In Hanoi, Mr. Bush is also likely to have a testy encounter with President Roh Moo-hyun of South Korea. Mr. Roh has been critical of what he has called a one-sided American approach to North Korea, and earlier this week, he announced only weak sanctions against North Korea in response to its nuclear test on Oct. 9.

So far South Korea has declined to take part directly in the American-led effort to detect and seize illicit weapons shipments. Many North Korean ships pass through South Korean waters. American officials say that Mr. Roh, in a visit to

Washington before the nuclear test, had indicated that if North Korea detonated a nuclear test, it would “change everything” in relations between North and South.

One of Mr. Bush’s senior national security aides, speaking in Washington before the president left, but declining to talk on the record about the friction between Washington and Seoul, said, “It seems to have changed almost nothing.”

Bush, Putin Discuss Iran, Korea (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, November 16, 2006

HANOI -- President Bush stopped off in Moscow yesterday to talk with Russian President Vladimir Putin about the nuclear proliferation efforts by North Korea and Iran before proceeding to Southeast Asia for an eight-day trade and economic trip.

Russian officials said the two leaders agreed to sign a deal next week that would help Russia join the World Trade Organization.

National Security Adviser Stephen J. Hadley said he and his Russian counterpart, Igor Ivanov, talked and said there is still general agreement on passing a United Nations resolution with consequences if Iran continues to pursue its nuclear program.

"We need a resolution, we need to show that there's some consequences, we also need to keep the door open to negotiations if the Iranians are willing to come and suspend" their program, said Mr. Hadley.

Taking leave of Washington -- a city he lost to the Democrats one week ago -- Mr. Bush arrived in Singapore today on a trip that will be long on economic and trade talks and short on U.S. politics -- even though his forthcoming stay in Vietnam will prompt comparisons to the flagging war in Iraq.

The White House said the president plans to focus his trip to Singapore, Vietnam and Indonesia on encouraging free trade and praising economic expansion in the ascendant nations. In a speech he will deliver today, the president will utter little of his usual rhetoric on foreign trips, when he often urges nations to step up in the fight against terrorism.

"In his remarks, the president will highlight the importance of Asia in the world and will discuss the ways in which the United States and Asian nations are partnering together to face the challenges of poverty, disease, terrorism, and energy security," said Mr. Hadley.

While Mr. Bush will be president for another two years, his loss of Congress considerably weakens his clout at home. One former White House adviser said the strong hand he held when he bucked the international community and invaded Iraq may be all but played out.

"The Asian leaders will be looking at President Bush's body language," said Mike Green, who is now an Asia specialist at the Center for Strategic and International Studies. "They know he has two years left, but they're going to be all looking to see how he plays the game after this political setback."

After two nights in Singapore, including one on which the president and first lady will attend a dinner with the prime minister, Mr. Bush will visit Vietnam for three nights. His first stop is Hanoi, where he will attend the 21-nation Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation, a summit of Pacific Rim leaders and others seeking to open trade throughout the world.

At the annual summit, Mr. Bush will hold bilateral talks with leaders from South Korea, China and Japan, along with Mr. Putin, whom he met briefly during the red-carpet refueling stop yesterday. The four nations are part of six-party talks with North Korea, which has become increasingly bellicose, test-firing missiles on July 4 and detonating what specialists say was a nuclear device in October.

The talks, which include the United States and North Korea, have been stalled for a year, but aides to the communist nation's President Kim Jong-il last month said the leader is open to restarting negotiations over its nuclear ambitions.

Also in Hanoi, Mr. Bush will tour the Joint POW-MIA Accounting Command, where he will be briefed on efforts to locate or account for all of the nearly 1,800 U.S. service members still missing from the Vietnam War.

On Monday, Mr. Bush will spend a day in Ho Chi Minh City, formerly Saigon, where he will tour the stock exchange and attend a meeting on bird flu, which has killed more than 100 people in Southeast Asia.

Bush's Visit To Vietnam Sparks Hope In Little Saigon (LAT)

By Mai Tran

The Los Angeles Times, November 16, 2006

In the streets and marketplaces of Little Saigon, the talk is of optimism and new freedoms for a country many fled decades ago.

President Bush's visit to Vietnam today is seen in the nation's largest Vietnamese American community as a heartening, profoundly important event. For some, there is even the hope that the president will find a way to champion reform in a country that still evokes bitterness and memories of terrible times.

"I've been waiting for this day," said Kimberly Ta, 61, of Anaheim, shopping with her father and friends at the Asian Garden Mall in Westminster. "I am hoping that his visit will make life better for the people of Vietnam."

Bush will attend the Asian Pacific Economic Cooperation summit in Hanoi as part of an eight-day tour. He is the second president to visit the Southeast Asian country since the former country of South Vietnam fell to the communists in 1975.

Many in Little Saigon, a bustling Vietnamese American community that sprawls through parts of Westminster, Garden Grove and Santa Ana, say it's the perfect time for Bush to voice their concerns.

"I just hope that President Bush tells Vietnam that human rights is important," said Janet Nguyen, a Garden Grove councilwoman. Bush "comes from a country that represents freedom and democracy; he needs to remind Vietnam that if they want to benefit from the free-trade market, they have to abide by the human rights laws."

Others suggested that Bush should be cautious in dealing with the Vietnamese government. Activists from San Jose have gathered outside the White House in recent weeks, asking Bush to demand that the communist nation embrace democracy before trade with the United States is normalized.

"It's only fair," said Ta, a homemaker who immigrated to the United States in 1981 under an Amerasian sponsorship program. She visits relatives in Vietnam every year and hopes Bush's visit will "somehow make it easier for the Vietnamese to travel abroad" so her family can visit her.

Many Vietnamese Americans still have family in Vietnam.

Thuong Dinh, a cashier at Pho Vien Huong Dakao restaurant in Westminster, visits Vietnam twice a year to see family. There have been vast improvements in basic freedoms and growing prosperity, but more needs to be done, he said.

"It's getting better," said Dinh, 45, of Westminster, who fled by boat in 1979. "It's 2006 already, not like it was 25 to 30 years ago, but of course we want to see more freedom."

Vietnam was on the brink of becoming the 150th member of the World Trade Organization but its membership failed to pass in the House this week. A decision could be made in December.

The membership would be only a gesture, many said, because trade is already taking place. In Little Saigon, food, clothing, furniture, music and pottery are imported and sold at local stores. Many businesspeople travel to Vietnam but keep their dealings secret, fearing a backlash from anticommunist activists. Anticommunist feelings run deep in Little Saigon.

For Thuy Reed, a 53-year-old San Pedro resident, the trade vote is nothing more than procedural.

Even without any restrictions, Bush should push for Vietnam to trade, supporters say.

Sitting in front of a boba drink shop in the popular two-story Asian Garden Mall, Reed said that "99.9% of the stores here are already getting their products from Vietnam. At least opening trade to Vietnam would give so many people opportunities and jobs. You can't punish the laypeople of Vietnam for the work of the communist government."

Nguyen, the Garden Grove councilwoman, said her opposition to the Vietnamese government had kept her from visiting her native country. She's tracking Bush's trip, hoping that somehow it will speed reform.

"If they open up and the political dynamics change, maybe one day, I'll get to visit my homeland."

Rice Backs Trying To Restart Trade Talks (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, November 16, 2006

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice endorsed an attempt to restart global trade talks that collapsed over the summer, telling Asian trade partners on Thursday that a new trade agreement is "critical to global prosperity and security."

Rice pledged $1 million in new U.S. funding for an Asian trade development initiative and unveiled a U.S. program allowing expedited visas and other services for approved business travelers from nations in the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation forum.

"We need to make it easier to do business in the region," Rice told an opening session of the 21-nation forum.

According to a draft of a statement Pacific Rim leaders plan to issue later in the annual summit, the leaders agreed to return to the current round of world trade talks, launched in Doha, Qatar, in 2001. The talks collapsed in July amid an impasse over farm trade concessions and other issues.

"Both as a trade issue and a foreign policy issue, the success of the Doha round is critical to global prosperity and security," Rice said.

APEC trade and economic ministers held talks in Hanoi on Wednesday hoping to get negotiations on a global agreement to slash trade barriers back on track. Fast action is needed if the World Trade Organization is to strike a deal before President Bush's authority to reach a trade deal that can be submitted to Congress for a simple yes-or-no vote without amendments expires in mid-2007.

Also Thursday, Rice and other delegates at the forum conferred on the North Korean nuclear issue. The informal gathering was a substitute for a smaller and more structured session that the United States and Japan had hoped to hold on the sidelines of the APEC meeting.

China, which chairs six-nation talks aimed at shuttering Pyongyang's nuclear program, strongly opposed holding a session that excluded the North, which does not participate in APEC.

The United States, South Korea, China, Japan and Russia have offered impoverished North Korea a package of economic, political and energy incentives if it gives up its nuclear weapons. The North agreed to the deal in September 2005, but then backed away.

The six-nation talks have been mothballed for a year, during which North Korea test-fired a long-range missile and conducted an underground nuclear explosion that unnerved Asia and the West.

The North agreed in principle to return to the arms control negotiations after its nuclear test Oct. 9, and host China had hoped to schedule the session before the end of the year.

Before arriving in Hanoi, Rice suggested that the new round of talks may not come quickly.

"We need to take our time this time and make sure when we go to the table at the six-party talks there is a reasonable chance of a successful outcome," Rice told reporters.

Legwork is under way to make sure new talks are tightly structured and produce a result, Rice said. Two top State Department officials recently returned from planning meetings in Asia, and Rice predicted there will be more such visits. Rice herself will meet separately with the foreign ministers of China and South Korea during her stay in the Vietnamese capital.

"I'm a veteran of arms-control negotiations," said Rice, a specialist on the former Soviet Union. "It's not at all unusual that you have a lot of preparatory work in advance of any round of getting the actual negotiators together."

The draft APEC statement shows apparent differences among members on the appropriate way to deal with the threat of weapons of mass destruction. Two sentences about WMD are enclosed in brackets, meaning some members wanted that material deleted.

The draft does not mention North Korea, although the issue was high on the summit agenda. Envoys from South Korea, Japan and the United States were to meet Wednesday in Hanoi to hammer out a common strategy ahead of six-way nuclear talks that include North Korea.

The document does stress the importance of ensuring security to advance prosperity in the region, saying the leaders are "determined to continue efforts to combat terrorism."

In the Vietnamese capital, Christopher Hill, the top U.S. nuclear envoy, said Wednesday that talks with North Korea on its nuclear program won't succeed unless the communist regime lives up to commitments to abandon nuclear weapons in exchange for aid and security guarantees.

"I think we've all made very clear that we don't accept North Korea as a nuclear state," Hill said.

South Korean nuclear envoy Chun Yung-woo earlier called for real progress in the talks.

"If we do not make substantial progress, the future for the six-party talks will be very unclear," he said late Tuesday after arriving in Hanoi from Seoul. "There should not be talks for the sake of talks."

The comments were some of the strongest Chun has made about the North.

Vietnam Studies Roots In Corruption Battle (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, November 16, 2006

HANOI -- Vietnam's ruling Communist Party is turning to the ideology and social teachings of its founder, Ho Chi Minh, in an uphill battle against rampant corruption that has resulted in the dismissal of thousands of officials in recent years.

The Politburo instructed the party's local branches this week to begin a campaign "to encourage party members and the general public to study and follow [Ho's] virtuous personality."

By doing this, it said, "the party believes people will be able to effectively push back social evils" such as "corruption, waste and individualism," a reference to the diminished role of the individual in communist ideology.

"The party's offices and organizations will set up standards on virtue and lifestyle for cadres, party members and state employees," said the new directive, which was published by the official Vietnam News Agency.

All Vietnamese read Ho's teachings in school, but the party is worried that they either forget them as they grow older or give in to the vices of a modern and evermore developed economy, officials said yesterday.

The party has been embarrassed by the lengths to which some of its most senior members have gone for personal profit, one official said. "Thousands have been fired for corruption, embezzlement and graft."

Some of those sacked include vice ministers and even the country's anti-corruption chief. According to press reports, Luong Cao Khai received money and land from oil and gas officials and secured jobs in the energy sector for his relatives.

Last year, several oil and gas officials received sentences ranging from four years to life in prison for causing losses to the state worth millions of dollars.

Earlier this year, a betting scandal prompted the party leader, Nong Duc Manh, to say that corruption "threatens the survival of our system."

Bets on soccer games worth $7 million were reportedly placed by the head of a government agency that handles hundreds of millions of dollars in foreign development aid for construction projects. According to local press reports, he lost $320,000 on a single match in Britain between Manchester United and Arsenal on Jan. 3.

Even Vo Nguyen Giap, the retired general who is revered for Vietnam's victories over both the French and the Americans, felt compelled to remark: "The party has become a shield for corrupt officials."

Another reason for the party's appeal for its members to revisit Ho's teachings is that ideology and traditional values are far from the minds of most young Vietnamese, officials said.

Vietnam has made impressive strides in the past decade in its quest to turn its previously planned system into a modern market economy.

It joined the World Trade Organization last week and is hosting the annual Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation summit with 21 heads of state, including President Bush, this weekend.

But the United States, which is eager to fully normalize trade relations with Vietnam, is critical of the slow pace of political reforms. The Communist Party's rule remains unchallenged, and democracy and human rights activists are regularly harassed.

Two decades ago, the Vietnamese Communist Party, faced with a faltering central-planning economy, formally abandoned Marxist approaches and began introducing market elements as part of a broad reform package called "Doi Moi," translated as either "Renewal" or "Renovation."

Foreign Students Trickling Back To US (CSM)

By Howard Lafranchi, Staff Writer Of The Christian Science Monitor

The Christian Science Monitor, November 16, 2006

A modest rise in new enrollees from abroad begins to stem the post-9/11 drop-off, a report finds.

WASHINGTON

Karian Antoine, an elementary school teacher from the Caribbean island nation of St. Lucia, had long wanted to go beyond her two-year college degree. But the idea of furthering her education in the United States had never attracted her - especially, she says, after the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

Now, though, the Grade 4 teacher at a Catholic school for boys is working her way toward a degree from Virginia's Lynchburg College. She enrolled in Lynchburg's program to train special-education teachers, which the college set up in St. Lucia, and is now one of 23 foreign students at the small liberal arts school.

Antoine is part of a modest rise in the number of new foreign students in the US, the first increase after several years of declines after the 9/11 attacks. While educators hope it signals a return to America's status as a magnet for international education, they acknowledge that getting more students like Antoine to study in the US will take a more coordinated effort from the government and higher-ed institutions.

With just under 565,000 foreign students, the US remains the world's most popular destination for students looking to further their education in another country. But that number is still below the high point of 584,000 foreign students set in 2002-03. US government efforts to streamline the visa process for foreign students, after a post-9/11 tightening of access, is one factor in a return to a rising number in the 2005-06 school year, experts say.

But a global market for foreign students means that American colleges and universities face more competition today - in particular from countries like Britain, Australia, and Japan.

"The fact is that we are in a different place now in the international student market," says Victor Johnson, public policy director for the Association of International Educators in Washington. "Competition from other countries has increased, which means the US is actually getting a smaller share of the market."

The hotter competition helps explain why Education Secretary Margaret Spellings is in China, Korea, and Japan this week with a group of university presidents - a first-of-its-kind mission - to tout the virtues of American higher education.

One reason to fire up more foreigners about US study: their impact on the economy. International students pumped about $13.5 billion into the economy last year, notes the Institute of International Education, whose annual "Open Doors" survey this week reported the increase in foreigners studying in the US. That makes higher education the fifth-highest service-sector export, according to the Department of Commerce.

As important as that is, officials say a broader national interest - one driven home by 9/11 - is the international understanding they believe results from international education. "The amount of money international students spend here is astounding, but [beyond that] are the benefits of increased contact ... between Americans and people [elsewhere]," says Paul Hiemstra, director of global education programs at the State Department. "Those direct contacts counter the stereotypes and misperceptions."

As part of an expanded effort to improve America's image abroad, the State Department is putting more emphasis on international exchanges in both directions, all under the stewardship of presidential adviser Karen Hughes. The effort includes streamlining the student visa process, making more information available to prospective students, and increasing contacts between US institutions of higher education and foreign governments, Mr. Hiemstra says.

These efforts are explained by a growing realization that the advent of a globalized world has forever changed the role of international education, experts say. "Higher education is beginning to say that without the international dimension, you just aren't educated," says Allan Goodman, president of the Institute of International Education.

New international realities will keep expanding the two-way street of international education, with high growth in the US, Mr. Goodman says. A separate survey showed the number of Americans studying abroad grew 8 percent last year, to more than 200,000. Forecasts anticipate that the number of students going outside their own country for part of their education will grow from 2.5 million today to 7 million in five to six years.

The International Educators' Mr. Johnson says the US share of that pie will grow only if the US learns from its international competitors and develops a public-private marketing plan.

Some American schools are already making such efforts. Yerlan Shildibekov, one of 30 Kazakhstani students at the Rochester Institute of Technology in New York, is benefiting from an agreement between his new school and Kazakhstan's government. He has a government scholarship but also financial benefits from RIT.

The anticipated outcome? "In a year I'll go home with a master's in electrical engineering," Mr. Shildibekov says. "But I'm living here with American roommates, so I hope to increase the understanding between America and my country."

Open Campuses (WP)

WHEN IT COMES to attracting the best minds to America's universities and colleges, geography should not matter. So it is welcome news that after two years of decline, students from foreign countries are steadily coming back to U.S. college campuses. It's a trend that should be encouraged even more.

Foreign student enrollment was among the casualties of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. Concerns about homeland security and new restrictions on student visas resulted in long, unpredictable waits for entry into the United States. Students from other countries, believing America no longer welcomed them, went elsewhere. In the 2005-06 school year, though, according to a survey released Monday by the Institute of International Education, the number held steady at 564,766, and new enrollments were up about 8 percent. Credit goes to the State Department, which made foreign students a priority, adding workers to streamline the visa process and starting new recruiting and scholarship programs. Credit also goes to the educational institutions that put new energy into recruitment efforts.

This is a world of increasing competition and collaboration, and immeasurable good is achieved when barriers are torn down. Some of the students who come here today will lead their countries tomorrow, and even those who won't be leaders will leave with a better understanding and appreciation of America. While they are here, they make important contributions, such as teaching this country something about its international neighbors as well as helping the local economy. Consider, for instance, that the 7,600 international students in Washington end up pumping more dollars into the region than, say, the Washington Redskins.

Any doubt about the benefits of attracting foreign students should be erased when weighed against the fact that other countries have started their own programs to aggressively recruit these same smart students. This week a delegation of college presidents, led by education and State Department officials, is in Asia on a mission to recruit foreign scholars. America can't afford not to put out the welcome mat.

President Visits Briefly With Putin On Way To Asia (AP)

By Jennifer Loven

AP, November 16, 2006

MOSCOW, Nov. 15 -- President Bush, eager for Russian help in nuclear disputes with North Korea and Iran, tended to the sometimes frosty Washington-Moscow relationship Wednesday by paying a quick call on President Vladimir Putin.

Bush paused to visit the Russian leader for an hour and a half during an airport stopover on his way to Asia for a week-long trip that includes stays in Singapore, Vietnam and Indonesia. Bush has meetings scheduled with several important allies, including Putin, on the sidelines of a summit of Pacific Rim leaders in Hanoi this week. But only Putin rated a social call as well.

Russian news agencies quoted Kremlin spokesman Alexei Gromov as saying the two presidents discussed the Iranian nuclear program, the situation in the Middle East and nuclear nonproliferation.

Gromov also confirmed that a U.S.-Russian agreement on Russia's accession to the World Trade Organization was being readied for signing in Hanoi.

National security adviser Stephen J. Hadley, talking to reporters aboard Air Force One after Bush left, said the president's get-together with Putin "was a social meeting, as we said it would be. This was a refueling stop."

But Hadley also said the two men "talked a little bit about proliferation generally" with regard to Iran and North Korea. He also said he had spoken with his Russian counterpart, Igor Ivanov, about efforts to reach agreement on a new U.N. security resolution on Iran.

When Bush and his wife, Laura, landed, they were greeted on a red carpet on the tarmac by Putin and his wife, Lyudmila. The Russian president presented Laura Bush with a bouquet of yellow, orange and red flowers, and the four exchanged kisses.

Bush And Putin To Sign WTO Deal In Hanoi (FT)

By Neil Buckley

Financial Times, November 16, 2006

US president George W. Bush held an unusual airport meeting with Russia's Vladimir Putin during a refuelling stop in Moscow, where they confirmed the two countries would this weekend sign a bilateral accord on Russian entry to the World Trade Organisation.

Mr Bush was on his way to Hanoi for the Asia-Pacific Economic Co-operation summit, where he will hold more detailed talks with Mr Putin. Kremlin officials called Wednesday's 90-minute meeting "extraordinarily positive and friendly", saying the two leaders had discussed Iran's nuclear programme, proliferation issues and the Middle East.

Analysts said the gesture by Mr Putin to travel to the airport – accompanied by his wife Lyudmila – may have reflected a desire to ease relations between Moscow and Washington, currently seen as at their poorest since the Soviet Union collapsed in 1991. While Moscow has opposed the Iraq war, Russian officials and commentators have not welcomed last week's Democratic victory in Congressional elections, warning it could lead to even more of what they say is an unwarranted focus on Russia's democratic record.

The presidents "confirmed that the signing of a protocol on Russia's accession to the WTO is now being prepared for Hanoi," Alexei Gromov said, after the two men met at a Moscow airport.

Putin and Bush will meet in Hanoi at the Asia-PacificEconomic Cooperation summit on November 18 and 19.

Democrats Blast Bush Policy On N. Korea (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, November 16, 2006

The Bush administration came under fierce attack yesterday from Democrats for its North Korea policy, with the incoming chairman of the House International Relations Committee saying that change is "long overdue" and that the United States should allow its chief nuclear arms negotiator to visit Pyongyang, North Korea's capital.

Meanwhile, a group of experts returning from talks with top North Korean officials offered a pessimistic report on the prospects of reaching a deal when the long-stalled six-nation talks resume later this year. North Korean officials told the experts that they would take a much tougher stance when Pyongyang returns to the negotiating table, believing it is on "equal footing" with the United States now that it has tested a nuclear weapon.

Charles L. "Jack" Pritchard, a former top State Department negotiator on North Korea, said that country's officials seem more interested in returning to the talks to make short-term gains, such as relief from a U.S. campaign to end North Korean counterfeiting of U.S. dollars or to patch up a damaged relationship with China. "They're not in this to give up their nuclear weapons," said Pritchard, now president of the Korean Economic Institute.

North Korea conducted its first nuclear test Oct. 9, after refusing to return to the talks for nearly a year. The U.N. Security Council quickly condemned the test and imposed sanctions, and on Oct. 31 Pyongyang announced that it would return to the talks after the United States agreed to address its concerns about the financial crackdown.

At a hearing yesterday on the administration's preparation for the talks, Rep. Tom Lantos (D-Calif.) faulted the administration's exclusive reliance on the six-nation negotiating framework, arguing that substantial bilateral contacts are necessary to reach any deal.

China, Japan, Russia and South Korea also participate in the talks, a format that some experts have said is cumbersome for difficult negotiations.

In the aftermath of the test, "it is now abundantly clear to the world that our current policies have failed," said Lantos, who will wield the gavel when the new Congress convenes in January. "I look forward to leading the efforts in Congress to keep North Korea on the front burner and to pushing the administration to resolve the feuds within its own ranks which have hobbled North Korea policy."

Lantos charged that Assistant Secretary of State Christopher R. Hill has been undercut in his diplomacy by "hard-liners lodged in the office of the Vice President and the Defense Department." Hill had lobbied to travel to Pyongyang to meet with North Korean officials shortly after North Korea agreed in principle in September 2005 to dismantle its nuclear programs. But the trip never took place, and then the talks stalled over the Treasury Department action.

"Ambassador Hill must also make a stopover in Pyongyang on his way back from the six-party talks, not to negotiate a new and separate deal, but rather to demonstrate to Pyongyang our peaceful intent," Lantos said. "The administration's refusal to allow visits by American diplomats to North Korea must end, and it must end now."

Undersecretary of State R. Nicholas Burns noted that U.S. officials, including Hill, have met bilaterally with North Korean officials in Beijing and New York. "Some people are insisting that the United States should negotiate with North Korea solely on a bilateral basis," he said. "But the North Korean problem, especially its pursuit of nuclear weapons, is a regional problem, it's not just a bilateral issue, because this problem poses a threat to all of its neighbors."

Lantos won support for his position from several other Democrats, as well as from Rep. Jim Leach (R-Iowa), who lost his reelection bid.

"I believe you set up a bit of a straw-man argument," Leach told Burns. "I know of no serious commentator or observer of North Korea that favors solely bilateral discussions, which is the way you phrased it." But, he said, the problem with the administration's approach is that Hill can meet only with North Korean diplomats who are not really the decision-makers.

Democrats Urge N. Korea Nuclear Talks (AP)

By Barry Schweid

Congressional Democrats, demanding a bold new approach to end a diplomatic standoff, urged the Bush administration on Wednesday to send the top U.S. negotiator to North Korea and press for an end to its nuclear weapons program.

Such a mission by Christopher Hill would demonstrate "our peaceful intent," said California Rep. Tom Lantos, the top Democrat on the House International Relations Committee. Panel members quizzed Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns about the so-far futile effort to halt North Korea's nuclear weapons and missiles programs.

Talks involving the U.S., North Korea, South Korea, China, Japan and Russia are expected to resume next month after a suspension of more than a year. Burns said it was not possible yet to announce a precise date.

The U.S. has held sporadic, occasional talks with North Korea in New York and in Beijing. But the administration insists on a six-nation negotiations format in an effort to intensify pressure on the insular communist government.

"The North Korean problem is a regional problem," Burns said. "It poses a threat to all of its neighbors."

But Lantos, the prospective new chairman of the committee when the Democrats take control of Congress in January, said, "the administration's refusal to permit visits (by U.S. diplomats) to North Korea must end and must end now."

Supported by several Democrats on the committee and one Republican, Rep. Jim Leach of Iowa, Lantos said, "The White House must try a new and bold approach to the vexing North Korean problem."

"I don't understand why it is in the United States' interest to keep them isolated," Leach said.

On the Democratic side, Rep. Brad Sherman of California proposed that the United States offer North Korea a nonaggression pact as part of a deal in which the North Koreans permanently and verifiably give up their nuclear weapons.

Rep. Gary Ackerman, D-N.Y., accused the administration of "dithering" and said the U.S. was placing too much reliance on China to stop North Korea's programs. China played a leading diplomatic role in persuading North Korea to end its boycott of negotiations.

GOP Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen of Florida cautioned against concessions or any acts of "appeasement."

Meanwhile, an American nuclear scientist who toured North Korea this month said he believed the North had enough fuel for as many as nine nuclear weapons and the capacity to make about one bomb's worth of fuel a year.

Siegfried Hecker, a former director of the Los Alamos Nuclear Laboratory, met with chief North Korean nuclear scientists during his Oct. 31-Nov. 4 visit. Hecker said that while he learned no technical details about the North's Oct. 9 nuclear test, officials indicated the test was "fully successful."

He said he and the small group of former U.S. officials who made the trip noticed a palpable sense of national pride about the test among the North Koreans they met.

Hecker based his observations on meetings with the director of the North's five-megawatt Yongbyon nuclear facility and with nuclear specialists in China. He said the North Korean nuclear test was most likely "at least partially successful," but the country probably was "still a long way from having a missile-capable nuclear design."

Rice Urges Terror Finance Crackdown In NKorea Allusion (AFP)

AFP, November 16, 2006

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has urged Asia-Pacific nations to crack down on illicit financial activities by "weapons proliferators", in an indirect reference to North Korea.

"Confronting the threats posed by terrorism, proliferation of weapons of mass destruction, natural disaster and pandemic disease is inextricably tied to the prosperity of the region," Rice told APEC ministers meeting in Hanoi.

"We also hope that APEC members will take all necessary actions to prevent the abuse of their financial systems by weapons proliferators."

North Korea's nuclear ambition, put on display last month when Pyongyang carried out its first atomic bomb test, is one of the key issues on the agenda at this week's Asia Pacific Economic Cooperation (APEC) gathering.

The United States is one of five nations involved in disarmament talks with North Korea. A breakthrough came in September 2005, when Pyongyang agreed to scrap its nuclear program in exchange for economic aid and security guarantees.

But the North walked out of the talks a year ago after Washington effectively froze 24 million dollars in North Korean funds by blacklisting a bank in Macau.

The United States said the funds were the suspected proceeds of counterfeiting US dollar "supernotes" and other illicit activities by the regime of Kim Jong-Il.

North Korea boycotted the six-party talks for a year in protest at Washington's freeze and a larger crackdown on accounts elsewhere in Asia.

The APEC meeting comes two weeks after North Korea agreed in secret negotiations in Beijing to return to the six-nation talks, which involve the two Koreas, China, Japan, Russia and the United States.

North Korean Officials Proud Of Their Nuclear Test, U.S. Experts Say (MCT)

By Renee Schoof

McClatchy, November 16, 2006

WASHINGTON - North Korean officials are proud of their country's nuclear test and are unlikely to be persuaded easily to give up their nuclear weapons, a group of Korea experts said Wednesday after a visit to the reclusive communist nation.

The experts, who visited North Korea's capital of Pyongyang from Oct. 31 to Nov. 4, just weeks after the Oct. 9 test, said they were surprised by conditions in the city, where streets were crowded with cars and, something new this year, motorcycles.

"There were also well-dressed people on the streets like I hadn't seen before," said Robert Carlin, a former U.S. intelligence analyst making his 26th visit to North Korea.

Carlin said he saw trucks laden with cabbages, new buildings going up and others freshly painted, and a well-stocked free market whose parking lot was jammed with cars.

Siegfried S. Hecker, a nuclear scientist and former director of the Los Alamos National Laboratory, said he and the others met with the head of North Korea's Yongbyon nuclear center, Ri Hong Sop, but weren't allowed to visit the center. They also spoke with high-ranking officials in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, the army and the government.

The delegation was led by John W. Lewis, a Chinese politics and North Korea expert at Stanford University.

Hecker said that North Korean officials said they remained committed to a Sept. 19, 2005, agreement with the United States that would end the nuclear program in exchange for security guarantees and energy benefits. But Hecker said he concluded it would be harder now to persuade the North Koreans to do so.

Delegation member Charles L. Pritchard, the U.S. special envoy for negotiations with North Korea from 2001 to 2003, said he also believed that the North Koreans would be tougher negotiators.

"A few years ago I'd say it was possible to negotiate an end of the crisis. Now I'm not so sure," Pritchard said. The North Koreans are feeling confident and, in their words, "on an equal footing" with the United States, the former negotiator said.

The group met with Li Gun, deputy director general of the North Korean Ministry for Foreign Affairs, who said North Korea was committed to returning to six-party talks and the eventual denuclearization of the Korean Peninsula, Pritchard said.

Li also told the delegation that North Korea wouldn't use nuclear weapons first and wouldn't sell nuclear weapons and technology to any group, including al-Qaida.

But Pritchard said Li made clear that North Korea had short-term expectations for the upcoming talks with the United States and the four other nations, which North Korea agreed to on Oct. 31.

Li also said that China will unfreeze North Korean assets in a Macau bank and that the United States won't object as a condition of the talks, Pritchard said.

The U.S. government has claimed that North Korea was using Banco Delta Asia to launder illegal profits from drug trafficking, counterfeiting and cigarette smuggling, and it has put pressure on the bank to stop doing business with North Korea.

Li said there had to be progress on Banco Delta Asia first, and he indicated that North Korea next would insist on dropping the sanctions contained in a U.N. Security Council resolution.

U.S. officials have said that the U.N. sanctions should be implemented but that they'll discuss the Macau bank issue at the talks. The six-party talks also include China, South Korea, Russia and Japan.

Pritchard said Li quoted President Reagan on the need to "trust but verify." Li acknowledged that verification would be necessary if North Korea agrees to suspend its nuclear programs, but insisted that it also would be necessary to verify that it receives benefits at each step.

Pritchard said the group immediately e-mailed a report to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice. The Bush administration didn't sanction the trip and hasn't responded, he said.

Hecker suggested in a written report that the United States must do more to address North Korea's security concerns.

He also said that North Korean officials had "little appreciation of the issues of safety and security related to having a nuclear arsenal." North Korea probably has enough plutonium for nine nuclear weapons and can produce enough for one per year over the next few years, he said.

Ri and other officials didn't provide details about the Oct. 9 test, but Chinese nuclear experts put it at about 1 kiloton, which they described as "successful but not perfect," Hecker said.

Many things can go wrong in a test, but a 1-kiloton test isn't a fizzle, as some U.S. officials have suggested, Hecker said. The U.S. atomic bomb dropped on Nagasaki, Japan, produced a 21-kiloton blast.

"A 1-kiloton explosion in Manhattan would be a catastrophe," Hecker said.

US Senator Seeks 10 Billion Dollars For North Korean Human Crisis (AFP)

AFP, November 16, 2006

A bill was introduced in the US Senate calling for the establishment of a 10 billion dollar fund to prepare for any humanitarian crisis in nuclear-armed North Korea.

Bill Frist, the outgoing majority leader in the Senate who introduced the bill, said President George W. Bush should have "all necessary tools at his disposal to deal with foreseeable humanitarian contingencies on and around the Korean Peninsula.

"To make clear our intentions, and to establish a framework for providing assistance in these circumstances, my bill authorizes the creation of a 10 billion dollar 'North Korea Refugee Relief and Reconstruction Fund'", he said.

The proposed legislation was to be "a sign of hope to the people of North Korea, who have suffered for six decades under one of the cruelest regimes the world has ever known," said the retiring senator from Bush's Republican party.

"To the people of North Korea, I say 'we have not forgotten you, and we stand ready to help.'"

The hardline North Korean communist regime led by Kim Jong-Il recently tested a nuclear weapon and launched missiles in defiance of the international community. Human rights watchers have warned that the North Korean people remain vulnerable under the reclusive regime.

Kim's regime allowed as many as one million, and possibly many more, of its own people to die during the famine in the 1990s, according to a report last month commissioned by former Czech president Vaclav Havel, ex-Norwegian prime minister Kjell Bondevik and US Nobel Peace Prize laureate Elie Wiesel.

It said hunger and starvation remained a "persistent" problem and added that over 37 percent of children in North Korea were "chronically malnourished."

North Korea imprisons more than 200,000 people in its modern-day gulag, and it is estimated that more than 400,000 have died in that system over 30 years, the report said.

Frist said he introduced the bill "because of the critical threat posed to international peace and security by the hereditary dictatorship in North Korea."

"There is no doubt in my mind that in the event of massive refugee flows out of North Korea, or either the reunification of North Korea with South Korea or the emergence of a new, more benign regime in North Korea, the United States will step forward to help," he said.

With only a brief period left for Congressional debates and voting, Frist's office does not expect the bill to be approved this year.

The new year will see the Democrats in control of both chambers of Congress after they routed the Republicans in legislative elections last week.

"There would probably not be a vote on the bill in the near future but the Senator introduced it because it was something he thought was important -- to have the resources in place when needed," his spokeswoman Carolyn Weyforth told AFP.

Frist said that to make sure the United States could provide aid immediately to refugees already coming out of North Korea, the bill authorized the president to draw down up to one billion dollars from any government agency.

White House Hunts For Way Into Iran Talks (FT)

By Guy Dinmore

Financial Times, November 16, 2006

Rarely has the Bush administration seemed so confused and defensive about its policy of seeking to isolate Iran as it responds to mounting public and international pressure to find a way out of Iraq, even if that involves making a U-turn and engaging Tehran.

On Monday, in reply to a question about the US opening a dialogue with Iran over Iraq, the president made a direct link with the nuclear issue, demanding that Tehran first verifiably suspend its uranium enrichment programme.

Since then senior officials have had to row back from those comments on the nuclear link. A US offer, extended earlier this year to Tehran to discuss Iraq, can be "reactivated", officials said. "If, in the future, we want to avail ourselves of that channel, then it certainly is a possibility," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said. But he also added that he did not think it was under consideration.

However, David Satterfield, the state department co-ordinator for Iraq, contradicted this assertion. He told a Senate committee on Thursday that the US was reviewing the timing of a "direct dialogue" with Iran on the subject of Iraq. "We are prepared in principle to discuss Iranian activities in Iraq," he said.

Analysts say that as the US scrambles to find an honourable exit from Iraq, opening a new channel to Iran is very much under consideration. Bringing Iran and Syria into the equation is expected to form one of the main proposals of the Iraq Study Group led by former secretary of state James Baker and former Democratic congressman Lee Hamilton.

The imminent departure of Donald Rumsfeld as defence secretary also removes one of the main forces opposed to engagement with Iran. His nominated successor, Robert Gates, is closer to the Baker school of foreign policy "realists" and two years ago co-authored a think-tank report that recommended the US "deal with the current regime rather than wait for it to fall".

"The idea of talking to Iran is now the consensus position," commented Ray Takeyh, an analyst with the Council on Foreign Relations think-tank who also took part in the 2004 report on Iran. "The question is not whether to talk to Iran but how and what to talk about."

Although the US military budget is several times bigger than Iran's entire economic output, Mr Takeyh says the US will find itself negotiating from a position of weakness. "This has got to be the most incompetent administration in history," he said.

James Jeffrey, a senior state department official, echoed the concern about negotiating from a position of weakness and admitted that the US had missed opportunities in the past to deal with Iran. The most recent occasion was in the spring of 2003 when Iran – rocked by the quick defeat of the Iraqi military and the fall of Baghdad – offered a broad dialogue with the US. It was quickly rebuffed.

Now there was a danger, Mr Jeffrey said, that showing a willingness to talk would lead certain regimes – meaning Iran and Syria – to "conclude that, ah-ha, this is out of weakness. 'If these guys were strong, they wouldn't want to talk to us. Because they are weak, we need to simply expand our demands'."

Trita Parsi, an analyst who advocates engagement, says the US cannot conceal its weakness but has limited alternatives. He says that for Iran to be drawn into a dialogue it needs a clear indication that the US is looking to discuss all issues and address a strategic transformation of the relationship, not just a tactical quick fix of the Iraq crisis.

Iran is wary of its last experience of co-operating with the US, when it helped oust the Taliban from Afghanistan in 2001 and install the Karzai government, only to be denounced by Mr Bush weeks later as a member of the "axis of evil" in a State of the Union address that amounted to a call for regime change.

A three-hour meeting last month between Mr Baker and Javad Zarif, Iranian envoy to the UN, was seen as helpful by both sides, says Mr Parsi. Mr Baker was told that Iran would consider helping the US in Iraq if "Washington first changed its attitude towards Iran" – a euphemism for the Bush administration's unwillingness to deal with Iran in a strategic manner.

As Pressure For Talks Grows, Iran And Syria Gain Leverage (WP)

By Robin Wright

The White House is under growing pressure to talk to Iran and Syria to help stabilize Iraq, but mounting violence in Iraq and the Bush administration's political woes give the negotiating edge to Tehran and Damascus and complicate any U.S. outreach, experts say.

The idea of talks is widely expected to be on the list of proposals that will come out of the Iraq Study Group report next month, because co-chairman and former secretary of state James A. Baker III and other members back engaging enemies as well as allies. British Prime Minister Tony Blair this week endorsed talking with Tehran and Damascus, with caveats. The CIA director and the head of the Defense Intelligence Agency said yesterday that talks could help. And an array of experts has encouraged the administration to reach out to the countries that have meddled most in Iraq.

But the Bush administration is already questioning the idea, and even supporters admit that full cooperation by both Iran and Syria may have little impact on the many-sided insurgency. Neither country has much sway over Iraq's Sunnis or the al-Qaeda branch in Iraq, as both are ruled by Shiites or Shiite offshoots.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, traveling yesterday to a conference in Vietnam, said that she is prepared to talk to "anybody, anywhere, anytime" under circumstances in which she believed progress was really possible. "I'm not afraid to talk to anyone," she told reporters. But she dismissed the idea that diplomacy offers any "magic bullets" for Iraq.

The United States has made multiple overtures to Tehran, particularly related to its controversial nuclear program. A year ago, Rice told Congress that Zalmay Khalilzad, U.S. ambassador to Iraq, had been empowered to talk to his Iranian counterpart in Baghdad on Iraq.

"There's no lack of opportunity to talk to the Iranians," she told reporters. "The question is: Is there anything about Iranian behavior that suggests that they are prepared to contribute to stability in Iraq? And I have to say that at this point I don't see it."

Syria has given no indication that it is willing to be a stabilizing force anywhere in the region, including in Iraq, Lebanon and the Arab-Israeli dispute, she added. President Bashar al-Assad's government has "aligned itself with the forces of extremism," she said.

In a briefing Wednesday aboard Air Force One en route to Singapore, national security adviser Stephen J. Hadley all but rejected the idea. "What we need is less talk and more action by Iran," he said.

But experts on both sides of the Iraq debate argue that after decades of tension with both countries, Iran and Syria now have a common interest with the United States in preventing further turmoil in Iraq. "We've gone past the point of being desirable. It's absolutely necessary to talk to them," said Joseph Cirincione, vice president of the Center for American Progress.

Iran fears the spillover of Iraq's political problems on its own large Kurdish, Sunni and Arab minorities in the event of a full-scale civil war. It also was burdened with a refugee problem as more than 2 million people fled wars in neighboring Iraq and Afghanistan.

Syria is also looking for a way out of its isolation. And it fears that Kurdish separatism in Iraq would influence its own restive Kurdish population, said Theodore H. Kattouf, former U.S. ambassador to Syria.

"They have some hardheaded reasons to want to coordinate with us to make sure that our withdrawal, which they want, is not precipitous," said Geoffrey Kemp, a Reagan administration National Security Council staffer.

Yet prospects of U.S. success are limited, analysts warn. At the negotiating table, Iran and Syria would for the first time hold the trump cards after years of public rebukes and punitive sanctions, and would see any overture by Washington as a win for them. The administration could have achieved far more if it had talked to both countries from a position of strength on the eve of war in 2003 or last year, analysts say.

"Neither Iran nor Syria will do a favor for the U.S. without wanting something back -- and what both countries want are things that the U.S. is not willing to give them," said Shaul Bakhash, a George Mason University expert on Iran.

Cooperating with the United States also carries dangers. "Syria and Iran both believe that the U.S. is tilting at windmills and will not lend their leverage to a venture which they see as doomed," said Joshua Landis, a University of Oklahoma specialist who recently spent a year as a Fulbright scholar in Damascus.

Both countries have limited ability to solve the complicated morass of problems in Iraq. In testimony yesterday before the Senate Armed Services Committee, the CIA director, Gen. Michael V. Hayden, said Iran and Syria have varying degrees of influence on Iraq.

"Clearly, both governments could do more. If our dialogue with them could convince them to do more, that their interests are not served by a fracturing of Iraq, then I would say that might be useful," Hayden said.

But on the biggest issue of preventing full-scale civil war, Iran may not be able to rein in Iraq's Shiite militias. "Lots of people in the Shiite community are happy to take Iranian money and arms but they are not willing to take Iranian orders," said Patrick Clawson of the Washington Institute for Near East Policy.

Abba Olmert (WSJ)

By Michael B. Oren

The Wall Street Journal, November 16, 2006

"Israel will not be alone unless it decides to go it alone." With these words, Lyndon B. Johnson greeted Israeli Foreign Minister Abba Eban at the White House on May 26, 1967. The Middle East was in the throes of an escalating crisis. Gamal Abdul Nasser had evicted U.N. peacekeepers from Egypt's border with Israel, blockaded the Straits of Tiran to Israeli shipping, and called on the Arab world to "throw the Jews into the sea." Israel had no intention of waiting to see if Nasser would carry out his pledge, or of keeping its troops on the permanent state of alert that was bankrupting the country. And so the Israeli government sent its foreign minister to seek Johnson's approval for mounting a pre-emptive strike. But LBJ only disappointed Eban. Though hostile to Nasser and firmly supportive of Israel, the president was hamstrung by America's imbroglio in Vietnam and by the drop in his domestic support. The most he offered the Israelis was Washington's help in mobilizing international action against Egypt. Beyond that, there was only that repeated, cryptic phrase, "Israel will not be alone unless it decides to go it alone."

Perhaps a similar message was imparted by George W. Bush in his meeting earlier this week with Israel's Prime Minister Ehud Olmert. Much like 1967, Israel faces a Middle Eastern leader who has repeatedly sworn to wipe it off the map, and to that end is assiduously trying to acquire nuclear weapons. Like Nasser, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad can cripple Israel economically by keeping it in a state of alert, driving away foreign investment and tourism. In the absence of international commitment to thwart Iran's nuclear plans, Israel has no choice but to consider striking pre-emptively. Doing so, however, requires explicit U.S. support, or at the very least, an indication that the U.S. will not oppose such action. Like Eban 40 years earlier, Mr. Olmert came to Washington in search of a green light.

But the U.S. is hardly in the position to sanction an Israeli attack. Bogged down in Iraq and hemorrhaging political capital at home, Mr. Bush resembles Johnson in his inability to approve risky military initiatives. As inimical to Mr. Ahmadinejad as his predecessor was to Nasser, and at least as sympathetic to the Jewish state, Mr. Bush is nevertheless unable to undertake a unilateral attack against Iran or even to endorse an Israeli one.

This was bad news for Mr. Olmert. The Israeli prime minister hoped to secure a hard-and-fast timetable for interdicting Iran's nuclear program first by diplomacy and then, if that failed, by force. Instead, he heard that the U.S. would only support measures to isolate Iran economically and balked at the use of bombs. Though he and his administration have routinely stated a determination to prevent Iran from obtaining strategic capabilities, Mr. Bush, in the aftermath of his party's electoral defeats, avoided all public mention of armed power as a means of achieving that goal.

The only option for the U.S., then, is international sanctions. These, however, have proven singularly inadequate in quashing the nuclear aspirations of North Korea -- a country far more financially fragile than Iran -- and lack the vital support of Russia, China and France. Iran has also threatened to retaliate for sanctions by cutting back oil production and increasing its support for terror.

Back in 1967, Johnson also tried to apply international pressure on Egypt. He planned to issue a multilateral declaration condemning the closure of Tiran and to create a convoy of ships from 26 nations to physically challenge the blockade. But fearing for their oil supplies, European countries refused to cooperate with Johnson's démarche, while Egypt threatened violence against any attempt to reopen the straits. In the end, only four countries were willing to sign the declaration and only two volunteered ships for the convoy.

Mr. Bush is unlikely to be more successful than Johnson in marshalling international strictures against a defiant Middle Eastern regime. Nor was Mr. Olmert liable to extract from Mr. Bush more concrete backing for pre-emptive action than Eban did from LBJ. At most, Mr. Bush could have signaled his sympathy for Israel's plight and for the steps it must take to ensure its survival. The light Mr. Olmert received in Washington was probably not green, but neither was it flashing red.

Eban left the White House disappointed and confused. Neither he nor the Israeli government could decipher the meaning of the message "Israel will not be alone unless it decides to go it alone." Was the president opposed to an assault against Egypt, as some of the ministers believed, or was he indicating his willingness to look the other way while Israel attacked? Ultimately, Israeli leaders concluded that, while the U.S. might condemn the action, it would probably do nothing to stop it. Johnson, for his part, understood that the Israelis had lost faith in international diplomacy and would interpret his words as a go. "They're going to hit," the president sighed, "and there's nothing we can do about it."

Lyndon Johnson indeed did little to prevent Israel from launching its surprise attack against Egypt on June 5 or, after Jordan and Syria joined the war, from advancing into the West Bank and the Golan Heights. The Six-Day War was a seismic event that profoundly altered the Middle East, with reverberations that continue to convulse the region. An Israeli strike at Iran's nuclear facilities could well have a similar impact, especially as Mr. Ahmadinejad and the mullahs are certain to react violently.

Mr. Olmert and his government must consider such consequences as they decide on Israel's next moves. The ramifications of that decision are certain to affect America as well. Many Arabs to this day believe that the U.S. was complicit in the Six-Day War, and even that American pilots flew Israeli planes. Such rumors will again be rife if Israel attacks Iran, and especially if Israeli jets pass through Iraq's American-controlled airspace. Israel may indeed act alone, but in the minds of a great many people in the Middle East, the U.S. acts with it.

Six Major Powers Fail To Bread Deadlock On Proposed UN Sanctions (AFP)

AFP, November 16, 2006

Six major UN powers failed to break the deadlock in their bid to agree on a package of targeted sanctions against Iran over its refusal to suspend sensitive nuclear fuel work.

"We did not make any progress today," US Ambassador to the United Nations John Bolton told reporters after envoys of the six powers wound up their sixth informal session in three weeks on a European draft resolution urging nuclear and ballistic missile-related sanctions against Iran.

The meeting at France's UN mission in New York was attended by ambassadors from Germany and the UN Security Council's permanent members -- Britain, China, France, Russia and the United States.

"We'll meet again in the near future," said Bolton, without saying exactly when.

He added that the sanctions issue may also be discussed at the foreign minister level on the margins of the weekend meeting of the Asia Pacific Economic Cooperation group in Hanoi.

Western countries suspects Iran is covertly seeking to build nuclear weapons.

Tehran, which insists that its nuclear program is peaceful, has rejected UN demands that it halt uranium enrichment, a process that can produce fuel for electricity generation but can also be used to produce the raw material for a nuclear warhead.

The draft put forward by Britain, France and Germany also includes travel bans and financial restrictions on Iranian scientists working on the nuclear and missile programs.

Russia and China, which both maintain close energy and trade ties with Tehran, want to drastically reduce the scope of the sanctions while the US side is pushing for even tougher sanctions.

Iran Dismisses U.N. Report On Uranium (AP)

By Nasser Karimi

AP, November 16, 2006

Iran on Wednesday dismissed a U.N. report that inspectors found new traces of enriched uranium and plutonium at a nuclear waste facility, saying it had already explained that discovery.

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad insisted the West will gradually back down in its standoff with Iran and eventually accept its nuclear program.

"While the West tries to thwart the progress of our nation, time is on our side," Ahmadinejad told a crowd in Sanandaj, the capital city of Iran's Kurdistan province. "They would have to take one step back with every passing day and approve the right of the Iranian people."

Oil-rich Iran has claimed it has a right to a nuclear program it says is aimed at producing energy. But the United States suspects Tehran has ambitions to make nuclear weapons.

Ahmadinejad's comments came a day after an International Atomic Energy Agency report said its experts have found unexplained plutonium and highly enriched uranium traces in a nuclear waste facility in Iran. Both materials can be used in building a nuclear warhead, though one U.N. official said the uranium was not enriched to weapons-grade level.

Alaeddin Boroujerdi, head of the parliamentary committee on National Security and Foreign Policy, called the report "an old story."

"This is an old story and contains no new points," Boroujerdi told the official Islamic Republic News Agency on Wednesday. "Iran has submitted a comprehensive report on the issue to the IAEA. It will be convincing."

He did not elaborate on the source of the traces. Iran has said that previous traces of enriched uranium found by inspectors came from equipment that it bought from abroad without knowing of the contamination.

"What was mentioned in (IAEA chief Mohamed) ElBaradei's report are issues that Iran has already answered many times. Tehran, based on the safeguards, has fully cooperated with the IAEA," the official Islamic Republic News Agency quoted Foreign Ministry spokesman Mohammed Ali Hosseini as saying.

A senior U.N. official who was familiar with the report cautioned against reading too much into the new findings, saying Iran had explained both and they could plausibly be classified as byproducts of peaceful nuclear activities.

The official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to discuss the report publicly, said that while the uranium traces were enriched to a higher level than needed to generate power, they were below weapons-grade.

The report, prepared for next week's meeting of the 35-nation IAEA, also faulted Tehran for not cooperating with the agency's attempts to investigate suspicious aspects of Iran's nuclear program that have led to fears it might be interested in developing nuclear arms.

The U.S. and its European allies are currently negotiating with Russia and China over a draft U.N. Security Council resolution that would penalize Iran for its refusal to respect an Aug. 31 deadline for halting uranium enrichment.

Russia and China have extensive trade with Iran and are rejecting the harsh sanctions that the Western allies want to impose.

The five veto-wielding Security Council members — the U.S., Russia, China, Britain and France — and Germany have now held six rounds of closed-door talks.

John Bolton, the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, said Wednesday there were still "wide gaps" between the Russians and Europeans. Asked whether there had been any progress since the talks began, Bolton said, "Well, we didn't make any progress today — let's leave it at that."

President Bush, eager for Russian help in ongoing nuclear disputes with North Korea and Iran, visited President Vladimir Putin Wednesday in Moscow at an airport stopover on his way to Asia.

U.S. National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley played down differences between Washington and Moscow, saying negotiations on U.N. resolutions are "a little bit like sausage making."

"It's not pretty and a lot of it spills out to the public, but I think the international community has held together on this issue and I think it will again," he said.

China Could Find Congress A Chillier Place (WSJ)

By Neil King Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, November 16, 2006

WASHINGTON -- She scuffled with police on Tiananmen Square, protested the visits of Chinese leaders to the White House, and calls the U.S. trade relationship with China "a disaster."

When Democratic Rep. Nancy Pelosi becomes House speaker in January, her views on China could set the tone for a new Congress looking to get tough on Beijing. Mrs. Pelosi's criticisms include human-rights abuses and unfair trade practices, as well as allegations that China is manipulating its currency and seeking technologies to undermine U.S. national security.

Just how much Mrs. Pelosi and other top Democrats will focus on China -- and how much influence they will have on China policy -- is hard to predict. But apprehensions run high in Beijing and Washington that a Pelosi-led, Democrat-controlled House could seize on China trade and security issues to bash President Bush, much as congressional Republicans did in the final years of the Clinton administration.

"There is definitely going to be a shift" in the House, said Republican Rep. Mark Kirk of Illinois, co-chair of the bipartisan, pro-engagement, U.S.-China Working Group in the House. "The question is whether the shift will be effectively blocked by the Senate and the White House."

China's ambassador to Washington, Zhou Wenzhong, declined to comment on Mrs. Pelosi, and said that "mainstream Democrats basically support the current policy." Still, he expressed concern that the new Congress could be "more concerned about trade and about human-rights issues." Administration officials say that in private conversations, Chinese diplomats have expressed deeper worries about the new Congress than their ambassador has in public remarks.

The direction the Democrats take on China will depend on the strength of the economy before the 2008 presidential election and the party's overall strategy leading up to 2008. Some Democrats say the party may not need to make President Bush's China policy a key issue over the next two years, with Mr. Bush already beleaguered by the war in Iraq and rising nuclear threats in Iran and North Korea.

The Bush administration hasn't taken a hard-line approach toward China, with Beijing a pivotal player on global-security issues of concern to the U.S. The two countries have also strengthened ties and exchanges in many other areas, such as law enforcement and civil-service training.

"Whenever we have split government, Congress sees that as an opening to attack the administration's China policy," said Jeffrey Bader, a former Clinton official on China who now heads the Brookings Institution's Thornton China Center.

For months, Mrs. Pelosi has joined top Republican lawmakers and Democrats, including New York Rep. Charles Rangel, next chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, in calling on the Bush administration to crack down on China's trade practices through the World Trade Organization.

Mrs. Pelosi and a bipartisan cadre of lawmakers have urged the administration to put more pressure on China to further loosen its currency controls and take action against rampant piracy of U.S. goods. Critics say Beijing has kept the yuan artificially low, making its exports cheaper and fueling a huge trade surplus with the U.S. She has urged the U.S. to file a WTO case on that issue, too.

Other Democrats said they plan to push hard on Chinese labor standards, and have hinted that future trade restrictions could hinge on findings of unfair labor practices in China. Both Mrs. Pelosi and Mr. Rangel have argued that China's holdings of U.S. Treasury bills, valued at $339 billion as of August, pose a threat to U.S. national security.

Speaking after last week's midterm elections, which put both houses of Congress under Democratic control, Mr. Rangel said it might be hard to pursue China on trade violations because of its huge financial leverage over the U.S. "But at least we can be angry ... and try to protect American industry," he said.

Mr. Rangel said he intends to defer to the administration on China policy, at least to start, and wants to work alongside Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson and others, "rather than Congress mandating that they do something."

Mrs. Pelosi's aides said her new prominence won't change her views on China, particularly when it comes to the country's human-rights abuses and lack of religious freedom. But they said she will have a lot on her plate, and won't try to dictate the direction of House policy on China at the committee level. Mrs. Pelosi declined to comment.

The most important change, Pelosi aides said, is that she will allow tough China legislation to come to a full vote in the House, instead of keeping bills bottled up in committee, as many previous speakers have.

Mrs. Pelosi's district includes San Francisco's Chinatown, which has traditionally taken an anti-Beijing stance.

After Beijing crushed the democracy protests in Tiananmen Square in 1989, Mrs. Pelosi battled the first Bush administration and helped to protect Chinese students in the U.S. She also worked to make preferential trade benefits to China conditional on its showing "significant progress" on human rights.

In September 1991, Chinese police stopped Mrs. Pelosi and two other U.S. lawmakers on Tiananmen Square after they unfurled a pro-democracy banner. The Chinese foreign ministry called the move "a premeditated, anti-Chinese farce."

Mrs. Pelosi, along with several prominent House Republicans, continued to push for changes in China policy during the Clinton administration. In 1997, as Mr. Clinton was greeting Chinese leader Jiang Zemin at the White House, Mrs. Pelosi, at a nearby rally, denounced the visit.

In March, as the White House prepared to welcome Chinese President Hu Jintao, Mrs. Pelosi, Mr. Rangel and 14 other Democrats wrote to Mr. Bush, urging the U.S. to file more cases against China and other countries within the WTO. In an opinion piece published in the Los Angeles Times the day Mr. Hu arrived, Mrs. Pelosi wrote: "The American people want the administration to show resolve in standing up to Beijing, to demonstrate that we believe that the Chinese people deserve freedom."

Myron Brilliant, head of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce's Asia division, said Democrats harbor "a lot of displeasure at the lack of follow-through in China on the trade front." He said the chamber is taking a "wait-and-see attitude" toward the next Congress, but would mobilize with other business groups if the House tries to address China issues through legislation.

Using "unilateral swords are not actions that we can support," he said.

Palestinian Rocket Fire Kills Israeli Woman (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, November 16, 2006

JERUSALEM, Nov. 15 -- An Israeli woman was killed Wednesday in a Palestinian rocket strike on the town of Sderot, prompting some Israeli lawmakers to demand a sharp military response in an effort to end such attacks from the Gaza Strip.

The death of Faina Slotzker, 57, was the first fatality inside Israel in a Palestinian rocket strike since July 2005. It brought competing assertions of responsibility from the Hamas and Islamic Jihad movements, both of which said the attack on a residential neighborhood was retaliation for Israeli shelling last week that killed 20 Palestinian civilians in the Gaza town of Beit Hanoun.

At least nine rockets landed Wednesday in Israel, including four in the city of Ashkelon north of Gaza. Two Israelis were reported seriously wounded by the rockets: a 17-year-old boy and a 24-year-old man identified as a bodyguard of Defense Minister Amir Peretz, who lives in Sderot. Doctors at Barzilai Hospital in Ashkelon said the man's legs had to be amputated.

Peretz, under mounting pressure to end rocket fire from Gaza that has menaced Israeli border cities for years, pledged that those responsible would "pay a heavy price." Some lawmakers in Jerusalem demanded swift retaliation to deter Palestinians from future strikes.

"Israel will pay a heavier price if it will not operate immediately" in Gaza, Danny Naveh, a member of the Likud Party, said in parliament. Echoing warnings of other lawmakers that Israel's frontline towns were being abandoned by the military, Naveh said, "Any day that passes without a large-scale operation creates the feeling that the fate of Sderot is not that of Tel Aviv," Israel's largest city.

Slotzker was the seventh person killed by Palestinian rocket strikes inside Israel since such attacks began in 2000, at the start of the most recent Palestinian uprising. The majority of the victims lived in Sderot, a town of 20,000 that sits only a few miles east of the Gaza border. In addition, a Bedouin shepherd and his 17-year-old son were killed in March when they detonated an unexploded rocket in a field near Sderot.

Hundreds of the crude rockets, known as Qassams, have been fired into Israel over the last six years. Launched from makeshift tripods, the rockets are highly inaccurate and pack little explosive force, although they have damaged schools, public buildings and homes in border towns.

Israel withdrew its settlers and soldiers from Gaza 14 months ago, but the army has pushed back into the strip several times since June 25, when gunmen, some of whom belonged to Hamas's military wing, captured an Israeli corporal. The army has fired more than 10,000 artillery shells toward Qassam launch sites in Gaza since the withdrawal, leading to what until recently had been a steady decline in the number of rockets landing in Israel.

In recent weeks, Israeli officials have signaled that a large operation inside Gaza might be necessary to end the rocket attacks and weapons smuggling through tunnels along the strip's southern border with Egypt.

Briefing foreign journalists earlier this week, an Israeli military official said that "tons" of explosives have entered Gaza through the tunnels since the Israeli withdrawal, including propellants the official said were used to magnify the rockets' blast and range. He singled out Hamas, now running the Palestinian Authority, as "a growing military threat to Israel."

The warning came after weeks of stepped-up Israeli military operations in the strip that failed to stop the attacks and inflamed the passions of residents of Gaza's border towns and the armed groups at war with the Jewish state. An intensive six-day operation inside Beit Hanoun killed more than 60 Palestinians, just over half of them gunmen. One Israeli soldier also was killed.

Gaza Rocket Kills Israeli; Retaliatory Strike Launched (WT)

By Joshua Mitnick

The Washington Times, November 16, 2006

SDEROT, Israel -- Rockets fired from the Gaza Strip into the town of Sderot yesterday killed an Israeli woman, critically injured two persons and narrowly missed the home of Defense Minister Amir Peretz, raising pressure on the government to order the army back across the border.

Israeli warplanes raided the Gaza Strip overnight, hours after the Palestinian rocket attack.

The retaliatory attack followed a promise by Mr. Peretz to hit back and a warning that militants would "pay a heavy price."

Fatima Slutsker, a 57-year-old mother of two, died of wounds sustained when the rocket struck early yesterday in a street in the town of Sderot, three miles north of Gaza, police and medics said.

Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, who was in Los Angeles for meetings with Jewish community leaders, ordered the army to continue its lethal four-month offensive in the coastal strip after the death.

"Olmert has been updated and spoke on the phone with the defense minister and instructed him to continue to act against Qassam rocket fire and infrastructure," Mr. Olmert's spokeswoman, Miri Eisin, told reporters in Los Angeles.

The death of the Sderot woman was the first fatality caused by one of the crude Qassam rockets in more than a year, and it highlighted the limited effectiveness of a recent weeklong offensive against Palestinian militants holed up in the northern Gaza village of Beit Hanoun.

It also served as a reminder that Palestinian militants, like Hezbollah, are able to paralyze an Israeli city -- however small and nonstrategic. Members of Mr. Olmert's Cabinet said not enough is being done to shut down the rocket attacks.

"The military's activities aren't satisfactory," said Public Security Minister Avi Dichter. The Associated Press quoted him as saying Israel must find a way to halt the attacks, "whether that means a ground operation, an air operation or other special operations."

Israeli officials have said the army should retake the Philadelphi corridor along Gaza's border with Egypt to halt weapons smuggling.

Israeli intelligence officers say the corridor has been used by Palestinian militants to bring in anti-tank missiles and material for unmanned attack drones -- equipment that will make Israelis "miss" the days of the Qassams, said Sderot Mayor Eli Moyal.

"From day to day, the firing is becoming more precise, more fatal and more dangerous," wrote Ron Ben-Yishai, a veteran security-affairs commentator writing on a Web site linked with the Yediot Ahronot newspaper. "What the government doesn't do today will be more difficult tomorrow."

But some analysts said Israel should postpone any major military operation in Gaza to enable the formation of a more moderate Palestinian "unity government" that could improve security in Gaza and possibly restart peace negotiations.

Israel hopes that ongoing talks between Hamas and Fatah will produce a new government that would accept international demands laid out by the so-called Quartet -- the European Union, the United Nations, the U.S. and Russia -- and possibly offer a prisoner swap for Cpl. Gilad Shalit, the soldier held in captivity in Gaza since June 25.

"This is the best-case scenario," said Yossi Alpher, editor of a Middle East op-ed Web site, bitterlemons.org. "If all of that happens, then you have a good reason not to launch an offensive."

Palestinian militants rushed to take credit for the attack while residents of Sderot, located near the Negev Desert, complained that the government has failed to find a remedy for the daily trauma over the past six years.

Frustration with the government has left one community leader with a tinge of cynicism: He suggested that Sderot might have gotten more attention in Israel if residents had fled the city as did residents of northern Israel during the summer's border war with Hezbollah.

"Maybe we made a mistake" by refusing to flee, said Alon Davidi, a local activist who supports re-establishing an Israeli buffer zone in northern Gaza to push back the attackers. "Maybe this is what we need to do. People don't appreciate it when people just bite their lips and stay put."

Other residents say they are wary of proposals to reconquer Gaza. As he awaited tax officials to assess the damage from a Qassam rocket that severely damaged his home and left a small ditch in his yard, Shimon Ganam said Israel's military operations in Gaza have only triggered more rocket attacks on the city.

"The cease-fire a year and a half ago is the only thing that brought us security," he said, standing next to a house with an entire wall missing, shrapnel pockmarks, and the roof beams exposed. "Now we're being held hostage."

Hamas Claims Responsibility For Fatal Rocket Attack (CHIT)

By Joel Greenberg

Chicago Tribune, November 16, 2006

SDEROT, Israel -- Rockets fired from the Gaza Strip killed a woman and wounded several other people in this border town Wednesday, drawing warnings of a military response from Israeli leaders.

It was the first fatal Palestinian rocket strike on Israel since it withdrew from the Gaza Strip last year. The attacks have continued despite repeated army raids in an effort to halt the fire.

The armed wing of Hamas claimed responsibility for the attack, saying it was retaliating for an Israeli shelling last week that killed 19 Palestinian civilians in the Gaza Strip town of Beit Hanoun. The militant Islamic Jihad group said it also had fired rockets.

The latest salvos raised the prospect of further Israeli action against militants in Gaza, with some Cabinet ministers calling for a tough response.

"Our action in Gaza will continue without interruption," said Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, who was meeting American Jewish leaders in Los Angeles. "We will decide on additional steps as required to continue fighting the unceasing, murderous terror from Gaza."

One rocket that hit Sderot slammed into a sidewalk about 150 yards from the house of Defense Minister Amir Peretz, who was not home. The explosion killed a passerby, Faina Slotzker, 57, and seriously wounded a security guard patrolling near the minister's residence, mangling his legs. Several people were slightly hurt.

Galit Salim, 15, said she had been nearby on her way to school when she heard the incoming rocket alert, "Color Red," broadcast over loudspeakers a little after 8 a.m.

"I ran back home and heard a powerful boom," she said. "There was a strong smell of smoke. I went over there and saw two people without legs. The woman was frozen, she didn't respond. The other person was moving. I was shocked."

The blast shattered the windows in the home of Leah Aroch, 74, whose house is a few yards away. Shards of glass covered her living room and the pillow of her bed. "I had just gotten up after my dog rushed in when I heard the boom. The whole house was filled with smoke," she said.

Outside on the brick sidewalk, a shallow pit and a medic's surgical gloves marked the spot where the rocket had fallen.

Hours later another rocket landed in the town, seriously wounding a 17-year-old, the army said. Four more rockets landed in the coastal city of Ashkelon but caused no casualties.

Peretz met with top army officers to discuss a response.

DOJ_NMG_0095392

"We will act against all those involved in firing Qassam rockets, from the heads of the terrorist organizations down to the last activist," Peretz said in a statement. "The terror organizations will pay a heavy price."

But military action has proved ineffective in halting the rocket strikes, often triggering more.

Last week's lethal shelling of Beit Hanoun, which the army said was caused by a technical malfunction, came after a weeklong raid in the town that left widespread destruction and more than 50 people dead, both militants and civilians. Yet rocket attacks continued from other areas during the incursion and resumed from around Beit Hanoun after the troops pulled out.

"People here are defending themselves," Ghazi Hamad, spokesman for the Hamas-led Palestinian government, told Israel Radio from Gaza. "If the Israeli side is willing to stop all its actions, we have no problem with the Palestinian side also stopping."

The continuing rocket strikes, and angry criticism by Sderot residents who say they are fed up with living in fear, are likely to increase the pressure on the Israeli government to respond to the attacks, which began more than four years ago.

The crude, inaccurate rockets rarely cause casualties or damage, but previous strikes into Israel have killed six people since 2004, and the threat has terrified people in Sderot, a town of 20,000 less than a mile from the Gaza border fence.

Eli Moyal, the mayor, counseled stronger military action. "We have to create an equation that it won't be worth it for the Palestinians to shoot," he told Israel Radio.

Public Security Minister Avi Dichter, a former head of the Shin Bet security service, told Army Radio that Israel should broaden its operations to bring about a "complete halt" to rocket fire, "whether that means a ground operation, or an air operation or other special operations."

Some Sderot residents also called for harsher military measures, saying their nerves were frayed by the repeated alarms and rocket blasts.

"I fear most for my grandchildren, who wake up at night frightened by the booms," said Haya Ziegler, 58. "You live in constant fear of what will happen any minute. This is no way to live."

But Aroch, the woman living near the site of the deadly strike, said that military action had proved futile and that only talks, even with Hamas, could solve the problem.

"We have to put an end to this," she said. "We have to talk to them. We have to get to a cease-fire."

'Human Rights' Council (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 16, 2006

When the U.N.'s Human Rights Council came into existence earlier this year over U.S. objections, we argued that the new organization offered no improvements over the discredited Human Rights Commission it replaced. Turns out we were wrong: The new Council has been worse.

Among the many problems with the old Commission -- other than a membership that included Zimbabwe, Sudan and Cuba -- was its obsessive focus on Israel. As legal scholar Anne Bayefsky has pointed out, in 40 years the Commission dedicated more than a quarter of its resolutions to scoring Israel while never once condemning repression in China.

It was partly for this reason that the old Commission had to go, and why solons such as Kenneth Roth of Human Rights Watch and former Colorado Senator Tim Wirth of the U.N. Foundation urged the Bush Administration to endorse the Council, with Mr. Wirth describing it as "an important step forward in the fight for global human rights."

That was in March. The Council has since not been able to agree on a resolution condemning the government of Sudan for its atrocities in Darfur. Instead, the sole object of its censures to date has been -- drum roll, please -- Israel.

In July, the Council condemned Israeli operations in the West Bank and Gaza, which had been prompted by the killing of two Israeli soldiers in Israel and the hostage-taking of a third. In August it cited Israel for "massive violations of human-rights" in Lebanon, never mind the kidnapping of two Israeli soldiers by Hezbollah that had caused the war. Now the Council has dispatched "fact-finders" to Gaza to report on the latest fighting.

We won't hold our breath waiting for a balanced report. Meantime, perhaps Messrs. Roth and Wirth can reflect on what their credulity has achieved.

War Between Islamists, Government Is Brewing In Somalia (MCT)

By Shashank Bengali

McClatchy Newspapers, November 16, 2006

NAIROBI, Kenya - Five months after Islamist militias defeated a coalition of CIA-financed warlords, Somalia appears to be sliding toward a major war that diplomats fear will draw thousands of foreign fighters to the Islamist side and spill into neighboring countries.

The rise of the Islamists, who took control of the capital, Mogadishu, in June and since have seized most of southern Somalia, already was a setback for U.S. counterterrorism efforts in the region, where al-Qaida loyalists are believed to be hiding. A full-scale war would be a major test for Bush administration policy in a place that Osama bin Laden has called a battlefield in his war against the West.

Iran, Syria, Libya, Egypt, Saudi Arabia, Djibouti and Eritrea are backing the Islamists with a dizzying influx of weapons, supplies and military personnel, according to a new United Nations report to be presented Friday to the U.N. Security Council. The support ranges from uniforms to first-aid kits to surface-to-air missiles, and, in one case, guerrilla training at a camp in Syria, the report says.

On the other side is Somalia's weak interim government, backed by U.S. ally Ethiopia, which the report says has sent thousands of troops to protect the government's hold on its only major outpost, the town of Baidoa, 150 miles northwest of Mogadishu. Uganda and Yemen are providing weapons.

A senior U.S. military officer conceded last week that the U.S. has no strategy in place should war break out and denied that the U.S. government is using Ethiopia as a proxy against the Islamists. "The U.S. position is we don't want them actively involved," said the officer, who briefed reporters in Nairobi on condition of anonymity.

But some observers said the United States hasn't discouraged Ethiopia, whose leader, Meles Zenawi, has said he won't tolerate a fundamentalist regime on his borders.

The Islamists have disavowed ties to terrorist groups, but U.S. officials accuse their supreme leader, Hassan Dahir Aweys, of having links to al-Qaida. Last week, the U.S. Embassy in Kenya, citing messages from Aweys posted on Islamist Web sites, warned of potential suicide attacks in Kenya and Ethiopia.

The new U.N. report, assembled by a panel of experts monitoring a long-ignored arms embargo, said hundreds of battle-hungry foreign jihadists, some of them trained in suicide bombing and assassination techniques, have joined the Islamists in Somalia.

The spark for a conflict could come from Ethiopia or from its enemy, Eritrea, the Islamists' chief sponsor and, the U.N. report says, a conduit for Arab support. Ethiopia and Eritrea fought a grisly war in 1998-2000 over a border that's still disputed. Eritrea is also thought to have thousands of troops in Somalia.

The findings of the U.N. report couldn't be independently verified. But virtually everyone agrees that the prospects for war are high.

"This scenario is the one that we all feared, that the threat of war could reach these proportions," said Matt Bryden, a veteran analyst who consults for the International Crisis Group think tank. "Nothing is preventing things (from) moving in this direction."

Somalia has been a black hole for U.S. policy in Africa for more than a decade, since the deaths of 18 soldiers in the 1993 "Black Hawk Down" episode in Mogadishu precipitated the withdrawal of 25,000 U.S. troops. There's been no official U.S. presence in Somalia since.

After Sept. 11, 2001, the Bush administration saw Somalia's mix of poverty and anarchy as a potentially dangerous breeding ground for terrorists. In 2005, CIA operatives began clandestinely funneling money to Mogadishu warlords in exchange for intelligence on terror suspects - an operation that fell apart in June when the Islamists drove the hated warlords from the city.

The U.N. report says that the Islamists - officially a federation of Muslim sharia law courts - have quickly become the most powerful force in the country. They've cracked down on crime by imposing Muslim law and reopened Mogadishu's airport and seaport, boosting economic activity.

With help from Arab allies, they've organized their once-patchwork militias into a coherent fighting force, amassed a huge range of arms and military vehicles, recruited foreign fighters to their cause and begun formal training camps.

The report also details cooperation between the Islamists and the militant Lebanese group Hezbollah. About 720 Somalis fought alongside Hezbollah in this summer's war against Israel in exchange for support and training from Hezbollah patrons Syria and Iran, including guerrilla training of 200 Somalis in Syria in July, the report says.

The Islamists are "fully capable of turning Somalia into an Iraq-type situation, replete with roadside and suicide bombers, assassinations and other forms of terrorist and insurgent-type activities," the report said.

A spokesman for the Islamists, Abdirahin Ali Muudey, denied receiving aid from outside Somalia. "There is not any country (that) supports us with military equipment," he said. "All those countries, especially Syria and Iran - even our officials have never visited those countries in their life."

As face-to-face talks between the Islamists and the interim government have fallen apart, Islamist forces have moved to within 20 miles of Baidoa, where thousands of Ethiopian troops are believed to be waiting. Analysts say recent heavy rains, which have made dirt roads impassable, may be the only thing stalling the outbreak of major hostilities.

The Bush administration, led by the State Department's top Africa official, Jendayi Frazer, has been pushing for the deployment of a multinational African peacekeeping force. But the U.N. report warns that inserting foreign troops could actually provoke a military confrontation.

A war would likely involve fighting near Baidoa, as well as near the Ethiopia-Somalia border, 150 miles to Baidoa's northwest. Analysts note that much of southern Ethiopia's population is ethnic Somali, and the Islamists might be able to count on support from Somali rebel groups in Ethiopia.

There also are reports that the Islamists have been amassing anti-aircraft weaponry, an indication that they expect Ethiopia to use jet aircraft to bomb targets in Mogadishu, including the airport and seaport.

If hostilities drag on, fighting could spill over into Kenya, which has its own population of disaffected ethnic Somalis as well as Islamic extremist groups operating along the coastline. Analysts believe that a protracted conflict could draw those groups to the Islamists' side.

Over the weekend, another front appeared to open up several hundred miles north, near the key semi-autonomous region of Puntland, home to a seaport that provides the Baidoa-based government's only revenue other than foreign contributions. Islamist forces battled fighters loyal to the government and to former warlord Abdi Qaybdid, capturing a town and reportedly seizing several machine-gun-mounted pickups, known as "technicals."

"There are all these different friction points," said Mario Raffaelli, Italy's special envoy to Somalia. "Any one of them can be the starting point for a fight."

McClatchy special correspondent Mahad Elmi contributed to this report from Mogadishu, Somalia.

GAO Audit Finds Waste In Cuban Aid Program (WP)

By Karen DeYoung

Nearly all of the $74 million a federal agency has spent on contracts to promote democracy in Cuba over the past decade has been distributed without competitive bidding or oversight in a program that opened the door to waste and fraud, according to a report released yesterday by the Government Accountability Office.

In one of the more extreme cases of apparent abuse, the GAO said a Miami-based group used government money to purchase "a gas chainsaw, computer gaming equipment and software (including Nintendo Game Boys and Sony PlayStations), a mountain bike, leather coats, cashmere sweaters, crab meat, and Godiva chocolates."

The group said in its grant application to the U.S. Agency for International Development that it would use the money "to provide humanitarian assistance and information to [Cuban] dissidents and their families." The director of the grant recipient, Accion Democratica Cubana, told the Miami Herald that all the luxury items -- but not the chainsaw -- were sent to Cuba. But GAO author David Gootnick said the lack of documentation made that impossible to determine.

Rep. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.), who requested the audit along with Rep. William D. Delahunt (D-Mass.), said the lack of oversight and the failure to follow government rules led to creation of a money trough that existed largely to provide jobs and operating funds to Miami-based activists who oppose Cuba's communist government.

"I think that this administration and to some extent the last wanted simply to curry favor with the Cuban American exile community," Flake said. "It's been kind of a bipartisan thing, and you haven't had anybody really challenge it. We just kind of turned away."

Delahunt, currently the ranking minority member of the House International Relations subcommittee on oversight and investigations, said at a Capitol Hill news conference that he would hold hearings on issues raised in the audit when the new Congress convenes under Democratic leadership.

Flake and Delahunt chair the bipartisan Cuba Working Group, which has pushed unsuccessfully for changes in long-standing travel restrictions and economic sanctions -- tightened by the Bush administration -- that prohibit sending virtually anything to Cuba. "What is striking about this," Flake said of the democracy program, "is we're basically spending money to beat our own embargo."

Under Clinton-era legislation, USAID distributes money to U.S. groups to send surreptitious aid -- including food, medicine and office supplies -- to Cuba and non-monetary assistance to political dissidents and independent journalists trying to operate within the island's tightly controlled communist system. The administration has promised an additional $80 million in funding over the next two years and expanded the program to include detailed plans for a transition to democracy in Cuba. Planning has accelerated with President Fidel Castro's relinquishment of power to his brother, Raul. Although the official Cuban government position is that Fidel Castro is recovering from surgery and will return to office, U.S. intelligence officials have said they believe he has terminal cancer.

In its official response to the 59-page GAO report, USAID said that it was "taking issue" with unspecified findings but that it would "seek to improve agency performance in managing, monitoring and evaluating this assistance."

GAO auditors began with a cursory examination of the 50 grants that were made under the program from 1996 to 2005. Twenty-eight of the grants, it said, were "modified" after the fact in ways that extended agreed-upon completion dates by an average of one to three years and "increased the aggregate value of these agreements nearly eight-fold -- from about $5.9 million to nearly $50.1 million."

Auditors then conducted an in-depth examination of 10 grantees that account for more than three-quarters of the aid money. Although the GAO acknowledged the difficulty of operating effective aid programs in Cuba, it found that many of the grantees lacked records that would make it possible to determine how the aid money was used and what it accomplished.

Proposals for funding for virtually all the 10 grantees had been unsolicited and not offered for competitive bids by USAID. The government in most cases failed to comply with its rules requiring pre-award examinations, contract specificity, monitoring and formal audits at the end of a program. The GAO said it had referred three of the contracts for further investigation.

Report Cites Flaws In Cuba Aid Program (AP-Y)

By Jim Abrams, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 16, 2006

A Democratic critic of the Bush administration's Cuba policy on Wednesday promised hearings next year on a report citing weaknesses in the U.S. program promoting democracy in Cuba.

"The conclusions are disturbing to say the least," Rep. William Delahunt, D-Mass. The report by congressional investigators said the U.S. Agency for International Development did not always properly oversee Cuban aid grants and that coordination with the State Department was sometimes ineffective. Cashmere sweaters and chocolate were among the items bought with agency money, the study found.

Delahunt requested the study with Rep. Jeff Flake, R-Ariz., another strong advocate of ending the four-decade-old policy of opposing the Castro government through economic penalties and restrictions on travel and personal contacts.

"To continue the current level of funding given the results and given the disarray this program seems to be in would be a tremendous waste of taxpayer dollars," Flake said.

When Democrats gain the majority in the next Congress, Delahunt will be chairman of the House International Relations oversight and investigation subcommittee, putting him in a position to convene hearings on Cuba.

The report by the Government Accountability Office found that in the past decade, USAID awarded 40 grants or cooperative agreements totaling $65 million and the State Department four grants worth $8 million to support democratic progress in Cuba. USAID provided 385,000 pounds of medicine, food and clothing, more than 23,000 shortwave radios and millions of books, newsletters and other informational material.

It said dissidents interviewed by the GAO in Cuba said they appreciated the assistance.

But investigators also found that 95 percent of USAID's total awards were made in response to unsolicited proposals; that reviews of grantees were not always finished before awards were granted; and that the agency did not adequately follow up on grants to ensure accountability.

Some USAID money, the report said, paid for a gas chain saw, computer gaming equipment, a mountain bike, leather coats, cashmere sweaters, crab meat and Godiva chocolates.

"Under the Bush administration's Cuba policy, it is illegal for Cuban-Americans to fly to Havana for a family funeral, but legal for the State Department to pay smugglers to bring chocolates and cashmere sweaters onto the island," said Sara Stephens, executive director for the Center for Democracy in the Americas.

Flake and Delahunt, while acknowledging the difficulty of delivering material to dissidents in Cuba, cited one finding in the report that it takes anywhere from $4 to $20 to get humanitarian or material assistance to the island.

"It may be closer to four cents a pound," if the administration lifted its restrictions on family visits and travel to Cuba, Delahunt said. "This really cries for a more thorough review of policy as opposed to just simply focusing on the findings and looking at it as an auditing problem."

USAID chief financial officer Lisa Fiely, in a letter to the GAO, said her agency has acted to comply with the recommendations. The agency took issue with some findings, she said, but pledged to better manager, monitor and evaluate the U.S. assistance.

More Cubans Take Trip To USA, Using Alternate Routes (USAT)

By Alan Gomez

USA Today, November 16, 2006

Cubans fleeing their communist homeland are reaching U.S. shores in increasingly large numbers as more brave the trip and new smuggler routes make it easier to land.

Traditionally, Cubans have used makeshift boats, rafts and even inner tubes to ride the currents toward the Florida Keys and Florida's southeast coast. But the Coast Guard and Border Patrol agents are heavily focused on the eastern shore, so more smugglers driving high-speed boats are popping up on Florida's less-populated, less-patrolled southwestern coast.

"Authorities tied it up so tight near Miami that it's gotten hard for them to get in," said Capt. Thom Carr of the police department on Marco Island, located west of Miami on the other side of the state. "Because of that, they told us (Cubans) might start heading this way, and now they are."

Monday, 28 Cubans reached land in Naples. The previous day, 17 landed on Sanibel Island. And in August, 20 Cubans landed near Marco Island, according to The News-Press in Fort Myers.

That trend forced the Border Patrol to shift a special unit to southwest Florida this year to help law enforcement track down the smugglers.

"It's caught us by surprise because we haven't seen that in the past," said Steve Cole, a spokesman with the U.S. Attorney's Office Southwest Florida division.

The shift to the Gulf of Mexico seems obvious to some who live there.

The waterfront along Miami and Fort Lauderdale is stacked with high-rise buildings that light up the waters and make it easier to spot vessels on the water. The area also has many fishermen and boaters who help the Coast Guard identify smugglers gunning for land.

On the other hand, the Gulf Coast is largely a quiet collection of beach homes where cities have laws restricting the amount of light homes can emit at night. The laws ensure that hatching sea turtles head to the water instead of being drawn to city lights.

Mark Sobel, who owns a resort on Sanibel and woke up Sunday to find 17 Cubans on his doorstep, said the combination of those factors results in a prime setting for nighttime smuggling runs. "It's quite dark, and that may very well be a haven for them," he said.

New routes account for only part of the recent upswing in Cuban migration to the USA.

The Department of Homeland Security estimates that 6,356 Cubans reached U.S. soil in 2005. That's up from 303 in 2003 and marks the highest influx of Cubans since the Coast Guard picked up more than 37,000 Cubans in 1994 in the waters between Florida and Cuba.

Alfredo Mesa, director of the Miami-based Cuban American National Foundation, draws a direct link between the recent upsurge and a crackdown on dissidents on the island in 2003. Dozens of journalists and political activists were arrested, convicted and sentenced to decades in prison on charges of "working with a foreign power to undermine the government."

"I would make a correlation between this recent wave and the government increasing their repressive apparatus," Mesa said. "That's at the root of why people seek freedom."

Lisandro Perez, a Florida International University sociology professor and past director of the school's Cuban Research Institute, takes a broader look at explaining the recent surge. The influx in 1994 was preceded in size only by the Mariel boat lift in 1980, when 125,000 Cubans arrived in Florida.

Perez says that after each massive exodus, islanders settle back down for a number of years, but the economic pressures and the "oppressive" regime eventually drive people to the point of fleeing, no matter the risk or cost. The result, Perez says, is a roughly dozen-year cycle between each exodus.

"After one of these exoduses, there's a collective breath because people who wanted to leave have left," Perez said. "But over time, these things accumulate. There's a pent-up demand in Cuba for migration that tends to increase with time."

Law enforcement officials say stopping such a mass migration would be just as hard now as it was during the previous waves.

The U.S. government has a migration policy unique to Cuba. Known as the "wet-foot, dry-foot" policy, any Cuban who reaches land is generally granted political asylum while those caught at sea are returned to Cuba.

That places the onus on the Coast Guard and other law enforcement to stop the floating refugees before they reach shore.

In fiscal year 2005, when more than 6,300 Cubans reached land, the Coast Guard caught 2,712.

"It's a maritime zone. We can't put a wall up around the United States," said Petty Officer James Judge, a spokesman with the Coast Guard's Miami station. "And we don't have enough Coast Guard assets or other agencies out there to check every single boat and have a 100% way of stopping illegal trafficking of anything, including people."

Empowering, Not Muzzling, Our Ambassadors (WP)

The memorandum that was the subject of "Karen's Rules on Diplomacy: Talk to the Media -- if You Dare" [Federal Page, Nov. 8] was originally distributed more than a year ago and is having its intended effect of freeing U.S. ambassadors to engage with the media around the world. It's disappointing that neither The Post nor the organizational psychologists it consulted bothered to check with the State Department before publishing the article. If you had, you would have learned that these guidelines empower our ambassadors rather than restrict them.

When I arrived at the State Department and met with ambassadors last year, many told me that they felt they were not allowed to speak on the record to the media unless the interview was "pre-cleared" by Washington. While this perception was not entirely accurate, many ambassadors hesitated to speak on the record without specific permission. Given time differences and journalists' daily deadlines, that meant too many ambassadors did not regularly engage with the media. Yet it seemed to me, and to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, that if we trusted our ambassadors to represent our country overseas, we should also trust them to use good judgment in speaking to the media about U.S. policies.

As I began encouraging ambassadors to engage more vigorously with media, they requested clear guidelines. The resulting rules cited by The Post have been applauded by our missions abroad; in fact, they were reissued at the request of public affairs officers because many ambassadors are new.

We have dramatically increased the appearances by our ambassadors on media outlets around the world. This expanded engagement is good for our country.

Kabila Wins Election Runoff In Congo (AP)

By Michelle Faul

AP, November 16, 2006

Incumbent President Joseph Kabila was declared the winner Wednesday of Congo's tense runoff election, defeating his rival and ex-rebel leader, Jean-Pierre Bemba, in the country's first multiparty contest in more than four decades.

Kabila won with about 58 percent of the vote, compared with nearly 42 percent for Bemba, said Apollinaire Malu Malu, chairman of the Independent Electoral Commission.

Bemba has disputed results from the Oct. 29 vote for days and his forces fought police and troops loyal to Kabila on Saturday for several hours in the capital, leaving three civilians and one soldier dead. Earlier Wednesday, Bemba's fighters refused a request by U.N. peacekeepers to return to military barracks in the city.

Bemba's home was silent, as was most of this capital of nearly 7 million people, where he enjoys massive support and Kabila is largely disliked. A few dozen people in some downtown Kinshasa bars and made celebratory toasts, and car horns honked in victory in an elite suburb.

"Peace must reign in every corner of the country. Long live democracy. Long live the new Democratic Republic of Congo," Kabila said in a televised address after he was declared the winner. "I ask you tonight to remain united and to live in fraternity and tolerance."

The U.N. mission deployed tanks onto Kinshasa's streets Wednesday, part of stepped-up security across Kinshasa that has also included a greater presence of European peacekeepers and police.

The electoral commission had said it would look into Bemba's complaints alleging fraud, but Malu Malu made no reference to the investigations.

The 35-year-old Kabila won 9,436,779 votes, compared to 6,819,822 votes for Bemba, Malu Malu said. Turnout among the nation's 25 million registered voters was about 65 percent.

Congo may one day look back at the election as the difficult birth of an era of peace, democracy and prosperity after decades of colonial rule, dictatorship and war that devastated what should be among the richest countries in Africa, if not the world. But for now, it is far from clear that supporters of the political rivals won't resort to violence.

"The big hope is that people want the elections, they want peace, they want to get on with their lives in circumstances that promise a better future," said William Lacy Swing, the U.N. secretary-general's special representative to the Congo.

"The vast majority of people are tired of war, tired of violence, they want peace and they are not easily going to be involved in acts that will disrupt order," he said. "I honestly believe that after these elections, one can truly say that this country is another country."

International observers have said voting was largely free and fair, and the election commission has rejected accusations its count has been skewed by fraud.

When results of the first presidential round were announced in August, the two sides battled it out on the streets of Kinshasa for three days, killing 23 people.

White U.N. personnel carriers with mounted submachine guns and truckloads of troops remained overnight in front of Bemba's house on the capital's main June 30 Boulevard. U.N. military spokesman Lt. Col. Stephane Lescoffit said about 100 troops had been stationed there.

On Tuesday, Bemba's spokesman said, a Congolese Armed Forces officer led a convoy of 16 trucks to the house and demanded that 300 members of Bemba's bodyguard accompany them to be confined to barracks on the outskirts of town. They refused and the trucks left, said the spokesman, Moise Musangana.

Army spokesman Col. Leo-Richard Kasonga said he couldn't immediately comment on the demand that Bemba's forces be confined to barracks, which appeared to have been made without consulting the U.N. peacekeepers.

Musangana said Bemba had about 1,500 armed fighters at his home, while the presidential guard numbered up to 15,000.

On Tuesday, Bemba's supporters challenged the vote count and threatened to tear up agreements to use dialogue and not violence to resolve disputes.

International observers have reported some problems in the largely peaceful elections, but largely agree that the exercise was free and fair — a tremendous achievement given the size and population of the country, its primitive infrastructure, lack of institutions, and the fragility of a peace that still has not taken hold in the east.

The Central African nation is the size of the United States east of the Mississippi, but has only 300 miles of paved roads, posing huge logistical problems for the U.N. mission that spent nearly $500 million on the vote, the biggest election the world body had ever helped organize.

"There have been issues but, technically speaking, I really believe it was free and fair," said Carmina Sanchis-Ruescas of the Washington-based IFES, which aids elections around the world. "There always some errors and mistakes, but not to the extent that we could claim that it has not been free and fair."

The names of some voters didn't make it onto the lists of eligible voters because of technical glitches, while up to 1.5 million poll workers and observers were allowed to vote outside their home districts, raising concerns.

The country's top Roman Catholic prelate, Cardinal Frederic Etsou, accused the Electoral Commission of publishing false results.

But the biggest national observer mission, set up by the Catholic Church, found no evidence the count was rigged.

"We saw some irregularities, but we cannot speak of fraud," said Henri Nuyiya of the Coordination for a Successful Transition, which mustered 50,000 election volunteers. "If there were a few people who voted in places where they were not registered, this would not have affected the results of the elections."

Both candidates had representatives at polling stations who were given copies of the results on the day of balloting, said Colin Stewart of the Atlanta-based Carter Center, which also sent observers.

That measure, he said, "constitutes a very strong measure of transparency and virtually eliminates any possibility of significant fraud in the compilation process."

Incumbent Declared Winner In Congo Vote (WP)

By Stephanie McCrummen

The Washington Post, November 16, 2006

KINSHASA, Congo, Nov. 15 -- Incumbent Joseph Kabila was on Wednesday declared the winner of Congo's first presidential elections in more than 40 years, as the crumbling boulevards of the capital remained calm.

The announcement came during a week of rising tensions and as dozens of U.N. tanks patrolled the streets. On Tuesday, supporters of Kabila's rival, Jean-Pierre Bemba, essentially declared their candidate president, accusing the election commission and other countries of an "electoral holdup."

Bemba, a former rebel leader, has wide support in Kinshasa and a personal guard of an estimated 1,000 soldiers who had refused to evacuate to the edges of the city.

By sundown Wednesday, many Congolese were expressing fear that the historic vote would end in a street brawl. Business owners chained their doors early, streets were unusually empty, and some families boarded ferries bound for Brazzaville, in neighboring Congo Republic across the vast Congo River.

But the sort of violence that killed at least 23 people after the first round of voting on July 30, and that people endured during a decade of civil war, did not materialize.

"We're fed up with the fighting," said Charles Tumba, a Bemba supporter sitting outside a house lacking electricity and running water most of the time. "Basically, everybody is expecting a change in the country. But let's wait and see."

Some international election observers reported irregularities but said none were significant enough to alter the results.

A massive logistical effort had gone into the election in Congo, a mostly roadless country the size of Western Europe with a population of more than 62 million. Foreign donors poured in $450 million to support the vote, which one Western aid official deemed perhaps one of the "most complicated processes in the history of democracy."

The United Nations deployed 17,500 troops, the largest peacekeeping force in the world. Election workers registered more than 25 million voters, many of whom walked miles to cast paper ballots that had to be trucked, biked, canoed or hiked to one of thousands of counting centers across the country. And because there was a runoff, it was done twice.

Kabila, who took power after his father, Laurent Kabila, was assassinated in 2001, faces the challenge of satisfying the high expectations of the electorate, including the 42 percent who voted for Bemba, in a country with more than 200 ethnic groups and at least that many political parties.

"It's not enough just to vote," said Christophe Lutundula, an opposition lawmaker who received death threats after he wrote a report examining wartime mining contracts. Kabila "has to manage his victory. And there has not been much progress in the maturing of the political culture, and that's what worries me most. It is effectively a cultural war to change things in this country."

Kabila takes charge of a country still imbued with the legacy of its longtime dictator, Mobutu Sese Seko, who looted billions from the government during his 32-year rule. The violence, disease and famine accompanying the civil war that followed left more than 4 million people dead.

Several former rebel leaders accused of war crimes now hold high-ranking positions in the national army, and militias still terrorize people in the east, taking over farms and national parks. Kabila also faces a population desperate for decent jobs, as unemployment hovers around 80 percent.

Many here say they hope a new constitution, adopted last year, will provide some framework for reforms. The document provides for the creation of provincial legislatures, for example, that in theory will decentralize state power, allowing provinces to retain 40 percent of revenue for local projects.

"People have learned a lot from this process," the aid official said. "And it has created a whole cadre of people who understand what it means to be in the weeds of democracy."

‘Glamorous' Socialist Seeks French Presidency (USAT)

By Jeffrey Stinson

USA Today, November 16, 2006

PARIS — Is France, which has been led by male political lions like Charles de Gaulle, Francois Mitterrand and now Jacques Chirac, ready for a female president? And a woman who is a glamorous, unmarried mother — and a new-breed Socialist at that?

Segolene Royal, 53, who hopes to be the republic's first female president, will get a partial answer to that question this week. The Socialist Party's 200,000-plus registered members go to the polls today to choose their nominee for April's presidential election. Results are due Friday.

Royal already has shaken up French politics, traditionally dominated by men from the elite universities that groom the nation's leaders and move up through France's bureaucracy.

She has graced the covers of magazines such as TIME Europe. While on vacation in August, paparazzi photographed her in a turquoise bikini. “She's very glamorous. She's very pretty. She's seen as separate from the French ruling elite,” says Rachna Uppal, European analyst for Global Insight, a London-based consulting firm.

On the final day of campaigning Wednesday, Royal's two male opponents, Dominique Strauss-Kahn and Laurent Fabius, denied her accusations of chauvinism.

Royal quoted Strauss-Kahn this week as saying that she “would have done better to stay at home rather than read out her cookery notes.” She told party members that Fabius had wondered, “Who is going to look after the children?” if she became the party candidate.

As leader of her party — and possibly of the nation — Royal says she offers something different: a connection with the French people.

Uppal says Royal cultivates the image of a person who is willing to listen. France has been racked by riots in the past year by minority youths, mostly Muslim, who complain they are discriminated against in jobs, in education and in treatment by police.

The French “think they want change; they say they want change,” Uppal says. “But they fear change. Royal stands out as someone who is listening to them.”

Although there are no recent polls of party members, Royal was the choice of 58% of those who "sympathize" with the Socialist Party in a poll in Sunday's Le Journal du Dimanche by the Ifop agency. Strauss-Kahn, a former finance minister, was preferred by 32% in the Nov. 2-10 poll of 716 Socialist-leaning adults.

Royal is running even among all voters in a matchup against the likely presidential candidate of the ruling center-right party, Interior Minister Nicolas Sarkozy. She was favored by 32% to Sarkozy's 31% in an Oct. 17-18 poll by the firm CSA.

"She has a very good chance of becoming the first woman president," William Keylor, professor of international relations at Boston University, says of Royal. "This would be a sea change in French politics if those old guys are going to have to … turn over Elysée Palace to a woman."

Royal's background is similar to her male political counterparts. She got an economics degree from Paris' Institute of Political Sciences, known as Sciences Po. She also graduated from the National School of Administration, the launch pad for the governing elite. She served as minister of environment, education and family and children. In 2004, she was elected president of one of 12 elected regional administrative bodies.

At Sciences Po, she met Francois Hollande, 52, a veteran French politician and chairman of the Socialist Party since 1997. She and Hollande live together, but they never married. They have four children.

"I would vote for her," says Catherine Clisson, 43, a Paris homemaker and mother of a teenage boy and 11-year-old girl. "I really would like a change. The (male) politicians we have from the establishment, they don't really know how people live. A woman like Segolene Royal knows a little more."

Royal's rise as a political star hasn't been trouble-free. She has drawn harsh criticism from Socialist hard-liners for some of her stands. And she has backtracked to avoid alienating the party base.

She backed off her critique of France's 35-hour workweek, which is a Socialist party sacred cow.

She has been fuzzy on how to pull France out of its economic doldrums. The French economy was stagnant in the third quarter. Unemployment for minority youths in suburban areas is as high as 20%, although it dipped to 8.8% in September, lowest level in five years.

Royal also has not made her foreign policy views clear, although she has indicated her take on U.S.-French relations differs from opponent Sarkozy, who is strongly pro-American, says Philip Gordon, senior fellow at the Brookings Institution in Washington. "She's staking out a position that stresses France's independence from the United States," Gordon says.

Royal wants delinquent juveniles to be sent to boot camps run by the military. And she has called for "citizens' juries" that would assess how politicians are doing and attend Cabinet meetings.

When jeered by Socialists at a candidate debate last month, Royal defended the juries. "Don't be afraid of the people," she said. "Democracy is like love: The more you get of it, the bigger it grows."

If no candidate emerges with a majority Friday, Socialists will hold a runoff between the top two vote-getters next Thursday.

Analyst Uppal says a second round could prevent Royal from taking positions that stray from the traditional Socialist platform. "She wants a shoo-in," Uppal says. "If she's a shoo-in, she will be saying a lot more controversial things."

Annan Faults 'Frightening Lack Of Leadership' For Global Warming (NYT)

By Jeffrey Gettleman

The New York Times, November 16, 2006

NAIROBI, Kenya, Nov. 15 — Secretary General Kofi Annan on Wednesday put the blame for global warming on "a frightening lack of leadership," saying the poorest people in the world, who do not even create much pollution, bear the brunt of rising temperatures.

"The impact of climate change will fall disproportionately on the world's poorest countries, many of them here in Africa," Mr. Annan said in a speech to a major climate conference here. "Poor people already live on the front lines of pollution, disaster and the degradation of resources and land.

"For them," the United Nations leader said, "adaptation is a matter of sheer survival."

When pressed at a news conference afterward about his comments on poor leadership, Mr. Annan denied that he was singling out the United States, the world's biggest source of the smokestack and tailpipe gases that are linked by most scientists to rising temperatures. The United States is also one of the few countries that has not ratified the Kyoto Protocol, the first treaty setting limits on the heat-trapping pollutants.

"My speech was not directed at a particular individual or leader," Mr. Annan said. "I just want leaders around the world to show courage, because this is one of the greatest challenges of our time."

Among other issues, negotiators at the climate conference are exploring how to set new emissions limits for the period after 2012, when Kyoto's terms expire. Bush administration officials have said the United States has no plans to accept any binding limits.

The delegation from the United States, meanwhile, denied that it was part of the leadership failure that Mr. Annan spoke about.

Paula J. Dobriansky, the under secretary of state for democracy and global affairs, said Wednesday that "we think the United States has been leading in its groundbreaking initiatives." She listed several measures, including financial incentives for businesses to reduce pollution and strict domestic rules that she said had helped in the fight against global warming.

Each year thousands of environmental experts, government officials and activist groups gather for a nearly two-week-long conference on how to battle global warming.

This year's conference in Nairobi, partly because it has drawn so many Africans, has focused on the possibility that those least responsible for pollution-induced climate change may suffer the most from it. Africa, one of the least industrialized areas in the world, is a case in point.

The herders of Kenya's grassy plains, for example, whose total pollution basically boils down to their cooking fires and the few cigarettes they smoke, are being displaced by increasingly frequent droughts, which many scientists blame at least partly on global warming.

Malaria, one of Africa's leading killers, is spreading to higher altitudes because of rising temperatures. The Sahara is expanding, turning farmland into desert and contributing to conflicts like the one in the Darfur region of Sudan. And the list goes on.

"Africa faces some of the fiercest effects of climate change," Kenya's president, Mwai Kibaki, said in a speech on Wednesday at the climate conference. He said warmer temperatures could destroy agriculture and tourism, two of Kenya's brightest hopes for a way out of poverty.

The emphasis on poor countries has led to another running theme at this year's climate caucus: adaptation. Experts and politicians concede that so much carbon dioxide, one of the dominant heat-trapping gases, has already accumulated in the atmosphere that the world must accept global warming and figure out how to adapt to it.

"For too long the international community focused almost exclusively on mitigation," said Kivutha Kibwana, Kenya's environmental minister, who is president of the conference. "Let Nairobi be the starting point whereby adaptation and mitigation efforts go hand in hand."

The conference has succeeded in establishing the broad outlines of an adaptation fund that calls for industrialized countries to help poor countries deal with the adverse effects of climate change through measures like relocating coastal people displaced by floods.

Though the fund is still tiny, around $3 million, United Nations officials say that it will grow rapidly and that there is now a plan for how to manage it. Each country will get one vote, which will give the developing world a larger voice than that of industrialized nations.

Still, much work remains, and the conference ends Friday. One bogged-down proposal is the effort to limit the average global temperature increase to 3.5 degrees Fahrenheit or so, which may not sound like much but would significantly change the environment. In the past century, average global temperatures have risen about 1 degree.

Even moderate projections of warming under current emissions trends foresee four or five times that temperature increase by 2100, accompanied by a substantial rise in sea levels and disruption of climate patterns and water supplies.

Earlier this week, a group of island nations objected to the 3.5-degree ceiling, saying that even that would be too high for them to bear, because of all the flooding.

Participants were also divided over the idea of a carbon dioxide tax. On Wednesday the president of Switzerland, Moritz Leuenberger, proposed using such a tax to finance adaptation programs. The tax would serve the dual purpose of discouraging rich countries from polluting and helping poor countries deal with the consequences of pollution.

"This is not a fight against nature," Mr. Leuenberger said. "It is a battle against shortsighted egoism."

Talks By India And Pakistan Make No Gains On Train Blasts (NYT)

By Somini Sengupta

The New York Times, November 16, 2006

NEW DELHI, Nov. 15 — Peace talks between India and Pakistan, which had stalled after the bombings of commuter trains in Mumbai in July, limped forward this week, as senior officials from both countries met here for two days to discuss issues ranging from how to exchange information on terrorist groups to a dispute over an uninhabitable area high in the Himalayas.

But the dialogue between their top diplomats ended Wednesday without movement on a crucial and closely watched item: India, having accused Pakistan of involvement in the Mumbai bombings, presented no evidence of such complicity.

India has long blamed Pakistan-based militant groups for organizing terrorist acts on Indian soil, and the Indian police have recently accused the Pakistani intelligence agency of directing the July 11 train bombings.

Pakistan has repeatedly rejected blame and challenged India to share its evidence. The two countries agreed in September to exchange information about terrorism, but plenty of doubts remain on each side about whether their mutual distrust will permit an earnest exchange.

The Pakistani foreign secretary, Riaz Muhammad Khan, told reporters on Wednesday afternoon that India had furnished information about "linkages" between banned militant groups in India and Pakistan, but nothing on the Mumbai attacks.

His counterpart, Shiv Shankar Menon, would only say of the information that it was "material relating to cross-border linkages to terrorist acts in India."

Asked if elements in the Pakistani government had been involved, Mr. Menon would not specify. "There are elements in Pakistan that are involved, not just in assisting but inciting terrorism in India," he said.

Mr. Menon also said that his government could not proffer information on the Mumbai blasts because no one had been charged in an Indian court. The police in Mumbai have made arrests, but some of the suspects have complained that confessions, implicating militant groups and intelligence operatives in Pakistan, were extracted by force. In a television interview last month, the Indian national security adviser, M. K. Narayanan, said that India had less than "clinching" evidence.

In a joint statement, the two nations, each with nuclear weapons, agreed to continue talking and said they had reached agreement on "reducing the risk from accidents relating to nuclear weapons."

They were far from an accord on pulling back troops from Siachen Glacier, 18,500 feet in the Himalayas, where Indian and Pakistani soldiers have faced off for more than 20 years. It is uninhabitable, and the dispute is less over who controls it than recording on a map whose troops were last standing where. India wants its troop positions laid out on a map; Pakistan says it opposes what Mr. Khan on Wednesday called "endorsement of a certain claim."

Pakistan Moves Toward Altering Rape Law (NYT)

By Salman Masood

The New York Times, November 16, 2006

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan, Nov. 15 — After months of delay, the Pakistani government on Wednesday finally pushed legislation through the lower house of Parliament to amend rape laws that human rights advocates say have led to punishment for thousands of innocent victims.

The passage of the legislation, which has been opposed by Islamist parties, is seen as a litmus test for President Pervez Musharraf's commitment to steering the country toward moderation and enlightenment. Because of the pressure by the Islamic groups, though, the measure passed on Wednesday still contains provisions that concern human rights groups.

To become law, the bill must be approved by the Senate, which is expected, and by General Musharraf. Months of wrangling and political opposition cast doubts on whether the government would succeed in passing the changes to the current law, the Hudood ordinance, under which women who report rape can end up being prosecuted for adultery. The law was enacted in 1979 by a former military dictator, Gen. Muhammad Zia al-Haq, to appease Islamists who contended that he was secularizing the country.

Late Wednesday, General Musharraf made an appearance on state-run television and congratulated the nation on the passage of the measure, the Women's Protection bill, saying, "This process of empowerment, protection of women will continue."

Under the Hudood ordinance, rape is included in matters covered under Islamic law, like marriage and divorce. A woman who reports that she has been raped must produce four male witnesses to prove it. If she fails to do so, she can be prosecuted for adultery. Thousands of women have been punished under the law, often on the flimsiest evidence. That risk has kept many women from trying to bring their attackers to justice.

The legislation passed Wednesday gives judges the discretion to try rape cases in a criminal rather than an Islamic court. The new legislation allows forensic and circumstantial evidence to be used as a basis for convictions, as with other crimes.

The amendment also introduces the concept of statutory rape, outlawing sex with girls under 16. The Islamic code had merely banned sex with girls before puberty.

The change in the law comes after high-profile cases that were widely publicized here by women's rights groups and in the West and that brought considerable pressure to bear on the government. They include cases in which local authorities have permitted rapes as a way of compensating someone judged to have been wronged by the woman's male relatives.

Dealing with Hudood laws has been a political minefield for General Musharraf, with Islamic opposition political parties saying that changing the laws would violate the principles of Islam. Pakistani officials have taken pains to convince the public that amending the laws would not violate Islamic precepts, and General Musharraf repeated that theme in his remarks. "I assure the entire nation that no Pakistani can ever think of enacting law that is repugnant to the Holy Koran and the Sunnah," the recorded teachings and actions of the Prophet Muhammad, he said.

The new law would continue to allow prosecutions for what it calls fornication, a provision that was introduced at the insistence of religious scholars and was backed by the alliance of religious opposition parties. Human rights advocates on Wednesday expressed concern over that provision.

General Musharraf said in his televised address that the government "did not cave in to the mullahs" and that "the section regarding fornication was inserted after consultation with legal experts and ruling party members."

The legislation approved Wednesday was shaped during months of drafting and back-door negotiations between the government and opposition political parties. Vociferous protests by an alliance of Islamist parties had stalled the legislation, which was introduced in August.

An attempt to pass a new law in September broke down after threats of mass resignations by the religious alliance forced the government to pull the legislation back. But on Wednesday, the government finally moved ahead, and Parliament's lower house passed the bill in just one sitting.

Opposition members from the more extreme Islamist parties boycotted the vote and walked out of the Parliament as the legislation was introduced. But it seemed unlikely that religious alliance members would go so far as to resign from Parliament, analysts here said.

Maulana Fazalur Rehman, leader of Muattahida Majlis-e-Amal, the alliance of religious parties, said the bill "will turn Pakistan into a free-sex zone."

The liberal opposition Pakistan People's Party of former Prime Minister Benazir Bhutto supported the bill. Sherry Rehman, central information secretary for the party, said it had decided to support the legislation because it was consistent with the party's goal of emancipating and empowering Pakistan's women.

"We are not totally satisfied," she said. "We wanted a total repeal of the Hudood laws."

Human rights advocates have demanded a total repeal of the Hudood laws, and the move on Wednesday met with guarded words of welcome but also with concerns.

Farzana Bari, a member of Pattan, a human rights advocate, said she was pleased that rape cases would be prosecuted under the country's penal code. But she said she was disappointed that the government had tried to appease the Islamists by incorporating the so-called fornication section.

She said noted that adultery had not been an offense against the state before the Hudood laws, and she worried that judges could be bribed to misuse the provisions. "There is nothing to celebrate," Ms. Bari said. "This clause about fornication would now open a new chapter of misuse and abuse."

Pakistan Moves To Amend Rape Laws (WP/AP)

By Paul Garwood, Associated Press

The Washington Post, November 16, 2006

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan, Nov. 15 -- Pakistan's lower house of Parliament passed amendments to the country's rape laws Wednesday, ditching the death penalty for extramarital sex and revising a clause on making victims produce four witnesses to prove rape cases.

Consensual sex outside marriage would remain a crime punishable by five years in prison or a $165 fine, said a parliamentary official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak to reporters.

International and local calls for change intensified after the 2002 gang rape of Mukhtar Mai. A tribal council in her village in Punjab province ordered the rape as punishment for her 13-year-old brother's alleged affair with a woman of a higher caste.

The amendments enraged Islamic conservatives but won cautious support from human rights activists, who wanted the controversial laws scrapped altogether.

Pakistan's president, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, praised lawmakers for approving the amendments and criticized fundamentalists for their "unnecessary" opposition and their claims that his government was acting against Islam.

"I have taken a firm decision to change these unjust rape laws as it was necessary to amend them to protect women," Musharraf said in a televised address to the nation. He urged the Senate, dominated by government allies, to swiftly approve the measure.

Pakistan's late dictator, Gen. Mohammed Zia ul-Haq, introduced the laws, known as the Hudood Ordinance, in 1979 to appease Islamic political groups opposed to the secularization of Pakistani society.

Human rights activists and moderates have long condemned the laws for punishing rape victims instead of protecting them. The laws placed the burden of proof on victims while providing safeguards for their attackers, such as requiring four eyewitnesses to bring rape charges.

The amendments coincide with efforts by the Islamabad government to soften the country's hard-line Islamic image and pacify opponents of the laws.

Hina Jilani , a leading Pakistani human rights activist, praised the government for taking practical steps to amend the laws, but she demanded more legislation to protect women's rights.

"The government has made some positive changes by passing this bill, but it does not meet our demands," said Jilani, of the independent Human Rights Commission of Pakistan. "We wanted a total repeal of the 1979 rape law, but the government has not done it."

The amendments drop the death penalty and flogging for people convicted of having consensual sex outside marriage and give judges discretion to try rape cases in a criminal court, rather than an Islamic court. Strict Islamic law dictates that a woman claiming rape must produce four witnesses, making a trial almost impossible.

Support Builds For Libyan Dissident (WP)

By Nora Boustany

The Washington Post, November 16, 2006

Human rights activists and Western diplomats are increasingly concerned about the welfare of Fathi al-Jahmi, a leading Libyan dissident awaiting a possible death sentence while being held in solitary confinement in Libya, and who is known to have several life-threatening health conditions for which he is receiving little or no medical care. He is charged with having an unauthorized meeting two years ago with a foreign official -- believed to be a U.S. diplomat -- and campaigners are pushing the Bush administration to do more to secure his release.

Jahmi, 65, a democracy activist in Libya since the late 1970s, has been in and out of Libyan jails and survived an assassination attempt in 1990 when gunmen stormed into his house. A civil engineer, Jahmi had served as governor of Libya's oil-rich Gulf province and as head of the National Planning Committee until 1972. After 1978, when his businesses were nationalized, he became Libya's public face for democracy, free enterprise and freedom of expression.

He was imprisoned in October 2002 after delivering a speech at a conference in Tripoli calling for democracy, a free press and the release of political prisoners. He was released on March 12, 2004, after intervention by Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.), who held a face-to-face meeting with Libyan leader Moammar Gaddafi to ask for Jahmi's freedom.

Jahmi and his eldest son, Mohamed, met subsequently with a U.S. diplomat at the Corinthia hotel in Tripoli to express his gratitude for the U.S. help in his release, according to his brother and human rights groups. Two U.S. diplomats later visited Jahmi at his house, said his brother, Mohammed al-Jahmi, who said members of the Libyan state security bureau were parked outside the house and threatened the family.

Fathi al-Jahmi was rearrested two weeks later and has been in jail since. "I happened to be on the phone with the family when government agents encircled his house. I could hear the sirens," his brother recalled.

Jahmi has been accused of "exchanging information with employees of a foreign state that is harmful to the country" and "scheming with foreigners during times of peace," according to a statement from the Libyan People's Bureau, or embassy, in London sent to Amnesty International in July.

New York-based Human Rights Watch says Libya's penal code imposes the death penalty on anyone who talks to or conspires with a foreign official to provoke or contribute to an attack against Libya. The United States restored full diplomatic relations with Libya in May.

Jahmi's family had been trying to get indictment papers for the past two years, and this week was the first they learned of the charge, Mohammed al-Jahmi said in an e-mail.

Mohammed al-Jahmi, a software engineer in Boston who came to study in the United States in 1977 and remained here, said he was extremely concerned about his brother's health. "I know everyone is doing their best to help. Everyone at the State Department kept telling me that Libya has changed. Libya has not changed," he said. He said his brother had never called for violence but for political dialogue for change at a roundtable of Libyans.

Several members of Congress, 36 human rights organizations in the United States and abroad, and other concerned citizens plan this week to send a petition to President Bush and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice urging them to take swift action to secure Jahmi's release. "The United States has now restored diplomatic relations with Libya," the petition says. "We urge you to use this opportunity to bring about the immediate and unconditional release of Fathi Eljahmi and all prisoners of conscience in Libya."

"We do remain concerned about Libya's human rights record," a State Department official said Monday. "We have raised Mr. al-Jahmi's case with Libyan authorities and we continue to do so since we have normalized relations. We want the Libyan government to release Fathi al-Jahmi immediately," he added.

Repeated telephone calls to Libya's ambassador to Washington, Ali Suleiman Aujali, were not returned.

In February 2005, the group Physicians for Human Rights sent a Dutch physician and prison health expert to evaluate Jahmi. The report, by Joost Jan Den Otter, said Jahmi's chronic conditions, including diabetes, high blood pressure and coronary artery disease, and his inadequate care in prison, could lead to a "lethal scenario." The report warned that Jahmi was in danger of a fatal heart attack or severe kidney failure. It also described Jahmi's dismal appearance and hygiene and called his treatment "cruel, inhuman and degrading."

Three Libyan doctors confirmed the diagnosis and informed the Dutch physician that Jahmi was now receiving proper treatment. When Human Rights Watch visited him in May 2005, Jahmi had been given a haircut and cleaned up, according to a photograph taken by a representative of the group.

Jahmi's son Mohamed visited him in jail at the end of August this year and said he looked frail and ashen. Jahmi told his son that his supply of medications had run out and had not been refilled.

The complex U.S.-Libyan relationship deteriorated in 1986, when President Ronald Reagan ordered a U.S. military strike against Tripoli that targeted Gaddafi's residential compound and killed his young daughter. The airstrike was in retaliation for the bombing 10 days earlier of a discotheque in West Berlin frequented by U.S. military members.

Relations between the two countries have swung dramatically since, from Libya being routinely accused of supporting international terrorism to Gaddafi winning praise for abandoning his nuclear program and the release in March of 132 political prisoners.

Presidential Candidate Bucks Chavez Tide (AP)

By Christopher Toothaker

AP, November 16, 2006

The best hope for many Venezuelans fed up with what they see as increasingly autocratic rule under President Hugo Chavez may be a gravelly voiced political veteran with a reputation for boldness and grit.

On the campaign trail, Manuel Rosales pumps his fists in the air, provoking screams of near-religious fervor from thousands of exuberant supporters.

The gray-haired 53-year-old has managed to galvanize the fractured opposition as its unity candidate to face Chavez in Dec. 3 elections, and is drawing giant crowds even though he trails the incumbent by 20 points or more in most opinion polls.

"Democracy is at risk with this government, and Venezuelans need to unite to defend it," Rosales told The Associated Press, accusing Chavez of wanting to be president-for-life like his friend Fidel Castro of Cuba.

Rosales gets his message out forcefully through private Venezuelan TV stations and newspapers that carry a steady stream of Chavez criticism. He gets limited coverage on state television, which sometimes interrupts his speeches or films them from odd or unflattering angles.

Billboards for Rosales show him surging through campaign crowds and bear the slogan "Dare to change!" But Chavez billboards are much more numerous, and the opposition has complained that when Chavez seizes the airwaves to speak for hours, it amounts to an unfair campaign practice.

Rosales, who temporarily stepped down as governor of the western state of Zulia to run, is one of just a handful of opposition politicians to remain a regional powerbroker in defiance of the pro-Chavez tide. He was one of only two non-Chavistas to win governor's races in elections two years ago.

And while he has many middle- and upper-class supporters, Rosales has sought to make inroads among Chavez's traditional support base — the poor.

He strongly criticizes what he calls handout social programs at the heart of Chavez's populist agenda, saying money is tossed about to secure political patronage. Instead, Rosales proposes creating a state-issued debit card to directly distribute one-fifth of Venezuela's oil income among the country's poorest families.

Many Venezuelans say the candidate, a cattle rancher who has been active in politics for three decades, lacks Chavez's charisma.

But in Venezuela's highly polarized society, this former mayor of Maracaibo, the country's second-largest city, has seen the campaign take on religious overtones.

At rallies, supporters press wooden crosses or figurines of Christ into Rosales' hands. Others give him pictures of saints or bottles of holy water — displays of devotion also common among followers of Chavez, who often invokes Jesus as an inspiration.

When Rosales walks through crowds, supporters often try to push past security guards to shake his hand, hug or kiss him.

"He's the only hope we have to get rid of this government. That's why we love him," said Roselyn Fuentes, one of tens of thousands who joined a campaign march across Caracas.

"Take a look at this," Rosales said while riding in a sport-utility vehicle after a campaign stop, rolling up his sleeves to reveal bruises and scratches on his forearms. "That's the affection of the people."

Some give Rosales poems written in his honor or notes asking for help finding a job — displays of devotion also seen among Chavez's backers.

Chavez avoids referring to Rosales by name, often calling him the "ex-governor" and depicting him as a U.S. pawn. Some pro-Chavez campaign banners read: "Vote against the devil — Vote against the empire."

But Rosales denies any links to Washington, insisting he's an independent-minded democrat speaking for Venezuelans whom Chavez has betrayed. And he's tried to distance himself from the corrupt political class that ran the country for four decades until Chavez's 1998 election.

In fact, until recently Chavez and Rosales were on speaking terms, the centrist governor being one of the few opposition leaders to occasionally attend presidential functions. That changed in December when Rosales' small party, A New Time, joined a boycott of congressional elections.

Some Chavez supporters poke fun at Rosales, noting he has stumbled over words. His response: "Maybe I don't talk so pretty, but I'm honest."

Rosales also has warned he could call street protests after next month's vote if he thinks it hasn't been conducted fairly.

Friends say Rosales isn't likely to back down. They say that when Rosales won his first election in his hometown in 1979, local political bosses tried to tamper with the results — and that a gun was fired into the air during an argument among Rosales, his opponents and soldiers guarding the ballots.

Rosales claims not to remember exactly what happened, saying "problems, attempts at fraud arise in many elections and everyone defends what's theirs. There was a problem there and I defended what was mine."

Asked who fired the gun, Rosales grinned and responded: "I don't remember. Maybe it was a firework."

No Apartheid For Gays, Either (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, November 16, 2006

WHEN SOUTH AFRICAN lawmakers voted Tuesday to legalize same-sex marriage, the former icon of unjust government reminded the world that its break from colonial apartheid wasn't just about changing the power structure. It was about conferring broad civil rights within its borders.

What makes the vote by South Africa's Parliament unique is that it stems not from the gradual social liberalization that sparked similar moves in such countries as Spain and Canada but from its very constitution. Adopted in 1996, that document drew its inspiration from a newfound hope of rights for all and, as a result, specifically prohibited discrimination against homosexuals.

Under court order to follow its own constitution, Parliament was forced into overriding old marriage laws and extending marriage rights to same-sex couples, thus becoming an unlikely global beacon of progressiveness. The vote is all the more extraordinary for its contrast with much of Africa on the question of homosexuality, which is illegal in most sub-Saharan countries.

It's regrettable that, unlike other countries that have legalized same-sex unions, South Africa will allow civil officials to opt out of performing gay-marriage ceremonies. It should not be up to government functionaries to determine whether a nation's laws are to their liking; it's simply their job to carry out the laws. Time might cure what Parliament didn't. As same-sex marriage becomes more common in South Africa, and people see it does nothing to hurt the nation or heterosexual marriage, objections by officials may decline.

South Africa is far from a perfect democracy, and government action alone, in South Africa as elsewhere, cannot end discrimination. Some of its leaders, notably President Thabo Mbeki, have been less than enlightened in their views on homosexuality and AIDS. (Only recently has his government made antiretroviral drugs more widely available.) But on Tuesday, the nation showed that it has shed the worst of its past and is growing into a rights-based democracy.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Closing Arguments Made At 9/11 Investigation Perjury Retrial. The New York Times (11/17, Rivera, 1.16M) reports, "Lawyers gave closing arguments yesterday in the latest phase of a drawn-out legal battle involving a Jordanian immigrant accused of trying to mislead a grand jury investigating the Sept. 11 attacks. Prosecutors say the immigrant, Osama Awadallah, who is on trial for the second time in Federal District Court in Manhattan, lied repeatedly when he told a grand jury in October 2001 that he did not know Khalid al-Midhar, who took part in the attacks, and when he denied writing Mr. Midhar's name in a school notebook. … Mr. Awadallah's lawyer, Jesse Berman, countered by saying that his client never meant to give the grand jury wrong information, and did so only after enduring 20 days of incarceration that left him confused, frightened and paranoid." The Times notes, "Under questioning by the F.B.I., Mr. Awadallah said he knew" 9/11 hijacker Nawaf al-Hazmi, "who worked at the same gas station and worshiped at the same mosque. He also said he remembered an acquaintance of Mr. Hazmi and described him physically but said he had never learned his name. When shown a picture of Khalid al-Midhar, Mr. Awadallah claimed not to recognize him."

The AP (11/17, Caruso) reports, "In his closing argument at the retrial on Thursday, defense attorney Jesse Berman said Awadallah, who was 20 when he was arrested, was simply exhausted, confused and frightened during his grand jury testimony and didn't intend to mislead anyone. … He accused FBI agents and prosecutors of deliberately provoking and upsetting Awadallah, who was handcuffed to his chair. In the weeks leading up to his testimony, Awadallah was kept in solitary confinement and was subjected to strip searches. He also claimed to have been beaten by his jailers.

… Assistant U.S. Attorney Karl Metzner told jurors there was no evidence Awadallah was confused, forgetful or disoriented by mistreatment. … 'He didn't make a mistake. He lied deliberately,' Metzner said."

Pentagon Plans Pricey Military Commissions Compound At Guantanamo. The Miami Herald (11/17, Rosenberg, 286K) reports the Pentagon "plans a Military Commissions compound at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, costing up to $125 million, a major undertaking meant to accommodate up to 1,200 people at the Navy base for the first U.S. war crimes trials since World War II." If Congress approves the funding, "it would be the largest single construction expenditure at Guantánamo since the Bush administration set up the offshore detention and interrogation center in January 2002. No Defense Department official would speak about the project with his or her name attached. But one Pentagon insider with knowledge of the plan said officials envision the fast-track construction of a major compound at an abandoned airfield that in the 1990s housed a tent camp for Cuban rafters."

Report Shows US Allowed No Witnesses For Gitmo Detainees. The AP (11/17, Ben Fox) reports, "The US military called no witnesses, withheld evidence from detainees and usually reached a decision within a day as it determined that hundreds of men detained at Guantanamo Bay were 'enemy combatants,' according to a new report." The analysis found "hearings that determined whether a prisoner should remain in custody gave the accused little opportunity to contest allegations against him."' They "provided an advance copy of the report to The Associated Press late Thursday and planned to release it Friday on the Internet." Their findings "based on an analysis of records of military hearings of 393 detainees, comes as the US government seeks to severely restrict detainee access to civilian courts, arguing that the Combatant Status Review Tribunals should be their main legal recourse."

Friend Of 9/11 Hijackers Convicted As "Accessory To Murder." The Washington Post/AP (11/17) reports a Moroccan man, Mounir Motassadeq has been "convicted of being an accessory to murder in the Sept. 11, 2001 … as a German appeals court ruled Thursday that evidence showed he knew that the plotters planned to hijack and crash planes." The AP adds, "The Federal Court of Justice found that a Hamburg court decided wrongly last year to acquit Motassadeq of direct involvement in the attacks, even as it convicted him of membership in a terrorist organization and sentenced him to seven years in prison."

The CBS Evening News (11/16, story 8, 0:15, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "The court said the Moroccan man acted as an accessory to murder in the attacks and played a direct role in the plot. He could get 15 years in prison."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Man Arrested At Detroit Airport With Information On Nukes, Cyanide. USA Today (11/17, Leinwand, 2.27M) reports, "Federal agents continue to investigate a Dallas man arrested at a Detroit airport Tuesday after arriving on a flight from Amsterdam with nearly $79,000 in cash and a laptop computer that, according to court papers, contained information about nuclear materials and cyanide." Sisayehiticha Dinssa, who will appear for a detention hearing Monday, "is charged with illegally concealing more than $10,000 in his luggage and with smuggling bulk cash into the USA. If convicted, Dinssa could be sentenced to five years in prison on each charge." ICE spokesman Greg Palmore said Thursday that agents had "no evidence to suggest Dinssa was involved in a terrorism plot," but added that they were seeking more information "to get clear about what this guy was up to." The AP (11/16) reported Dinssa, an unemployed US citizen from Dallas, "arrived in Detroit from Nigeria by way of Amsterdam and was headed for Phoenix," according to Assistant US Attorney Leonid Feller.

ABC News (11/17, Thomas, Ryan) reports, "Customs officers also discovered that Dinssa was in possession of a laptop computer for which he had no power source. During an initial look at the computer, 'Inspectors discovered some files that had been downloaded with information about cyanide and nuclear materials,' an affidavit from an ICE agent filed in the U.S. District Court in Detroit noted. … According to two senior U.S. government officials briefed on the matter, the files appear to be beyond what someone would normally download from the Internet. According to U.S. officials, Dinssa may have been researching the materials extensively. … Dinssa had claimed he was only carrying $18,000. It is undetermined if this is an alleged smuggling case or potentially something more sinister." ABC notes, "FBI agents and investigators from the U.S. Attorney's Office are expected to obtain a search warrant and examine the hard drive of the computer to determine the nature of the computer files. The Justice Department has asked that Dinssa be held in custody until he makes an appearance Monday in federal court for a detention hearing."

El-Masri To Be Granted US Visa, But May Still Be Denied Entry. The Washington Times/UPI (11/17, Waterman) reports, "A German Muslim whose detention and torture by the CIA prompted an apology from Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will be granted a visa to come to the United States, although he might still be refused entry. 'Khaled el-Masri was found inadmissible to the United States on the basis of ... terrorist activities, and issued a visa on the basis of a waiver from the Department of Homeland Security,' a State Department official told United Press International. The official declined to comment further," as did DHS spokesman Russ Knocke. "Under US law, a visa does not give a foreigner the right to enter the United States -- something that is granted at the port of entry by inspectors working for the Department of Homeland Security."

Information-Sharing Plan To Help Local Governments Handle Terror Alerts. The Washington Post (11/17, A10, DeYoung, 690K) reports, "A new plan to improve information-sharing about terrorism, signed by President Bush this week and delivered to Congress yesterday, establishes a Washington-based 'threat assessment group' that includes federal, state and local officials. It also aims to reduce more than 100 restrictive and confusing categories of 'sensitive' federal information to a half-dozen or fewer so local-level officials can better understand what they are told." Thomas E. McNamara, whose office, under Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte, wrote the plan, "expects the new Interagency Threat Assessment Coordination Group, based at the National Counterterrorism Center and headed by the Department of Homeland Security, to be operating by year's end."

Report Urges US To Consider New Chemical Weapons Destruction Technologies. The AP (11/16) reports the National Research Council, in a study requested by the Army, said technologies "used to destroy chemical weapons in Europe and Japan are faster than one in the U.S. and should be considered." The council said the "foreign systems are as safe and sometimes more environmentally friendly that those in use here."

Palestinian Acquitted Of Terror Charge Stripped Of US Citizenship. The AP (11/17) reports, "A former University of Arkansas graduate student from the Middle East lost his U.S. citizenship Thursday and was sentenced to 15 months in federal prison. Arwah Jaber, who was born in the West Bank, was previously acquitted of an aiding-terrorism charge but convicted of lesser offenses, including obtaining his citizenship fraudulently. … Prosecutors said he planned to join Palestinian Islamic Jihad, labeled by U.S. authorities as a terrorist organization." The AP notes, "Jaber said at his trial that he did not cite his Palestinian name, Orwah Houshia, in immigration papers — though he applied for credit cards using that name — because he had used Arwah Jaber on all his immigration papers up until then."

VaxGen Wins Anthrax Vaccine Testing Extension. The Washington Post (11/17, Merle, 690K) reports that the government has given more time to the California biotechnology firm VaxGen Inc. "to conduct human testing of its anthrax vaccine, postponing a decision on whether the program should be canceled." The FDA "threw the effort into doubt earlier this month after calling a halt to testing in response to questions about the drug's reliability. The decision put the company in potential violation of its contract with the Department of Health and Human Services, which required testing to begin Nov. 13." The Post adds, "VaxGen said HHS has decided to extend the company's deadline for resolving the issue until Dec. 18. At stake is a contract potentially worth $1 billion."

WAR NEWS:

Four Americans Kidnapped In Iraq. ABC World News (11/16, story 4, 1:30, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "A senior military official has told ABC News of another mass kidnapping in that country, as another convoy of contractors was taken hostage today. It happened near the city of Nasiriyah. 19 trucks were captured. And there are many people missing, four of them believed to be Americans." ABC (Karl) added, "Defense officials tell ABC News, that coalition forces have mobilized to try to find those four missing Americans. This incident happened today…near the Kuwaiti border. It involved a Kuwait-based company called Crescent Security Group." The CBS Evening News (11/16, story 7, Couric, 7.66M) also reported "four Americans who work in Iraq for private companies are missing." NBC Nightly News (11/16, story 5, 0:25, Williams, 9.87M) said "Pentagon and military officials are telling NBC News as many as 14 people, including four American contractors, have been kidnapped."

The AP (11/17, Mroue) reports "an official familiar with the incident said preliminary reports being checked by the military indicated that the attack occurred at a checkpoint near Nasiriyah and that four Americans were believed to have been taken captive." The official, "who requested anonymity because of the security situation in Iraq," said "it appears that some of the convoy drivers had been released, and were being interviewed by the military. He said initial reports suggest that the attack occurred at a checkpoint in a location where normally there is no blockade."

Five More US Soldiers Killed. Meanwhile, the Los Angeles Times (11/17, Roug, 850K) reports, "Five more American soldiers have been killed in Iraq, the US military said, and gunmen, rockets and roadside bombs killed at least 17 Iraqis and wounded 25 others Thursday. … At least 2,864 U.S. troops have died in Iraq since the 2003 American-led invasion, according to icasualties.org."

Intelligence Officials Say Violence In Iraq Is Increasingly Complicated. The Washington Post (11/17, A19, Pincus, 690K) reports attacks "in Iraq reached a high of approximately 180 a day last month, reflecting an increasingly complicated conflict that includes sectarian clashes of Sunni and Shiite militias on top of continuing strikes by insurgents, criminal gangs and al-Qaeda terrorists, according to the directors of the CIA and the Defense Intelligence Agency." CIA Director Gen. Michael V. Hayden said, "No single narrative is sufficient to explain all the violence we see in Iraq today." The Post adds, "Attempting to describe the enemy, Lt. Gen. Michael D. Maples, the DIA director, listed 'Iraqi nationalists, ex-Baathists, former military, angry Sunni, Jihadists, foreign fighters and al-Qaeda,' who create an 'overlapping, complex and multi-polar Sunni insurgent and terrorist environment.' He added that 'Shia militias and Shia militants, some Kurdish pesh merga, and extensive criminal activity further contribute to violence, instability and insecurity.'" In "unusually harsh terms, the two intelligence directors spelled out how quickly the violence in Iraq has escalated this year, from about 70 attacks a day in January to about 100 a day in May and then to last month's figure."

Iraqi Government Issues Warrant For Prominent Sunni Cleric. The Los Angeles Times (11/17, Roug, Daragahi, 850K) reports, "Iraq's Shiite-led government issued an arrest warrant Thursday for the country's leading Sunni Arab cleric, accusing him of colluding with insurgents, a potentially explosive charge that could exacerbate tensions between the country's warring sectarian groups and further divide a fragile national government." The move against "Harith Dhari, the head of the Muslim Scholars Association, comes two days after an audacious daytime kidnapping in Baghdad ruptured the government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, setting Sunni politicians against Shiites." The Times adds, "Dhari has been a vocal, sometimes sarcastic, critic of the government, questioning the legitimacy of Saddam Hussein's criminal trials, and ridiculing the government's reconciliation efforts." The warrant "virtually is certain to rekindle threats of a boycott of the government by Sunni Arab politicians." The Washington Times (11/17, Mroue, 88K) notes Mohammed Bashar al-Faidi, spokesman for the Sunni Association of Muslim Scholars, "condemned the warrant for Mr. al-Dhari's arrest. 'This government should resign before the Iraqi people force it to resign,' Mr. al-Faidi said from Jordan. 'The association calls on its people to be calm.'"

The Washington Post (11/17, A16, Raghavan, 690K) reports "the move came as cracks emerged within Iraq's six-month-old unity government over the numbers of government employees taken in a mass kidnapping on Tuesday and whether some were tortured and killed."

Administration To Request Up To $160 Billion For Iraq, Afghanistan Wars. USA Today (11/17, Wolf, 2.27M) reports the Bush Administration is "preparing its largest spending request yet for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, a proposal that could make the conflict the most expensive since World War II." The Pentagon is "considering $127 billion to $160 billion in requests from the armed services for the 2007 fiscal year, which began last month, several lawmakers and congressional staff members said. That's on top of $70 billion already approved for 2007." Since 2001, Congress "has approved $502 billion for the war on terror, roughly two-thirds for Iraq. The latest request, due to reach the incoming Democratic-controlled Congress next spring, would make the war on terror more expensive than the Vietnam War." The new request "being considered for the war on terror would be about one-fourth what the government spends annually on Social Security — and 10 times what it spends on its space program."

Democrats Raise Possibility Of Cutting Iraq Funds. Rep. Jim Moran said on PBS' NewsHour (11/16, Warner), "The irony is that now Jack Murtha is chairman of the Defense Appropriations Committee. That is the one committee that can at least change the course in Iraq. … So the irony here is that Jack is in an even more pivotal position to achieve his objective vis-a-vis Iraq."

Rep. Dennis Kucinich said on Fox News' Your World (11/16, Cavuto), "I have to talk to a lot of my Democratic colleagues to convince them that the wisest course is to stop the funding. It's inevitable that we're going to get out of Iraq. I mean, we're going to leave. Sooner or later, the funds are going to be cut off. So why don't we do it now? Why don't we do it now before more deaths, before we waste the taxpayers' dollars? … There will be enough money to bring the troops home. … The American people asked for a new direction. And part of that new direction should be out."

Kennedy Calls For National Intelligence Estimate On Iraq. Sen. Ted Kennedy said on MSNBC (11/16, O'Donnell), "Gen. Abizaid indicated to the Armed Services Committee that the conditions with regard to sectarian violence were getting much better over in Baghdad and generally in Iraq. Then, in the afternoon, we had Gen. Maples, who represents the Defense Intelligence Agency, who said there is continued deterioration, the rise of sectarian violence. So we have a division with their presentation to the Armed Services Committee. What is necessary is for the intelligence agencies to get together with a National Intelligence Estimate. … That has not been done in two years. It's basically inexcusable that it hasn't been done."

No Agreement On Turning Over Security To Iraq. The Christian Science Monitor (11/17, Grier, 59K) reports "there is near agreement" in Congress "on at least one aspect of Iraq policy: the Iraqis themselves need to shoulder more of the burden of stabilizing their country. But this consensus breaks down over the obvious follow-up question. How?" Many Democrats, "newly emboldened by their election victories, favor an approach that might be labeled 'tough love.' It goes something like this: If the US plans a phased pullout of troops within four to six months, the Iraqi government will face up to what has to be done." But the White House – "and the top generals of the US military - favor a strategy that they consider more nurturing. The US needs to intensify efforts to train the Iraqi armed forces to fight for themselves, according to Gen. John Abizaid, US commander in the Middle East. A scheduled US pullout might simply cause Iraq's sectarian factions to prepare for chaos to come." The "gap between these approaches suggests that despite the recent shift in US politics, in Washington there are heated debates over Iraq yet to come."

House Republican Whip Roy Blunt said on MSNBC's Hardball (11/16, Matthews), "I think we are interested in what happens now with the new secretary of defense. I think many of our members, including me, think that if that decision would have been made earlier, it would have given our members a little more ability out there to talk about the fact that everything is under review. We have got to constantly be looking at the goals we set, whether we're meeting them or not, if they're still achievable, and what the Iraqis are doing to do their part."

Military Experts Said To Oppose McCain Plan To Boost Troop Levels. The Washington Post (11/17, A17, White, 690K) reports the "debate about how to proceed in Iraq, which in the past few months has focused on withdrawing U.S. troops, now includes serious discussion about adding more forces to the fight." Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) "repeatedly suggested this week that the United States needs thousands more troops in Iraq, and members of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group have discussed similar ideas as they prepare a much-anticipated policy recommendation. Members of Congress raised the concept on Wednesday in hearings with the region's top U.S. military commander." In a speech "last night to Republicans, McCain, who is considering a presidential bid in 2008, reiterated his desire for more troops to solve a 'dire' situation." But military officials "and defense experts, however, said yesterday that significantly escalating the number of U.S. combat troops in Iraq is largely implausible because it would severely strain the military, would be unsustainable for more than a few months and would offer no discernable long-term benefit." Military officials "and experts said yesterday that they think such a plan could work only temporarily because the Army and Marine Corps are stretched thin by ongoing conflicts. They said a large number of troops sent into Iraq would be hard to sustain over time without dipping significantly into the National Guard and reserves."

Deployments, Lack Of Funding Said To Be Wearing Down Armed Forces. In a McClatchy op-ed (11/17), Joseph Galloway says, "It's past time to start repairing the damage the Bush administration's way of war has done to our Army and our Marine Corps." Doing so "will take many years and many billions of dollars." The Army, "and its National Guard and Reserve, have been worn down - some would say worn out - by the endless deployments of troops on one-year combat tours to Iraq and Afghanistan. Many professional soldiers and their families are now enduring their second or third trips to Iraq, certain that a fourth or fifth awaits them if they continue to serve." Their equipment, "from Abrams tanks to Bradley fighting vehicles to Stryker armored cars to Humvees and helicopters, is wearing out even faster than the soldiers are. The money to repair and rebuild those vehicles - Army Chief Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker says he needs $17 billion for that right now - hasn't been forthcoming from this administration and the outgoing Congress." Army officials "say they're a total of some $25 billion short of what they need to sustain the current levels of operations."

"Coalition Of The Willing" Continues To Shrink. The Washington Times (11/17, Sands, 88K) reports Iraq's "coalition of the willing is becoming an increasingly exclusive club." The "coalition of foreign countries willing to deploy their forces in Iraq has shrunk steadily -- and soon could shrink even more. Twenty-three countries remain in the U.S.-led coalition and the United Nations' mission serving in and around Iraq, down from a high of 42 that joined the United States in the invasion or the postwar occupation of Iraq. More than half of those contributors have fewer than 150 troops, engineers or military trainers in the Iraq theater." Like President Bush, "many leaders of the contributing countries are resisting intense domestic political pressures to bring the troops home, especially as the casualty levels rise and the problems of the embattled Iraqi government mount."

Baker Thought To Be Seeking Political Consensus On Iraq Alternatives. McClatchy (11/17, Strobel) reports when James Baker "became President George H.W. Bush's secretary of state in 1989, one of the first things he did was cut a bipartisan deal to end years of poisonous wrangling over U.S. policy in Central America - an issue as divisive then as Iraq is today." Now, Baker "faces a similar - but tougher - challenge as he and retired congressman Lee Hamilton co-chair a committee that's increasingly seen as the last, best hope for finding a respectable exit from Iraq." Baker is "proceeding much as he did when he negotiated over Nicaragua and El Salvador in the '80s, according to individuals close to him and the panel, known as the Iraq Study Group." Baker saw the "disputes over Central America policy as 'first and foremost a domestic political issue,' he wrote in his 1995 memoir, 'The Politics of Diplomacy.' If the politics couldn't be defused, 'any hopes for a diplomatic solution, much less achieving a bipartisan foreign policy, were doomed.'" McClatchy adds the ISG is "widely portrayed as seeking new solutions to halt Iraq's slide into civil war and extricate the 141,000 U.S. troops there." But there "may not be any good solutions, and Baker's real goal is to forge a bipartisan consensus at all costs, the people close to him and the group say."

Few Alternatives Seen In Iraq Policy. The AP (11/17, Flaherty) reports that as President Bush, Congress and the ISG "seek new approaches for the unpopular war, warnings from the top American commander in the Middle East make clear there is no simple answer." At the "end of the day, military deployments will be up to President Bush, who has staunchly defended his handling of the war." Bush said he "is open to fresh approaches. With pressure on him to find a different path, the only thing most experts agree on is that each idea presents considerable risk." The problem, Abizaid "conceded, is the Baghdad government, which he said is only beginning to understand that it must support the Iraqi Army and not the Shiite militias engaged in near civil war against Sunni fighters." Abizaid told the House Armed Services Committee "about putting his faith in the Iraqi government and its forces, 'Well, maybe it's a dumb bet. But I don't think so.'" The AP adds, "If that seemed a halfhearted endorsement of his own strategy, his description of other alternatives was even more glum." Abizaid "swatted down a suggestion being pushed by many congressional Democrats, including Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., to begin decreasing U.S. troop levels because it could cause instability. Democrats are expected to support that plan when they take over control of Congress next year." Abizaid also "said a proposal by Sens. John McCain, R-Ariz., and Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., to bolster the 141,000 U.S. troops already there could not be sustained because the American military is stretched too thin already. He said troop increases would also erode the effort to force Iraqis to take on more responsibility."

Lack Of Iraqi National Consciousness Said To Be Root Of Failed Maliki Government. In his Washington Post column (11/17, A25), Charles Krauthammer says, "Iraq's first truly democratic government turned out to be hopelessly feeble and fractured, little more than a collection of ministries handed over to various parties, militias and strongmen. The problem is not, as we endlessly argue about, the number of American troops. Or of Iraqi troops. The problem is the allegiance of the Iraqi troops. Some serve the abstraction called Iraq. But many swear fealty to political parties, religious sects or militia leaders." At this "earliest stage of democratic development, Iraqi national consciousness is as yet too weak and the culture of compromise too undeveloped to produce an effective government enjoying broad allegiance." The Maliki government "is a failure. It is beholden to a coalition dominated by two Shiite religious parties, each armed and ambitious, at odds with each other and with the ultimate aim of a stable, modern, democratic regime. Is this America's fault? No. It is a result of Iraq's first democratic election." It was "never certain whether the long-oppressed Shiites would have enough sense of nation and sense of compromise to govern rather than rule. The answer is now clear: United in a dominating coalition, they do not."

Rumsfeld Tells American Spectator Dinner US Should Not Abandon Iraq. The Washington Times' "Inside the Beltway" column (11/17, McCaslin) reports, "The American Spectator's 2006 Robert L. Bartley dinner on Wednesday was 'off-the-record,' but we can tell you that outgoing Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld's keynote address made clear that the United States should not abandon Iraq anytime soon. Subsequent remarks from Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, which were filled with praise for Mr. Rumsfeld and the U.S. military (several injured Iraq war veterans were in the packed audience at the Mandarin Oriental hotel), echoed the secretary's sentiments."

Aides Likely To Follow Rumsfeld's Departure From Pentagon. The Washington Post (11/17, A23, Kamen, 690K) reports in its "In the Loop" column that Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld's "firing is sure to spark the departure of many of his top aides. One assistant secretary, Peter Rodman, has already moved back to the Brookings Institution -- but that was long planned, we're told." Several others "are on the endangered species list. Stephen Cambone, the undersecretary for intelligence, is surely gone. His deputy, Lt. Gen. Gerald Boykin-- famed for his memorable remark that 'my God was bigger than his' and other sage observations -- won't be far behind." Others on "the various DOD departure lists include acquisitions chief Kenneth Krieg; comptroller Tina Jonas; assistant secretary Thomas W. O'Connell, who runs Special Operations and Low-Intensity Conflict; and top Rumsfeld aide Robert Rangel, though Rangel is highly regarded in the building and among some House folks." Reporters will "be watching to see if spokesman Dorrance Smith, who just beefed up his public affairs staff with a 'rapid response' team to correct media lies, mischaracterizations and inaccuracies, hangs on."

Rumsfeld Website's Math Criticized. The Washington Post (11/17, A23, Kamen, 690K) also reports in its "In the Loop" column, "Seemed Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld had barely left his Oval Office firing ceremony when the Pentagon Web site popped up with a new feature titled 'Six Years of Accomplishments' with Rummy. First and foremost were his accomplishments in the 'war on terror,' where overall, military efforts 'liberated 50 million people in Afghanistan and Iraq.' More specifically, they've 'liberated 31 million Afghans from Taliban control and destroyed Al-Qaeda sanctuary.' And they've 'liberated 27 million Iraqis from a brutal dictatorship and turned over sovereignty of the country to an Iraqi government.'" The Post adds, "Math, apparently, is not a strong point. Somewhere it seems they lost -- or gained -- 8 million people."

About 2,200 Marines Heading To Anbar Province. The AP (11/17, Burns) reports that roughly 2,200 Marines are heading "from their ships in the Persian Gulf to an undisclosed location in Iraq's western Anbar province to help shore up US combat power in an area riddled with insurgent violence." The move is an indication "of the severity of the conflict in Anbar. The insurgency is entrenched and well-organized in a province where US soldiers and Marines are being killed almost daily." The AP adds, "The move was disclosed on Wednesday by Gen. John Abizaid during testimony to the Senate Armed Services Committee." Abizaid "approved the deployment 'to help address' concerns expressed by Maj. Gen. Richard Zilmer, who commands all US forces in Anbar."

Contractor Employees Claim Boss Shot At Iraqi Civilians. The New York Times (11/17, Chivers, 1.16M) reports that two former employees of the American private military contracting company Triple Canopy "have claimed in a Virginia court that they witnessed their supervisor deliberately shoot at Iraqi vehicles and civilians this summer, and that the company fired them for reporting the incidents." They say the company "retaliated against the men for reporting that the supervisor had committed violent felonies, and perhaps murder, on the job." The lawsuit also claims the men have been blacklisted in "the private military contracting industry, rendering them unemployable in the lucrative trade of providing private security in Iraq." The suit was filed in late July, and on Thursday, "the court set a trial date for next summer."

The Washington Post (11/17, A20, Jackman, 690K) says, "Triple Canopy was the ninth-largest contractor for the US State Department in fiscal 2005, with payments totaling more than $90 million, government records show. Former Army Ranger Shane Schmidt, former Marine Charles L. Sheppard III and their shift leader "were all working on an assignment for KBR when the shootings occurred near Baghdad on July 8, alleges the suit, filed in Fairfax County Circuit Court." The lawsuit "alleges wrongful termination and wrongful interference with their professional future."

Sunnis Seek Refuge In Fallujah. The AP (11/17, Hurst) reports that while security is tight and Fallujah "has become a refuge from the death squads and mortar battles in Baghdad," US Marines say about 150 Iraqis flee here each week from the capital, 40 miles to the east." Fallujah's population is "overwhelmingly Sunni Arab," and as a result, Fallujah "has not experienced the raging sectarian warfare that has the capital teetering on the brink of civil war." The migration is "part of a larger exodus out of Baghdad, where entire neighborhoods have been uprooted."

Administration Downplays Usefulness Of Iran, Syria Talks. The Wall Street Journal (11/17, Harwood, 2.04M) reports in its "Washington Wire" that the Administration "downplays usefulness of talking to Iran and Syria about Iraq. Although Baker-Hamilton group, top Democrats and Britain's Blair recommend talks, Secretary of State Rice insists Iran or Syria would demand concessions and couldn't cure Iraq's rising sectarian violence."

Soldier Sentenced To 90 Years For Rape, Murder Of Iraqi Girl. The Washington Post (11/17, A18, White, 690K) reports, "An Army specialist who admitted that he and a group of other U.S. soldiers raped a 14-year-old girl and killed her and her family in an Iraqi village was sentenced to 90 years in prison yesterday, by far the longest sentence for a U.S. soldier in connection with the death of an Iraqi civilian since the war began in 2003." Spec. James P. Barker, 23, "could be eligible for parole in 20 years, as part of a plea agreement with prosecutors that spares him the possibility of a death sentence. Barker has indicated he will testify against other soldiers in the case, some of whom face the death penalty."

US Airstrikes In Afghanistan Increase. The New York Times (11/17, Cloud, 1.16M) reports that the Air Force has conducted "over 2,000 air strikes in Afghanistan over the past six months, a sharp increase in bombing that reflects the growing demand for American air cover since NATO has assumed a larger ground combat role, Air Force officials said." The "intensifying campaign has focused on southern Afghanistan, where NATO units, primarily from Britain, Canada and the Netherlands, as well as American Special Forces have been engaging in the heaviest and most frequent ground combat with Taliban rebels since the invasion five years ago." The NATO forces are "mostly operating without heavy armor or artillery support, and as Taliban resistance has continued, more air support has been used to compensate for the lightness of the units."

Army Retooling To Fight Insurgencies. McClatchy (11/17, Brown) reports the United States Army Combined Arms Center "has retooled the Army's leadership and training programs to focus on what motivates insurgents, the strategies and tactics they use and the cultures in which they operate." The shift "away from major combat operations to irregular warfare is one of the most significant changes in doctrine and training the Army has undertaken since World War II." Irregular "war and stability operations were considered lesser tasks that required little preparation or practice. Large-scale war remained the Army's focus even after the invasion of Iraq in 2003. Since then, however, that focus has changed as it's become clear that Iraq and Afghanistan are part of a long guerrilla struggle that could last decades."

DOJ:

Gonzales To Address Air Force Academy Saturday. The Rocky Mountain News (11/16) reports, "U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales will speak to about 700 cadets at the Air Force Academy on Saturday. … His talk will include upholding civil liberties and the war on terrorism."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

DOJ To Ease Thompson Memo Rules On Corporate Fraud. Bloomberg (11/17, Schmidt) reports, "The U.S. Justice Department plans to make it harder for prosecutors to force companies to waive their legal rights in plea negotiations to avoid indictment, people familiar with the plan said." Bloomberg continues, "The proposed changes address concerns that companies are being asked unfairly to reveal confidential talks with their lawyers and cut off legal support for employees under investigation, the people said. Businesses, lawmakers and federal judges have complained that the department rules adopted in the wake of corporate accounting scandals in 2001 and 2002 erode the rights of companies and employees. … 'This is a policy issue that needs to be addressed and there has been a lot of criticism from a lot of different directions,' said former Justice Department official George Terwilliger, a partner at the White & Case law firm in Washington. 'There is also a recognition that we need to be careful how we tinker with the engine of commerce.'" Bloomberg adds, "Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty is likely to announce the revised policy in a speech early next month, the people said. They stressed that the changes won't be dramatic and are still being debated within the department. … McNulty, who also heads President George W. Bush's corporate fraud task force, hasn't signed off on the proposed changes, the people said. He was traveling and unavailable for comment. … 'We want to get it right,' McNulty told a Senate Judiciary Committee hearing in September. 'We don't want to do something that is inappropriate or unreasonable.' … Brian Roehrkasse, a Justice Department spokesman, said the rules are under review and any changes would be in accord with 'safeguarding the integrity of our financial institutions' and 'the public interest.' … The policy in question -- originally outlined in a 2003 memo by then-Deputy Attorney General Larry Thompson -- offers leniency to companies that cooperate with prosecutors. It suggests that companies can benefit by waiving attorney-client privilege and by not paying the legal bills of 'culpable employees.'"

Lay's Death Prompts Senate Bill To End Practice Of Vacating Convictions. The Wall Street Journal (11/17, Burns) reports, "The death of former Enron Corp. chief executive Kenneth Lay prompted Senate lawmakers to introduce legislation Thursday that would end the practice of dismissing convictions of defendants who die before an appeal is final. The bill by Senate Judiciary Committee members Dianne Feinstein, a Democrat from California, and Jeff Sessions, a Republican from Alabama, was written with help from the Justice Department, which had sought changes after Mr. Lay's death on July 5. Mr. Lay died just weeks after being convicted on criminal charges including securities and bank fraud; a federal district court judge in Houston dismissed the convictions in October. Under current U.S. law, criminal convictions are tossed out when defendants such as Mr. Lay die before they exhaust their right to an appeal." Sessions "noted that Mr. Lay's trial took months and cost taxpayers millions. In such cases, he said 'it is wrong to force the victims or the government to start over from scratch.'" The two senators "said the Justice Department supports the 'principles' contained in the bill. … As written, the bill would end the practice of vacating convictions in such cases and establish new procedures that would allow some cases to continue."

The Houston Chronicle (11/17) reports, "In the wake of a federal judge's decision vacating the late Ken Lay's fraud and conspiracy convictions, two senators introduced a bill today to allow victims to seek restitution when a defendant convicted of a crime dies before his appeals have been completed. … The same day the Justice Department filed notice it will appeal U.S. District Judge Sim Lake's decision to clear Lay's name 'in light of pending legislation.'" The Chronicle continues, "Last month, Lake wiped out the one-time Enron Corp. chairman's convictions because Lay died before the appeals process had been completed. … In reaching that decision, Lake was following a precedent set in the New Orleans-based 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals — the same court that will hear the government's challenge." The Chronicle adds, "The 5th Circuit is unlikely to side with the Justice Department because that court set the precedent Lake followed, said Brian Wice, a Houston attorney who specializes in appeals issues. But the government needs to appeal to that court before it can appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court, he said. … Earlier this month, a three-judge 5th Circuit panel already refused to order Lake to reverse his decision. The panel reiterated Lake's position that legal precedent says that 'when a defendant who has been found guilty of a federal crime dies before exhaustion of his appeal, his prosecution must be abated, his conviction vacated and his indictment dismissed.' … The ruling responded to an appeal of Lake's decision by an Enron shareholder."

The AP (11/17, Ben Evans) reports, "Republican Sen. Jeff Sessions is joining a California Democrat to try to scrap the legal precedent that allowed Enron founder Kenneth Lay's fraud conviction to be cleared from his record after he died in July." The AP continues, "The clearing of Lay's record has hurt prosecutors' efforts to extract $43.5 million in restitution from Lay's estate. Sessions' legislation is an attempt to address that. … Working with the Justice Department, which asked for similar legislation shortly after Lay died, Sessions of Mobile joined Democrat Dianne Feinstein of California to introduce a bill this week that would keep federal convictions in force when a defendant dies, while allowing victims to continue seeking restitution." The Chronicle adds, "Courts traditionally have interpreted the law differently, erasing the convictions of defendants who die before having the chance to appeal. … The bill would make the changes retroactive to July 1 so that they would apply in the Lay case. … 'When a criminal conviction involves financial restitution to the victims of the crime, or when the conviction could be used in a later civil lawsuit, those effects of the conviction should not be erased by the death of the defendant,' Sessions, a former U.S. attorney, said in a release. 'It is wrong to force the victims or the government to start over from scratch.'"

Skilling Settles Enron Employees' Pension Dispute. The Houston Chronicle (11/17) reports, "Former Enron CEO Jeff Skilling has settled the last dispute in litigation by former Enron employees seeking to recover at least some of their pensions that disappeared when the company crashed." The Chronicle continues, "The ex-CEO, who is slated to begin serving more than 24 years in prison next month, has withdrawn his opposition to an $85 million settlement that plaintiffs reached with former company directors and other executives two years ago. … In exchange, plaintiffs resolved claims against Skilling — the last named defendant who hadn't settled — effectively bringing the litigation to a close. … 'Yes, it's over. Our clients are thrilled,' said Lynn Sarko, an attorney who represents ex-Enron employees, today. 'While they are grateful that some of their retirement money was recovered, it will never make up for the destruction of their retirement nest egg.'" The Chronicle adds, "The lawsuit, which recovered about $265 million in settlements — including the $85 million held up by a Skilling appeal — was filed on behalf of more than 20,000 employees after Enron went bankrupt in December 2001. The Labor Department later filed similar litigation, which was folded into the main lawsuit. … The $85 million settlement is derived from insurance money that covered Enron directors and other executives who served on the company's administrative committee. They, as well as Skilling, were named as defendants in the litigation."

Study Examines Stock Options Manipulation. The New York Times (11/17, Dash) reports, "Abuses of stock option grants are perceived to have spread like a virus among high-technology companies. But a new study suggests that hundreds of old-economy companies may also have caught the backdating bug." The Times continues, "In a paper to be released today, researchers estimate that 590 nontechnology companies appear to have manipulated options so their chief executives received them at the lowest price of the month. That compares with 130 technology companies that appear to have backdated their chief executives' options to a monthly low during a 10-year period to the end of 2005." The Times adds, "Traditional manufacturing and service firms make up the bulk of publicly traded companies, so it comes as no surprise that the sheer number of manipulated grants outside the technology sector is larger. … Yet old-economy companies also appear to have made improper grants somewhat less frequently than their new-economy peers, making patterns more difficult to find. That combination, the researchers suggest, has allowed old-line companies to escape much of the scrutiny." The Times notes, "The study is the latest in a series of papers by academic and governance research groups that attempt to measure the extent of the backdating scandal and to explain how it spread. More than 120 companies are under investigation by the Securities and Exchange Commission. The Justice Department and Internal Revenue Service are conducting separate reviews. More than 50 executives and directors have been forced out or fired as a result."

The Wall Street Journal (11/17, A2, Hechinger) reports, "About 850 U.S. chief executives received backdated or otherwise manipulated stock option grants that boosted their annual pay, on average, by at least 10%, according to a new study." The Journal continues, "The study, released yesterday by professors at Harvard and Cornell universities and the French business school Insead, bolsters the view of federal prosecutors who have viewed stock-option backdating as means to steal money from shareholders. Defenders of the companies who engaged in the practice have said that backdating often involved minor sums and was merely an alternative way of providing market-based pay." The Journal adds, "More than 130 companies are under federal investigation in the stock option timing scandal, which has claimed the jobs of more than 50 executives and directors. Five former executives face criminal charges."

The Financial Times (11/17, Guerrera, Masters) reports, "The research by three academics is the first to suggest a link between lax internal controls and stock options backdating. The scandal has so far engulfed more than 130 US companies in internal and regulatory probes but the study suggests that number could climb to 720. … The research also found that, contrary to a widespread perception, 'old economy' companies used the practice almost as much as rivals in 'new economy' sectors – a feature underlined by one of the most recent casualties of the scandal, Bruce Karatz, the ousted chief executive of the housebuilder KB Home. … The results of the study, which looked at options granted by 8,000 companies between 1996 and 2005, will undermine claims by some companies and lawyers that backdating was a widespread and legitimate way of rewarding chief executives."

Comverse CEO Tries To Put Down Roots In Namibia While Fighting Extradition To US. The Wall Street Journal (11/17, A1, Stecklow) reports from Windhoek, Namibia, "Wolfgang Balzer, general manager of the Hotel Thule, now realizes there was something unusual about the Israeli family who checked in this summer for a month, identifying themselves as the Jacobs. … Saying they were planning on settling here, they didn't use credit cards and paid their bill in advance. The husband, who usually kept to himself, became extremely agitated when CNN wasn't available for a few days on their television. … 'I personally thought he was a lawyer or something and he was going to work here,' the hotel manager says. He learned otherwise in late September." The Journal continues, "That's when it emerged that the husband was Jacob 'Kobi' Alexander, a fugitive wanted in the U.S. on fraud charges related to stock-options backdating. The former chief executive of Comverse Technology Inc., a New York software company, had skipped out on the chance to begin talks with U.S. prosecutors that his own New York lawyers had initiated, according to a person familiar with the discussions. … He was arrested at U.S. prosecutors' request on Sept. 27 during lunch with his wife at a country club, even though Namibia has no extradition treaty with the U.S. A Namibian bank regulator had noticed large transfers to Mr. Alexander's local account and tipped off U.S. authorities. Mr. Alexander already had received a two-year work permit under his own name, even though he used an alias at the hotel. The Namibian government asked him to invest $43 million to help qualify for permanent residency." The Journal notes, "Life on the lam has been full of bizarre twists for Mr. Alexander, a 54-year-old Israeli citizen and wealthy ex-CEO who abandoned his family's life in Manhattan for this remote, arid spot in southern Africa. … He was released from jail six days after his arrest on $1.4 million bail, a record amount in this country. Now he continues to live here, out in the open, sometimes buying ice cream in a local mall for his three children. If extradited and convicted in the U.S., he faces up to 25 years in prison. While his team of local lawyers has been fighting extradition, he appears to be trying to settle in Namibia for the long haul."

Judge Bans Former Adelphia Official From Company For Life. The Wall Street Journal/AP (11/17, A17) reports, "A federal judge barred a former Adelphia Communications Corp. executive from ever serving again as an officer or director of a publicly traded company." The AP continues, "Ruling in a case brought by the Securities and Exchange Commission, the judge said former Adelphia vice president Michael C. Mulcahey had helped the former cable-television giant's founding family engage in a fraud that contributed to the company's 2002 collapse. … Mr. Mulcahey was acquitted of criminal fraud charges in 2004, but the SEC sought regulatory sanctions for his conduct." The AP adds, 'U.S. District Judge Kevin Castel conducted a trial in July and ruled yesterday that although Mr. Mulcahey wasn't an 'architect' of fraud at Adelphia he had 'egregiously' violated 'numerous securities laws.' … The judge also ruled, however, that Mr. Mulcahey hadn't been personally enriched by fraud at the company. He declined to order any fines against Mr. Mulcahey, who made $140,000 in his best year with Adelphia, but banned him from receiving 'anything of value' in the future from the family of the company's founder, John Rigas, who was convicted along with a son on fraud charges."

sharply increased its revenue and made more profit from the revenue." The Times continues, "Net income for its fourth quarter, which ended Oct. 31, rose to $1.7 billion, or 60 cents a share, from $416 million, or 14 cents a share, a year ago, which included $1.57 billion in restructuring charges. After adjusting for the manner in which the charges are accounted for, net income increased 27 percent. Revenue increased 7 percent, to $24.6 billion." The Times adds, "With $91.7 billion in revenue for the year, a 6 percent increase over 2005, the company overtook I.B.M. as the world's largest technology company. (The consensus of analysts puts I.B.M.'s 2006 revenue at $90.72 billion.) H.P. has also overtaken Dell as the world's largest PC vendor mostly because sales of its notebook computers grew 24 percent. … 'We certainly aren't taking any victory laps, but we are pleased with the progress,' the chairman and chief executive, Mark V. Hurd, said." The Times notes, "The company's top executives were distracted through much of the quarter by revelations of spying operations conducted against several directors and journalists. The imbroglio led to the resignation of Patricia C. Dunn, the company's chairwoman, who this week pleaded not guilty to four felony charges. A former company lawyer and its director of ethics, Kevin Hunsaker, also faces charges. He has pleaded not guilty. Three contractors were also charged and have also pleaded not guilty. … The fallout from the affair has not ended. The company disclosed that the Securities and Exchange Commission has opened an investigation of the handling of disclosures of board information. It also said the Federal Communications Commission has requested information on the company's spying, which included using false pretenses to obtain private phone records. The California attorney general is expected to sue Hewlett-Packard in civil court. In addition, the United States attorney in Northern California continues his investigation."

CRIMINAL LAW:

US, Canada Agree To Share Forensics Data.

The AP (11/17) reports, "U.S. and Canadian law enforcement officials agreed Thursday to begin sharing forensics data from crimes scenes in both countries." The AP continues, "A memorandum of understanding signed by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Canadian Minister of Public Safety Stockwell Day marks the first in which the United States has agreed to immediate sharing of crime-scene information with a foreign government. … 'And while terrorism is a primary concern for all of us, it is not our only job,' Gonzales said. 'Criminals are constantly searching for new ways to prey upon our communities. To stop them, we must maintain the same vigilance we show against terrorists.'" The AP adds, "Before Thursday's action, the two countries exchanged only a limited amount of ballistics information. … Under the agreement, each country will be able to view real-time forensics data, allowing bullets and firearms to be linked across crime scenes in both countries, said Michael Sullivan, acting director of the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives. … Canada has strict laws governing handgun sales, with the result that the majority of handguns used to commit crimes in Canada are purchased in the United States, Sullivan said." The AP notes, "The signing took place as part of the ninth annual United States-Canada Cross-Border Crime Forum, which is held at the historic Biltmore Estate in western North Carolina. The two-day meeting brought together hundreds of law-enforcement officers from the two countries."

The Asheville (NC) Citizen-Times (11/17, Barrett) reports, "U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, Secretary of Homeland Security Michael Chertoff and other government officials from the United States and Canada are on the Biltmore Estate today for a meeting on fighting crime along the two countries' border." The Citizen-Times continues, "Canadian Minister of Justice Vic Toews and Stockwell Day, Canada's minister of public safety and emergency preparedness are also scheduled to attend. … Approximately 130 people are attending the forum, including Canadian and U.S. officials and the U.S. Attorneys General from all the border states with Canada." The Citizen-Times adds, "Biltmore Estate spokesperson Elizabeth Sims said a past visit to the estate by Gonzales' wife inspired forum organizers to choose Biltmore for their meeting. … 'Mrs. Gonzales visited the property a couple of years ago and stayed at the inn and she just really liked the Biltmore Estate,' Sims said. 'So when they began looking for a location for this meeting, they thought we were a great place.'"

The Canadian Press (11/17) reports, "Canada and the United States signed a deal yesterday to share more information quickly on guns, bullets and cartridges related to crime scenes. … The agreement will enable police on both sides of the border to compare evidence electronically and instantaneously instead of exchanging it manually on a case-by-case basis." CP adds, "U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales also emphasized co-operative steps to combat the illegal flow of U.S. firearms north of the border, including a focus on the rise of gun-related violence in the Toronto area. … Canada has long complained about the weapons, particularly handguns, smuggled in from the United States."

WLOS- TV (11/16, 11:00 p.m.) Greenville, Spartanburg, Asheville, broadcasted, "33 top Bush Administration officials come to Asheville to discuss border security and fighting crime with their Canadian counterparts. US Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Homeland Security Chief Michael Chertoff hosted the gathering at the Biltmore Estate. More than 100 law enforcement officials watched as the two sides signed an agreement to share firearms information. Gonzales said, "It will improve our ability to identify crime scene evidence and will advance joint efforts to fight gun crimes." WSPA- TV and WYFF- TV also ran this story in the same cities.

Abramoff Reportedly Fingers Reid, Other Democratic Senators. ABC News' "The Blotter" blog (11/15, Ross, Schwartz) reported, "As convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff reported to federal prison today, a source close to the investigation surrounding his activities told ABC News that Sen. Harry Reid (D-Nev.) was one of the members of Congress Abramoff had allegedly implicated in his cooperation with federal prosecutors." A spokesperson for Reid "said the senator had done nothing illegal or unethical." Reid spokesman Jim Manley said, "We have no idea what Abramoff is telling prosecutors to save his skin, but I do know that these kind of old allegations are completely ridiculous and untrue." ABC adds, "A source close to the investigation says Abramoff told prosecutors that more than $30,000 in campaign contributions to Reid from Abramoff's clients 'were no accident and were in fact requested by Reid.'" Abramoff has "reportedly claimed the Nevada senator agreed to help him on matters related to Indian gambling." Sources "close to the federal investigation say Abramoff has offered testimony about his contacts with 'six to eight seriously corrupt Democratic senators' and an ever larger number of Republican members of Congress." In addition to Reid, "the sources say Abramoff has been most closely questioned about his contacts with Sen. Conrad Burns (R-Mont.), who was defeated in last week's election."

Texas Appeals Court Rules Bush Overstepped Authority In Medellin Case. The AP (11/17, Graczyk) reports from Houston, "A state appeals court chastised President Bush for intervening in the case of a condemned killer born in Mexico, one of several dozen cases in which Bush ordered new hearings amid international complaints." The AP continues, "The Texas Court of Criminal Appeals on Wednesday rejected the argument from Jose Ernesto Medellin that he was denied legal help he should have received under international treaties. … Medellin, who spent most of his life in Texas, was sentenced in 1994 to die for the rapes and killings of two teenage girls. … 'We hold that the President has exceeded his constitutional authority by intruding into the independent powers of the judiciary,' the court said in a 64-page ruling." The AP adds, "Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said the department was reviewing the ruling and considering its options. … Medellin was supported in his appeal by dozens of countries, legal groups and human rights organizations, as well as former American diplomats and the European Union. Much of the international community is opposed to capital punishment and the execution of Mexican nationals in Texas, the nation's most active death penalty state, is a particularly touchy point." The AP notes, "At issue overall was how much weight U.S. courts should give to decisions of the International Court of Justice in The Hague, which ruled the convictions of Medellin and 50 other Mexican-born prisoners violated the 1963 Vienna Convention. The pact requires consular access for Americans detained abroad and foreigners arrested in the United States. … In February 2005, Bush unexpectedly ordered new state court hearings for all 51 prisoners. The Texas court said Wednesday neither the Constitution nor any act of Congress gives the president the power to issue such an order. … The decision means Medellin, 31, is not entitled to additional review of his international rights claim."

judge announced he agreed." WBNS-TV adds, "Federal judge Gregory Frost issued a written decision reading the jury's sentencing on Lawrence's murder verdicts were inconsistent -- giving life on one charge and then death on another. The judge wrote: 'The court has no choice but to set aside the death sentence and order a new sentencing hearing.' … The judge added, 'The discrepencies point to irrational arbitrary juror conduct.' … Franklin County Prosecutor Ron O'Brien told 10TV Thursday that he will meet with Justice Department officials to decide the next step. O'Brien said they will likely appeal this decision to the Federal Appeals Court."

Florida Officials Join FBI In Foley Probe. The South Florida Sun-Sentinel (11/17, Othón) reports, "Not seen publicly since resigning from Congress in a national scandal, Mark Foley emerged on Thursday in Palm Beach County after the death of his father. … The former Congressman, who left his post as a U.S. representative in September after the disclosure that he had sent sexually explicit emails to Congressional pages, is in town for Ed Foley's funeral. Ed Foley, 85, died Tuesday." The Sun-Sentinel continues, "Foley's emergence comes as the Florida Department of Law Enforcement indicated it has shifted from a preliminary inquiry to a 'full-fledged criminal investigation' regarding Foley. … As the scandal unfolded and more details were made public concerning Foley's communications with teenage boys, the U.S. Justice Department and FDLE indicated they were launching inquiries. … 'We found that there might be criminal violations that would warrant a full investigation,' said FDLE spokeswoman Kristen Perezluha, adding that the agency also is assisting the FBI. 'We don't know, but that's what we're going to look into.'"

Judge Stays Safavian Sentence. Government Executive (11/17, Palmer) reports, "In an unexpected move, a judge granted a request Thursday from David Safavian, the former head of the Office of Management and Budget's procurement policy shop, for a stay of his prison sentence, pending an appeal of his June conviction of obstructing justice and making false statements." GE continues, "Safavian filed an appeal in September challenging his conviction on four counts of making false statements to General Services Administration employees and obstructing an investigation by GSA's inspector general. The charges stem from Safavian's relationship with lobbyist Jack Abramoff while serving as chief of staff at GSA, and focused on a Scotland golf trip the men took together, along with other officials, in 2002." GE adds, "Appeals can take several years, so Safavian's sentence of 18 months -- if upheld -- will not begin until after that ruling. … In his opinion granting the request, U.S. District Judge Paul Friedman cited the section of U.S. Code that says that if a person is not likely to flee, and the appeal raises a substantial question of law likely to result in a reversal, new trial or different sentence, then the judge can grant a request for release on bond. … Safavian's lawyer, Barbara 'Biz' Van Gelder, raised numerous legal issues before, during and after the trial, including questions about the admission of controversial e-mails between Safavian and Abramoff as evidence."

US Attorney, FBI Investigating Cleveland Public Housing Land Deal. The AP (11/17) reports from Cleveland, "Federal prosecutors are investigating the $150,000-an-acre purchase of inner-city land by the city's public housing agency. U.S. Attorney Greg White said Wednesday that his office and FBI agents had begun a preliminary investigation of the purchase by the Cuyahoga Metropolitan Housing Authority. White confirmed the investigation one day after Todd Davis, a developer whose company sold the land to the agency, met with federal investigators."

Pennsylvania Couple Suing To Obtain New York Fugitive Reward. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (11/17, Nephin) reports, "A couple filed a lawsuit to claim a $350,000 reward offered for Ralph 'Bucky' Phillips, a former fugitive who is accused of shooting a New York state trooper and suspected of shooting two others." Jack and Gloria Young of Warren, Penn., "called Warren city police shortly before midnight on Sept. 7 after seeing a suspicious person near their property, a tip they say led directly to the capture of Phillips. 'But for my clients' phone call, (police) still would not have found Bucky, or at least not found him that night,' Robert C. Greene, an attorney for the Youngs, said Thursday." The AP notes, "The couple is suing the Police Benevolent Association of the New York State Troopers Inc., which they say is wrongly withholding the reward. … The FBI put up an additional $100,000 reward. The lawsuit does not address that reward, but Greene said the couple is considering suing the FBI also."

Reputed Philadelphia Mob Associate Released On Bond. The Philadelphia Inquirer (11/17, Anastasia, 385K) reports, "Reputed mob associate Damion Canalichio was released on $75,000 bond yesterday after his arrest earlier this week on two-year-old drug-dealing charges. Canalichio, 37, is the second high-profile mob figure to be arrested in the last month in what some law enforcement sources say is part of a concerted federal push against alleged South Philadelphia mob boss Joseph Ligambi." The Inquirer notes, "The fact that authorities waited more than two years to bring charges in the case has fueled speculation that Canalichio is a target in a broader probe. His attorney, Joseph Santaguida, said yesterday that he originally thought his client was going to be arrested on illegal-gambling charges. In June, the FBI raided Canalichio's home and an apartment on Snyder Avenue out of which he…allegedly operated. No drugs were found, but authorities reportedly seized records and documents tied to a gambling operation."

Boston Mobster Serving Life For Murder Paroled For Christmas. The Boston Herald (11/17, McPhee, 184K) reports, "Vincent Federico -- the convicted killer who became a made man in the Mafia while on a weekend prison furlough in a ceremony that was bugged by the FBI -- will be paroled for Christmas after he disavowed any mob ties, the Herald has learned. Federico, now 46, is a second-degree lifer at MCI-Norfolk in connection with the murder of a Cambridge man, Robert McFarlane, who was hit by five bullets as he helped a friend move out of a North End apartment above Federico's in 1977. Federico had argued with the victim for no apparent reason before shooting him…according to the parole decision." The Herald notes, "The FBI bug in the Medford basement was long considered the most important incursion ever by law enforcement into the innermost sanctums of organized crime, and the tapes helped bring down the Patriarca family."

US Investigating Alleged Sex Tourism By San Francisco Police Officer. KTVU-TV San Francisco (11/16) reported on its Web site from a story broadcast yesterday, "Federal authorities confirmed Thursday an investigation into the past actions of San Francisco police Officer Donald Ramirez, who died of an apparent suicide last month in a Cambodian jail cell where he was being held for sex crimes." Cambodian "authorities had apparently arrested Ramirez for sexual activity with a 14-year girl." ICE spokeswoman Virginia Kice "said Thursday that Ramirez had been under investigation since 2001," but "they never found any evidence of a crime. 'We have received several new leads and we will pursue those vigorously,' Kice said." KTVU noted, "Akha human rights activist Matthew McDaniel says he told an FBI agent that Ramirez '…had a real appetite for underage girls' when the agent contacted him a decade ago in Burma."

Bay City News Wires (11/16, 5:25 p.m. PST) reported, "Police commissioner Joe Veronese said last week of the investigation that 'there was no greater issue in the department than this.' The police commission, however, has yet to announce if it will take up the issue. Other police organizations are staying away from any involvement in the incident. 'Whatever he does in his off-duty time is his matter,' Police Officers Association Vice President Kevin Martin said. 'This is not a POA issue.'"

Judge Denies Bail For KeyBank Executive Charged With Embezzlement. The AP (11/17) reports, "A former KeyBank vice president accused of embezzling $29 million is a risk to flee and must be jailed to await his trial, a federal magistrate ruled Thursday in denying bond for the suspect. Magistrate Judge Patricia A. Hemann said the overseas travels of David F. Verhotz, 56, of Cleveland, likely gave him contacts that would be useful if he fled. In addition, she noted that more than $8 million is still missing." The AP notes, "An affidavit filed by the FBI said Verhotz took out loans in the names of three European banks and put the money in his accounts."

Texas Bank Manager Pleads Guilty To Embezzlement. The San Antonio Express-News (11/17, Contreras) reports, "Nancy Lynn Limmer has been a New Braunfels councilwoman and bank branch manager, but on Thursday she became a federal felon. In a federal court hearing in San Antonio, Limmer, 44, admitted that she defrauded more than $161,000 from the First Commercial Bank in New Braunfels, where she'd worked for 17 years. … She admitted misappropriating money from customers' accounts at the branch she headed in New Braunfels between April 2002 and August 2005." The Express-News notes that Limmer cooperated "with the FBI" and agreed to "a plea deal before Assistant U.S. Attorney Tom McHugh presented the case to a grand jury."

Connecticut Investment Advisor Pleads Guilty To Defrauding Clients. The Hartford Courant (11/15, Gosselin, 190K) reported, "Avon investment adviser David M. Faubert lived the high life for five years, taking lavish vacations, buying expensive cars and developing a love for the Foxwoods and Mohegan Sun casinos. But that lifestyle costs money. And as Faubert racked up $1 million in gambling losses and became a heavy cocaine user, he found a new source of financing: more than $4.5 million of his clients' money." On Tuesday, Faubert "pleaded guilty in U.S. District Court in New Haven to 10 counts of mail fraud, one count of embezzlement from an employee benefit plan and four counts of filing false tax returns, all between 2000 and 2005." The AP (11/15) noted, "Faubert told clients that he would guarantee them an 8 percent rate of return if the clients invested money in a fixed investment account he controlled, authorities said. As a result of Faubert's promises, 21 clients provided him with about $5.5 million. But authorities say the fixed investment account did not exist, and Faubert deposited the money into his business and personal accounts."

Florida Man Sentenced To 15 Years In Prison For Child Porn Possession. The Tampa Tribune (11/17, Silvestrini) reports, "A former Polk County sheriff's employee was sentenced Thursday morning to 15 years in federal prison after pleading guilty to child pornography charges. After he is released, James Patrick Odle, 24, of Winter Haven, will be on probation indefinitely under the terms of his sentence. Odle was a civilian detention technician at the South County Jail in Frostproof when investigators from the FBI's Innocent Images Task Force searched his room in his parents' home." The Tribune notes, "A forensic examination of his computers and electronic storage devices revealed more than 5,000 images, including three video files, of children engaged in sexually explicit conduct, according to the U.S. attorney's office."

Former USF Dean Pleads Guilty To Child Porn Charge. The AP (11/17) reports, "A former dean at University of San Francisco's School of Education has agreed to plead guilty to a child pornography charge and serve more than 5 years in prison, federal prosecutors said." The AP continues, "William T. Garner, 66, of San Francisco, acknowledged in the plea deal that he knowingly possessed more than 15,000 images of minors engaged in sexually explicit acts, U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan said. … 'The children depicted in these images are the victims of horrible abuse, and we will vigorously prosecute individuals possessing these materials,' Ryan said in a statement." The AP adds, "Garner and prosecutors agreed to recommend a 63-month prison sentence, a fine of $12,500 and $50,000 in restitution to be paid to the San Francisco Child Abuse Prevention Center, Ryan said. The penalties still must be approved by a judge. .. .The maximum penalty for the charge is a 10-year prison term and a $250,000 fine."

Global Crossing Official Blasts New Wiretapping Rules. CNET News (11/17, Broache) reports, "An executive from a company that manages a large portion of the Internet's infrastructure on Thursday slammed federal wiretapping rules expected to take effect next spring." CNET continues, "Paul Kouroupas, vice president of regulatory affairs for Global Crossing, strongly criticized the Federal Communications Commission's broadening of a 1994 law--originally intended to cover telephone providers--as disproportionately costly, complex, and riddled with privacy concerns. His company is one of the world's largest Internet backbone providers. … 'Our customers are large Fortune 500 companies--not too many of those companies are conducting drug deals or terrorist activities out of Merrill Lynch's offices or using their phones in that way,' Kouroupas said at an event here sponsored by the DC Bar Association. 'By and large we don't get wiretap requests, yet we're faced with the costs to come into compliance,' which he estimated at $1 million." CNET adds, "At issue is an order issued last fall by the Federal Communications Commission that set a deadline of May 14, 2007, by which most broadband and Internet phone providers are required to reengineer their networks for easier snooping by law enforcement. The move expanded the Communications Assistance for Law Enforcement Act, or CALEA, which Congress wrote to impose obligations on telephone companies, but not Internet providers. … Even without the new FCC rules, police have the legal authority to conduct Internet wiretaps, but they have claimed the need for a 'standardized' system. The formal broadening of the rules followed lobbying from the FBI, the Drug Enforcement Administration and the Justice Department, which said they needed to be able to eavesdrop more readily on criminals who spurned traditional telephone lines."

DC Police Arrest Man In Burglary At Site Of Lawyer's Slaying. The Washington Post (11/17, B01, Klein, Schwartzman) reports, "A burglary at a Northwest Washington townhouse has drawn the attention of D.C. homicide detectives investigating the unsolved slaying of a prominent lawyer three months ago at the same address." The Post continues, "Police have arrested a 36-year-old man in the burglary of the house, which was unoccupied during the break-in Oct. 30. Authorities quoted the man, Phelps Collins, as saying that he got inside with help from a friend -- the brother of the townhouse's owner. … Detectives have not drawn a connection between the break-in and the stabbing of Robert Wone on Aug. 2, but homicide detectives have been looking into the burglary in hopes of uncovering potential leads, authorities said. Wone, 32, was stabbed in the chest while visiting friends at the home in the 1500 block of Swann Street NW, on the edge of Dupont Circle." The Post adds, "New details about the burglary emerged through interviews, court papers and testimony at a hearing for Collins this week in D.C. Superior Court. Collins was arrested last Friday on a burglary charge. … Police said Collins told them that the friend, Michael Price, had a key to the house because it belonged to his brother, Joe Price. Police also quoted Collins as saying that Michael Price turned off the alarm once the two men entered the house. About $7,700 worth of electronics were stolen, police said. … Michael Price has not been charged in the burglary."

Stores Use Internal Security To Stop Thieves. USA Today (11/17, O'donnell) reports from Seminole, FL, "Justin Reed is scanning images from 18 cameras at a Beall's department store here when saleswoman Carissa Tunis calls from the juniors department to direct his attention to four young men behaving oddly. … Reed, sitting in the store's so-called loss-prevention room, zeros in on the men and sees one slip a wallet in his pocket. He goes back over the image a few times to be sure. When another camera shows the group leaving the store, Reed and Jim Stevenson, a Beall's loss-prevention senior manager, slip out the security door and nab a 17-year-old." USA continues, "As the two beefy investigators hustle the teen back inside, he pleads that he's just off probation. They call the police anyway. Within minutes, he's the first of two shoplifters arrested during four hours that USA TODAY spent observing the store's crime-fighting efforts. … On this November day, the culprit is a fairly harmless high school dropout. But the retail industry spends billions on technology and investigators such as Reed to combat what they call 'organized theft rings': gangs of shoplifters who sweep through stores with military precision. The retailers are fighting back with a new national crime database, electronic receipts, digital video recording technology and their own brand of detective work." USA adds, "Stymied by police and courts that are often unwilling or unable to tackle crimes they may see as petty theft, the retailers build their own cases against the gangs, connecting crimes that often cross county and state lines. To help document the scope of this organized thievery, investigators for Walgreens, Target, Safeway, Limited Brands and others even follow thieves from their stores to the 'fences' where they sell the goods. … The FBI and retail groups expect that by the end of this year, every major retailer will be able to share crime data — including photos of suspects from their store cameras — in a computer database. Beall's, a Florida-based chain, and other retailers now track shoplifting gangs using the database, which has already helped link a suspect to thefts of $500,000 worth of goods from 12 retailers. The man is still a fugitive, but warrants for his arrest are out in three states."

Baltimore Bars Hit By String Of Armed Robberies. The Baltimore Sun (11/17, Linskey) reports, "A masked man put a gun to the head of a bartender at Dizzy Issie's and demanded that she open the register while he counted to five. The man yelled, 'Keep down don't move' to the 50 or so people at the hipster Remington bar. A second man, also masked, stood lookout at a side door." The Sun continues, "After prying the till free, the pair ran out with about $800 and hopped into a waiting car. Shaken customers picked themselves up. Several called police, and then everyone cleared out for the night. … Police say they believe the same men have held up eight bars in the past three weeks, usually the same way." The Sun adds, "Either two or three men enter the tavern wearing gloves and masks or bandanas to cover their faces, according to police. One man, waving a gun, immediately jumps behind the bar and, in most cases, removes the entire cash drawer. Another man stands as a lookout and prevents people from leaving the bar. … In addition to the Tuesday night robbery at Dizzy Issie's, police believe the group is responsible for holding up three other bars this week -- one in Charles Village on Monday night, one in Upper Fells Point late Wednesday and another in Pigtown early Thursday morning. In recent weeks other bars have been held up in Remington, Mill Hill and Carroll-South Hilton in West Baltimore."

DC Has High Rate Of Gun Slayings. The Washington Times (11/17, Cella) reports, "The District is among the major U.S. cities with the highest percentage of people being killed by firearms, despite having one of the strictest gun-control laws in the country." The Times continues, "A recent Metropolitan Police Department report on homicides from 2001 to 2005 states that 901 of 1,126 homicide victims, or about 80 percent, were fatally shot. … 'It's a problem,' Chief Charles H. Ramsey said. 'It may be something that's with us for a while.'" The Times adds, "Firearms last year alone were used to commit 157 of the District's 196 homicides, or about 80 percent. That percentage has remained relatively consistent since 2001, when a five-year low of 78.4 percent of homicides were committed using guns. .. .FBI crime statistics for 2005 show 10,100 of the country's 14,860 homicide victims, or 68 percent, were killed by guns. .. .The District's percentage of gun homicides is comparable to those in other big cities, according to the U.S. Bureau of Justice Statistics. … In 2004, the last year for which comprehensive statistics were available, the 79.3 percent of homicides involving guns in the District was higher than the 61.1 percent in New York. Chicago reported 75.2 percent, and Baltimore had 77.5 percent."

Target Of California Corruption Probe Faces Molestation Charges. The Los Angeles Times (11/17, Hong, Pringle) reports, "A political corruption scandal took a sordid turn Thursday when a defendant in the Vernon voter-fraud prosecution was charged with sexually molesting four boys while serving as dean of students at Daniel Murphy Catholic High School." The Times continues, "John Joseph Malburg, son of Vernon Mayor Leonis Malburg, who is also accused in the corruption case, pleaded not guilty to numerous counts of child sexual abuse, lewd acts and making a videotape for sale of a minor engaged in sex acts." The Times adds, "Authorities said one student appeared in a sexually explicit tape in exchange for a higher grade. In addition, Malburg, 37, is charged with possessing child pornography and secretly videotaping boys while they showered at his Hancock Park home. … As an offshoot of the 19-month corruption probe, investigators began to examine Malburg's contact with the boys over a period of 10 years, according to the Los Angeles County district attorney's office." The Times notes, "The Archdiocese of Los Angeles learned about the sex abuse inquiry sometime before Malburg was fired in July but did not notify parents at the Fairfax-area school, spokesman Tod M. Tamberg said. … Tamberg said the district attorney's office asked the archdiocese to keep the matter confidential. Jane Robison, a district attorney's spokeswoman, could not confirm that."

CIVIL LAW:

Trial Begins In Suit Against FBI Alleging Wrongful Convictions. The AP (11/17, Lindsay) reports, "Two Boston men spent 30 years in prison for an underworld slaying they did not commit after a judge ruled that the FBI withheld evidence that would have cleared the pair to protect a mob hitman who was serving as an informant. … Now, in a trial that opened Thursday, those men and the families of two others who were wrongfully convicted are seeking damages from the government that could total more than $100 million." The AP continues, "Joseph 'The Animal' Barboza was a known mob assassin responsible for numerous hits during Boston's gangland wars of the 1960s. He was also so vital to FBI efforts to crack the mob that the agency allowed him to wrongly implicate four men for murder, attorneys for the plaintiffs said in opening statements. … Joseph Salvati and Peter Limone and the families of two other men who died while behind bars accuse the federal government of malicious prosecution, conspiracy and depriving the men's family of companionship. … 'It was a rigged game, a charade, a story concocted by Mr. Barboza and assented to by the FBI,' said attorney Austin McGuigan, who represents Salvati. 'There was no hope the real story in this case would be uncovered.'" The AP adds, "The case is the latest development in a scandal that unfolded in Boston about a decade ago, when it was learned that the FBI had a corrupt relationship with the mob, protecting killers who were informants and even tipping them off to pending indictments. … The lawsuit was filed after the Justice Department released documents in 2001 that showed the FBI withheld evidence from state prosecutors that could have cleared the men so the agency could protect an informant who actually committed the crime."

The Boston Globe (11/17, Murphy) reports, "There's no question that the FBI recruited notorious hitman Joseph 'The Animal' Barboza as a witness against local Mafia leaders, then turned him over to state prosecutors in a case that led to the wrongful conviction of four men for a 1965 gangland murder in Chelsea. … But Thursday, on the first day of a civil trial seeking more than $100 million in damages from the federal government, a Justice Department lawyer insisted the FBI can't be blamed because state prosecutors were responsible for investigating and trying the case. … 'The FBI is not liable,' said the government attorney, Bridget Bailey Lipscomb. … But lawyers for Peter Limone, Joseph Salvati, Henry Tameleo, and Louis Greco accused the FBI of making a 'mockery' of justice by failing to tell state prosecutors or defense lawyers about evidence that suggested Barboza had framed the four men for the slaying of small-time hoodlum Edward 'Teddy' Deegan."

Boston Herald Columnist Assails FBI, Lipscomb. In his Boston Herald (11/17, 184K) column, Peter Gelzinis writes, "That the prospect of justice has arrived 40 years late for Joe Salvati and Peter Limone, along with two fellow defendants who died in prison, Louis Greco and Henry Tameleo…is shameful. That the Department of Justice has seen fit to send Bridget Bailey Lipscomb back to Boston to defend the putrid reputation of the FBI…well, that could be called a blessing. With Ms. Lipscomb at the government table, the only question may well be how much of a potential $100 million in civil damages will these men and their families see. Five months ago, Lipscomb's attempt to convince U.S. District Court Judge Reginald C. Lindsay that the FBI could not be blamed for enabling their Teflon rat, Whitey Bulger, to slaughter John McIntyre, turned into graceless courtroom hash." Gelznis adds, "This time, however, the FBI's crime is even more egregious. And the case will be heard by a different federal judge, U.S. District Court Judge Nancy Gertner."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Democrats Vow To Strengthen Oversight Of DOJ Civil Rights Division. The Boston Globe (11/17, Savage) reports, "Democrats on the Senate Judiciary Committee yesterday vowed to impose intense oversight on the Justice Department's Civil Rights Division next year, telling a Bush administration official in charge of the agency that the next Congress will scrutinize whether civil rights laws are being properly enforced." The Globe continues, "Speaking at the first Civil Rights Division oversight hearing since May 2002, the Democrats cited several newspaper articles about the agency over the past year -- including a Globe analysis of changes in the hiring process for lawyers in the division -- and said they would investigate the administration's stewardship of the agency after they regain power in January. … 'There are disturbing reports that career lawyers have been shut out of the division's decision-making process, that the division's civil rights enforcement on behalf of racial minorities has sharply declined, and that the department has packed the division with attorneys who have no background in civil rights litigation,' said Senator Patrick J. Leahy, Democrat of Vermont, who will become committee chairman in January." The Globe adds, "Senator Russell Feingold, Democrat of Wisconsin, said he wanted to know whether the Bush administration was exerting political interference on the division's decisions about when to file cases. The agency has long been a source of political tension because it is charged with enforcing antidiscrimination laws and reviewing changes to state voting rules. … Wan Kim , assistant attorney general for civil rights, said he welcomed congressional attention. … 'I certainly share your . . . interest in oversight,' Kim said, adding that he has 'a deep and abiding respect for this committee and the work that it does in making sure that all branches of government are operating consistent with the law.'" The Globe notes, "One major focus by the lawmakers was a change in hiring procedures. In July, the Globe reported that in late 2002, the Bush administration disbanded a longstanding hiring committee of veteran career lawyers. Political appointees took over screening résumés, interviewing applicants, and deciding who should fill vacancies in the permanent civil service ranks. … After the change, successful applicants were significantly less likely to have civil rights backgrounds, according to a Globe analysis of résumés obtained under the Freedom of Information Act. New hires were also more likely to have conservative credentials, such as membership in the Federalist Society, a group that takes a skeptical view of aggressive civil rights enforcement."

DOJ Sues California Apartment Owners Alleging Discrimination. The AP (11/17) reports, "The U.S. Justice Department sued two apartment building owners for housing discrimination Thursday, claiming they favored Vietnamese tenants over Hispanic tenants." The AP continues, "Gary Luke and Mary Ngo, owners of adjacent apartment complexes in Garden Grove in Orange County, violated the federal Fair Housing Act barring discrimination against people based on national origin, the government claims. … The lawsuit arose from a charge made recently by the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development. The suit seeks monetary damages, civil penalties and a court order prohibiting future discrimination." The AP adds, "Federal authorities say Luke and Ngo issued notices in the last year to Hispanic tenants telling them they had 60 days to leave so their units could be renovated. … When Hispanic tenants later tried to move back into the remodeled units, all were either told that they could not return or were promised rental applications that were never provided, authorities said. … Vacated units were later rented out to Vietnamese tenants, the government said."

DOJ May Be Probing GOP Maryland Election Fliers. The Washington Post (11/17, B02, Rich, Eggen) reports, "A senior Justice Department official said yesterday that the misleading fliers distributed by Republicans in Maryland on Election Day may -- or may not -- be the subject of an investigation by the department's criminal division." The Post continues, "Wan Kim, assistant attorney general for the department's civil rights division, said during a Senate hearing that he believed the matter was under investigation but quickly added, 'I'm not 100 percent sure about that.' … Two public affairs officers at Justice Department headquarters in Washington said they could neither confirm nor deny that an investigation is underway." The Post adds, "The fliers -- authorized by the campaigns of Republicans Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr., who lost his bid for a second term, and Michael S. Steele, who was defeated in his bid for a Senate seat -- have been widely denounced for implying, incorrectly, that the two candidates were endorsed by prominent black figures including former NAACP leader Kweisi Mfume and Prince George's County Executive Jack B. Johnson (D)."

Two Face Additional Sex Trafficking Charges In Tennessee. The Robertson County (TN) Times (11/17, Howard) reports, "Two people are facing additional federal charges this week for allegedly forcing a Mexican teenager into prostitution as part of a sex trafficking ring that operated in Nashville and Memphis, federal officials said." The Times continues, "A federal grand jury in Memphis issued indictments Thursday charging Juan Mendez and Cristina Andres Perfecto with using fraud and coercion to force an adult woman and the teenager into a life of prostitution. They were charged in October with sex trafficking of children." The Times adds, "Federal investigators believe the teenager was smuggled into the country from Oaxaca, Mexico, and thought she was going to get a job as a waitress at a Nashville restaurant. … She was taken to a Harding Place-area apartment, where she was beaten, raped and forced to have sex with as many as 40 men per day, according to court documents." The Times notes, "The girl, now 15, was taken into the custody of the state Department of Children's Services and placed with a Spanish-speaking foster family, DCS spokesman Rob Johnson said. … Raymundo Flores, Raul Santillan-Leon and Fernando Reyes-Santillan also were indicted on charges of conspiracy to launder money and harbor illegal immigrants at a brothel in Memphis, justice department officials said in a news release. … All five of those indicted were connected to the same sex-trafficking ring, according to federal officials."

Judge Asked To Limit DOJ's Involvement In Probe Of Mississippi Inmate Death. The Biloxi (MS) Sun Herald (11/17, Fitzgerald) reports from Gulfport, MS, "Ryan Teel's attorney wants a judge to instruct the government not to interfere with the defendant's investigation in preparation of Teel's trial involving an inmate death." The Herald continues, "The Harrison County Sheriff's Department has denied the defense a request to examine the county jail booking room and to question jail employees, according to a motion filed by Jim Davis, Teel's attorney. … Teel, a former corrections officer, is set to stand trial May 28 on criminal charges of civil rights violations in the fatal beating of Jessie Lee Williams Jr. The incident occurred in the jail booking room on Feb. 4. Regina Rhodes, also a former jailer, pleaded guilty to her role in the assault and to lying to cover it up." The Herald adds, "Davis asked for an emergency telephone conference with a judge today to discuss his concerns. … Allowing the defense access to the booking room and jail employees is 'necessary in order to properly prepare for trial,' Davis wrote in his motion. He was not available for comment Thursday. … Teel is in custody at an undisclosed location." The Herald notes, "Davis' latest motions claim Capt. Steve Campbell, who runs the sheriff's professional standards unit, agreed Nov. 7 to allow a booking room visit and witness interviews, but changed his mind the next day. Campbell said permission was needed from the U.S. Attorney's Office, an affidavit stated. … Sheriff George H. Payne Jr. declined comment and referred questions to his attorney, Cy Faneca, who said he advised the sheriff to let the U.S. Justice Department make that decision. … 'We are not involved in the criminal case because the Justice Department is conducting that investigation,' Faneca said. 'Nobody has told us what the ground rules are, so it certainly would be prudent to let Justice make that decision.' … The U.S. Attorney's Office, which is prosecuting Teel in the criminal case, operates under the Justice Department. … U.S. Attorney Dunn Lampton said his office will file a response to Davis' complaint today."

UCLA Police Use Stun-Gun On Student In Library ID Dispute. The AP (11/17) reports, "A UCLA police officer shocked a student with a stun gun at a campus library after he refused repeated requests to show student identification and wouldn't leave, police said." The AP continues, "The student, Mostafa Tabatabainejad, was shocked Tuesday at about 11 p.m. as police did a routine check of student IDs at the University of California, Los Angeles Powell Library computer lab. … 'This is a long-standing library policy to ensure the safety of students during the late-night hours,' said UCLA Police Department spokeswoman Nancy Greenstein." The AP adds, "She said police tried to escort Tabatabainejad, 23, out of the library after he refused to provide identification. Tabatabainejad instead encouraged others at the library to join his resistance, and when a crowd began to gather, police used the stun gun on him, Greenstein said. … Tabatabainejad was arrested for resisting and obstructing a police officer and later released on his own recognizance."

Study Says California Initiative Limited Minority Contracts, Admissions. The Washington Post (11/17, A23, Williamson, Strauss, 690K) reports the "number of minorities -- particularly black Americans -- winning government contracts and being admitted to public colleges and universities in California has dwindled since a ballot measure was passed 10 years ago outlawing preferential treatment for minorities in those areas, according to a study released yesterday." The report "comes as the longtime controversy over affirmative action is gaining new attention. Michigan voters last week adopted a constitutional amendment essentially taking the same action as California, and the American Bar Association is facing criticism from some groups for strengthening its diversity requirements for accreditation of law schools." The study "of California's Proposition 209 shows that it has had a major effect, according to Ellis Cose, who wrote the report for the Institute for Justice and Journalism at the University of Southern California's Annenberg School for Communication."

Laws To Make English Official Language Gaining Support. USA Today (11/17, Dorell, 2.27M) reports, "Voters and town boards in several states recently passed laws making English the official language, garnering Hispanic support in one case for what many say was a message to Washington." Arizona voters "last week approved Proposition 103, a constitutional amendment making English the official language of the state. Passing similar laws were the city councils of Taneytown, Md.; Farmers Branch, Texas, and the town board of Pahrump, Nev." While English-only proposals in the U.S. Congress have gone nowhere, the Arizona measure passed by a 3-to-1 ratio, with 48% of Hispanics supporting it, according to an Associated Press exit poll." Jose Esparza, vice chairman of the Arizona Latino Republican Association, said "Hispanic support is a sign that 'the majority of Hispanics believe that the key to success in America is to learn the language of the land, learn English.'"

Black Entrepreneurs Face Unique Challenges In Emerging Industries. The Washington Post (11/17) reports on the challenges faced by black entrepreneurs in the DC area, focusing on Enlightened Inc, a technology consulting firm. The Post reports, "Sitting around a conference table, eight employees of Enlightened Inc., a technology consulting firm, were struggling to polish a proposal that could well determine the firm's future. It was not going well. … Chief executive Antwanye Ford was rubbing his forehead in frustration. … Enlightened's bid for a multimillion-dollar contract to update the computer system used by the District's probation and parole officers was simply not good enough, he told his staff. The proposal needed more graphics, more punch. As Ford saw it, this bid was his fledgling black firm's ticket to a new competitive league. … Suddenly, Ford's cellphone was vibrating. He excused himself and headed into his private office. It was Larry Daniels, one of the District's chief accountants who oversees city spending. Daniels had received complaints about Enlightened's work on another project, a $400,000 contract to do inventory of D.C. property: police cars, fire trucks, public school furniture. … It was too much. Frustrated and embarrassed, Ford heaved his bottle of water across the room. 'You only get one opportunity, maybe two at the most, to prove yourself,' he later fumed to a visitor. 'As a minority, you have to work extra hard. . . . We're constantly being watched and judged.'" The Post adds, "As the day wore on, Ford felt that what he had spent years seeking -- acceptance, respect, an unchallenged level of achievement -- had been put at risk. In danger of losing one contract and not winning another he coveted, Ford wondered: Would his aspirations for Enlightened ever be realized? Would he feel this extra pull to prove himself if he were not black? … Ford's anxiety about image is common among black businessmen who are barreling into territory where relatively few of them have established ownership: information technology, construction, real estate, financial management. Many bring with them advanced degrees, years of corporate experience, and cultural and emotional complexities that can both enrich and burden their lives as business owners. Many struggle with whether they must sacrifice their identity to be successful. In Ford's case, that means questioning whether Enlightened should even promote that it is black-owned."

Conservatives Criticize State Marriage Amendments. In a New York Times op-ed (11/17), David B. Rivkin Jr. and Lee A. Casey, lawyers who served in the Justice Department under Presidents Ronald Reagan and George H. W. Bush, say, "Conservatives have consoled themselves since Election Day with the knowledge that many 'conservative' social issues did well — including (and especially) the eight state 'marriage amendments' on the ballot — even if the Republican candidates faltered." These "marriage measures, of which only Arizona's was defeated, generally prevent recognition of gay marriages by defining marriage as a 'union between a man and a woman' in the state constitutions. More than half of the states now have such constitutional provisions (some of which would also forbid same-sex civil unions), and conservatives need to reconsider whether that's really what we want. There are, in fact, some very good reasons conservatives should oppose this approach." At "least since independence, the question of who may marry and under what conditions has been the province of the state legislatures. And it should have remained that way." Errant "or aggressive judges can be corrected by amendments that simply deny the state courts authority over this issue, reserving the definition and regulation of marriage to the legislatures alone."

Pentagon Reclassifies Homosexuality. The AP (11/16, Baldor) reports, "Pentagon guidelines that classified homosexuality as a mental disorder now put it among a list of conditions or 'circumstances' that range from bed-wetting to fear of flying." The new rules "are related to the military's retirement practices. The change does not affect the 'don't ask, don't tell' policy." The revision "came in response to criticism this year when it was discovered that the guidelines listed homosexuality alongside mental retardation and personality disorders."

Breast-Feeding Mother Files Complaint Against Airlines. USA Today (11/17, Bazar, Hemingway) reports, "A clash between a nursing mother and a flight attendant has sparked a discrimination complaint, an airline investigation and a grass-roots protest." USA continues, "Emily Gillette, her husband, Brad; and their then 22-month-old daughter, River, were removed from an Oct. 13 flight from Burlington, Vt., to New York after a flight attendant asked Gillette to cover up while she was breast-feeding the girl. … Freedom Airlines operated the Delta Airlines flight." USA adds, "Gillette, 27, filed a complaint against both airlines last week with the Vermont Human Rights Commission alleging that the airlines violated a state law that allows women to breast-feed 'in any place of public accommodation.' The airlines have until Nov. 27 to respond, Gillette's attorney, Elizabeth Boepple, says."

ANTITRUST:

Barnett Defends DOJ Approval Of AT&T-BellSouth Deal. The AP (11/17, Apuzzo) reports, "The Justice Department's top antitrust official on Thursday defended the agency's unconditional approval of AT&T's $82 billion buyout of BellSouth Corp. as 'pretty straightforward' despite criticism from Democratic regulators and lawmakers." The AP continues, "The buyout would further reunite parts of the old Ma Bell phone monopoly, broken up by the government in 1984, and create the largest U.S. provider of telephone, wireless and broadband Internet services. … 'We're living a very different world than we were in the 1980s,' Assistant Attorney General Thomas O. Barnett said in an interview during an antitrust conference. 'The mere size of a company in general doesn't tell you whether a merger is going to harm consumer welfare.'" The AP adds, "The Federal Communications Commission, the final regulatory hurdle for the deal to be approved, has delayed a final vote three times. Two Democrats on the FCC, Michael Copps and Jonathan Adelstein, have accused the Justice Department of falling down on the job. .. .Barnett said the agency spent months reviewing documents and interviewing customers and competitors before concluding that the deal probably would save customers money. … Once that conclusion was reached, 'it's a pretty straightforward deal for us,' he said." The AP notes, "If the deal wins final government approval, the merger would give San Antonio-based AT&T Inc. total control over the nation's largest cellular provider, Cingular Wireless, a joint venture of the two phone companies that serves 57.3 million customers. … Consumer rights groups have criticized the deal as putting too much of the telecommunications infrastructure under the control of one company."

DOJ Seizes Documents In Bank Bid-Rigging Probe. Bloomberg (11/17, News) reports, "Law enforcement agents seized documents from three brokers and subpoenaed companies including at least two insurers and General Electric in a criminal investigation of whether banks and financial firms conspired to rig bids for investment deals with local governments." Bloomberg continues, "The investigation by the Justice Department centers on guaranteed investment contracts, which municipalities buy to hold bond money until funds are needed to pay for projects. … F.B.I. agents searched CDR Financial Products, a financial adviser and broker in Beverly Hills, Calif., on Wednesday, said Laura Eimiller, a spokeswoman for the F.B.I. in Los Angeles, without providing further details." Bloomberg adds, "Financial Security Assurance Holdings, a unit of the Brussels-based financial services company Dexia, said Wednesday that it was subpoenaed by the Justice Department. … The FGIC Corporation, a New York-based bond insurer, also received a Justice Department subpoena, Brian Moore, a company spokesman, said yesterday. Mr. Moore said FGIC, a former unit of General Electric, had exited the guaranteed investment contract business in 2003 when G.E. sold the company. The outstanding contracts remained with G.E. … Federal investigators took documents Wednesday from the Investment Management Advisory Group, a broker of guaranteed investment contracts and municipal derivatives adviser based in Pottstown, Pa., said Gene Grabowski, a spokesman for the company. … Yesterday, a third guaranteed investment contract broker, Sound Capital Management, based in Eden Prairie, Minn., said federal investigators seized documents and served a subpoena for more documents."

The Philadelphia Inquirer (11/17, Fazlollah) reports, "Federal agents have seized records from a Montgomery County (PA) investment broker and a California company in an investigation of whether banks and financial firms conspired to rig bids for investment deals with local governments. … The investigation centers on alleged bid-rigging in guaranteed investment contracts, which cities buy to hold bond money until funds are needed to pay for projects." The Inquirer continues, "Federal agents took documents from Investment Management Advisory Group Inc., a Pottstown broker of guaranteed investment contracts, firm spokesman Gene Grabowski said. Besides seizing boxes of documents, FBI agents copied the hard drives of computers at the firm. … FBI spokeswoman Jerri Williams said agents from New York were assisted by the bureau's Philadelphia office. … 'IMAGE received a subpoena from the Antitrust Division of the U.S. Department of Justice, and the company is cooperating fully with the authorities,' the company said in a statement. 'It is our understanding that subpoenas have been issued to numerous other firms and that the investigation is industry-wide. We are confident that our business practices and employees will be fully vindicated as this investigation continues.' … The actions by the Justice Department show that an investigation into how banks compete for the right to reinvest money raised in the $2 trillion market for tax-exempt bonds has expanded beyond the U.S. Internal Revenue Service. The IRS has been looking into whether brokers awarded the work to favored banks, potentially boosting the cost of the investment agreements and depriving the federal government of tax revenue. … Justice Department spokeswoman Kathleen Blomquist said the agency was conducting an 'investigation of anticompetitive practices in the municipal-bond industry.'"

The Los Angeles Times (11/17, Reckard) reports, "The FBI raided financial firms on both coasts, including Beverly Hills-based CDR Financial Products, as part of an investigation into possible bid rigging on investments sold to public agencies, federal authorities and the firms said Thursday." The Times continues, "Federal authorities also seized information from at least one municipal bond insurer in connection with the probe. Another of the companies raided, Investment Management Advisory Group of Pottstown, Pa., said the investigation was industrywide and had resulted in subpoenas to a number of other firms." The Times adds, "CDR Financial and the other companies help cities, counties and public agencies invest money generated by bond sales in guaranteed investment contracts. Such contracts are used to allow the proceeds of bond issues to earn interest until they are spent on public projects. … CDR said it was cooperating with the investigation and remained open for business. … 'The firm believes it has acted appropriately in all of the financings under review,' CDR said in a statement." The Times notes, "FBI agents and criminal investigators from the Internal Revenue Service served a search warrant on CDR about 6 a.m. on Wednesday and remained there all day, said Laura Eimiller, an FBI spokeswoman in Los Angeles. … She said details weren't available because a judge had sealed the search documents. … A U.S. Justice Department spokeswoman in Washington, Cynthia Magnuson, said the agency's antitrust department was investigating the possibility of anti-competitive practices in the municipal bond industry. She wouldn't elaborate."

Two Convicted In Indianapolis Concrete Price-Fixing Case. The Indianapolis (IN) Star (11/17, Corcoran) reports, "A two-year criminal investigation into price-fixing by ready-mix concrete companies in the Indianapolis area ended Thursday when a federal jury convicted two Noblesville men and their company of participating in the scheme." The Star continues, "After hearing 21/2 days of evidence in U.S. District Court, a jury of eight women and four men found cousins Chris A. Beaver, 42, and Ricky J. Beaver, 43, conspired with other ready-mix concrete companies to set prices from July 2000 through May 2004." The Star adds, "Frank J. Vondrak of the U.S. Department of Justice's Antitrust Division would not rule out further charges involving officials of companies serving Marion, Muncie and Bloomington, where trial testimony indicated price-fixing also took place." The Star notes, "Vondrak led a team of lawyers, including Jonathan A. Epstein and Eric L. Schleef, that won Thursday's guilty verdicts after a series of pleas by other participants. Most executives cooperated with the FBI and Justice Department in exchange for lighter sentences or immunity from prosecution. … During the trial, prosecutors repeatedly reminded jurors of guilty pleas made by concrete executives, including four officials of Greenfield-based Irving Materials Inc. That company agreed last year to pay a $29.2 million fine, the largest financial penalty ever in a domestic antitrust case. … 'We are pleased that the jury decided to hold accountable these participants in a price-fixing scheme that deprived consumers in Indianapolis of the benefit of a competitive marketplace,' Antitrust Division leader Thomas O. Barnett said in a statement. … As a result of the trial, the Beavers face maximum prison terms four times longer than those recommended for the ringleaders. The men face fines of up to $600,000 each. No sentencing date has been set."

The AP (11/17) reports, "Two other companies have been fined more than $30 million and several company executives have been sentenced to prison for their role in what prosecutors said was a scheme that lasted from January 2000 to May 2004 and resulted in millions of dollars in illegal profits. … Officials from the other companies testified during this week's trial that Chris Beaver, the operations manager for Beaver Materials, and Ricky Beaver, the commercial sales manager, attended meetings during which the firms agreed on prices and discounts and the timing of price increases." The AP adds, "The Beavers and the family owned company were the only ones whom prosecutors tied to the conspiracy that did not admit to their involvement. … Beaver Materials faces a potential fine of $10 million as a result of the verdict, but defense attorney Jeff Lockwood said he did not believe his clients regretted their decision to fight the allegations. … The scheme came to light last year when Irving Materials Inc. of Greenfield agreed to pay $29.2 million in fines, which prosecutors said was the largest ever assessed in a domestic antitrust investigation."

Former Elpida Memory Official To Plead Guilty In Chip Price-Fixing Probe. The AP (11/17) reports, "A former executive at a computer chip maker is the latest person to agree to plead guilty in a global U.S. Justice Department price-fixing probe, the government said Thursday." The AP continues, "D. James Sogas of Burlingame (CA), ex-vice president of sales for Elpida Memory, agreed to plead guilty to violating the Sherman Act. He agreed to serve a seven-month prison term and pay a $250,000 fine if the plea deal is approved by a federal judge."

AFP (11/17) reports, "Including Sogas, US prosecutors have charged four companies and 17 individuals, and have levied fines totaling more that 731 million dollars in the probe into price fixing of dynamic random access memory (DRAM), a widely used memory component in electronics. … 'The (Justice Department) antitrust division remains steadfast in its commitment to deter illegal cartel activity and to hold accountable those who participate in price fixing conspiracies,' said assistant attorney general for antitrust, Thomas Barnett." AFP adds, "According to the agency, DRAM is the most commonly used semiconductor memory product and is used in variety of computer, telecommunication, and consumer electronic products. .. .The chips are used in personal computers, mobile phones, digital cameras, video recorders, game consoles and digital music players. There were approximately 25 billion dollars in DRAM sales worldwide in 2005."

Bloomberg (11/17, Gullo) reports, "The plea agreement stems from a four-year federal investigation into price fixing in the chip market that has led to claims against four companies and 16 individuals, and fines of $731 million, the U.S. said. Worldwide DRAM sales were $25 billion in 2005, the Justice Department said. … Sogas has agreed to serve a sentence of seven months in prison and pay a $250,000 fine, prosecutors said. He is also cooperating with the federal investigation. Elpida agreed in January to pay $84 million to settle price-fixing charges. … Sogas is the first Elpida Memory executive to agree to a prison sentence in the DRAM investigation, the Justice Department said."

Private Equity Group Purchases Clear Channel For $18.7 Billion. The Financial Times (11/17, Politi) reports, "Two buy-out groups and five Wall Street banks on Thursday combined to buy Clear Channel Communications for $18.7bn, taking the largest US radio station chain private after a short but dramatic auction." The Times continues, "The deal, led by Bain Capital and Thomas H. Lee Partners, marks the latest and biggest effort by cash-rich private equity firms to refashion chunks of the traditional media industry challenged by the digital age." The Times adds, "The two firms will control a large outdoor advertising business and 1,200 radio stations accumulated in 30 years of deals by members of the Mays family, who founded Clear Channel in 1972 and will continue to run the company under its new owners. … JCDecaux, the French outdoor advertising company, said it was interested in buying Clear Channel Outdoor and the buyers 'are aware of our interest'. Analysts have speculated that any buyer of the radio group would sell the outdoor advertising business to help finance the transaction."

The Wall Street Journal (11/17, B1, Mcbride, Berman) reports, "In an age of intense competition from iPods, satellite radio and other glitzy new media, many investors have given up on the traditional radio industry. With an $18.7 billion buyout of radio giant Clear Channel Communications Inc., a group of private-equity investors is betting that the medium will be able to ride out the current storm much as it weathered past threats from television and other rivals." The Journal continues, "A group led by Thomas H. Lee Partners LP and Bain Capital LLC has agreed to acquire Clear Channel for $37.60 a share, plus the assumption of about $8 billion in debt. Thomas Lee and Bain beat out a second group comprising Providence Equity Partners Inc., Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co. and Blackstone Group, which had bid $36.85 a share. Each firm will have about a one-third equity stake, leaving the remaining third divided among a consortium of banks and the Mays family, who will be eligible for an options pool representing 3% to 5% of the new company. Mark Mays, currently chief executive, and Randall Mays, currently president and chief financial officer, will continue in those roles. Founder Lowry Mays may stay on as chairman emeritus." The Journal adds, "Separately, Clear Channel said it was selling its 42 television stations and 448 of its radio stations in smaller and medium-size markets. That would still leave the company a radio giant, with more than 700 stations around the country. … The deal is the latest in a string of private-equity transactions in the industry, underscoring the growing attraction of radio to private equity despite stagnant advertising revenue and other problems. The business's steady cash flow and what some see as an opportunity to increase revenue using new technologies such as digital radio have some investors saying the business has been undervalued by Wall Street."

The Washington Post (11/17, D01, Ahrens) reports, "Clear Channel Communications Inc. has agreed to sell the company to a consortium of private-equity firms and plans to shear off more than one-third of its 1,150 radio stations, dismantling a giant that dominated the industry and became the bogyman of media consolidation for the past half-decade." The Post continues, "Clear Channel is hard to avoid in Washington. It owns eight local radio stations, including popular rocker DC101, top 40 station Hot 99.5 and sports-talk WTEM-AM. It sells ad space atop hundreds of taxis and on the sides of bus stops and provides traffic updates through its Total Traffic Network unit. … The buyers, led by Bain Capital Partners and Thomas H. Lee Partners, agreed to pay $26.7 billion for the company, which includes the assumption of $8 billion in debt." The Post adds, "In a separate transaction also announced yesterday, Clear Channel said it would seek buyers for all of its television stations and 448 of its smaller radio stations, presumably because the private-equity buyers are not interested in owning television or small-market radio. The stations marked for sale are all outside the nation's top 100 markets, which would exclude Washington, the eighth largest. .. .The sell-off will mark the end of the consolidation era for the radio industry and its largest player, Clear Channel, and an acknowledgment by the company that it no longer is interested in smaller radio markets."

Reader's Digest Association Purchased By Ripplewood Holdings. The Wall Street Journal (11/17, B5, Ellison, Berman) reports, "Private-equity firm Ripplewood Holdings LLC, leading a group that agreed to buy Reader's Digest Association Inc. for $1.6 billion, now faces the tough challenge of turning around the long-declining magazine publisher." The Journal continues, "To help do so, Ripplewood plans to integrate its existing media businesses, which include Time Life Books and the Weekly Reader, with Reader's Digest direct-marketing machine. Aside from the pint-sized magazine, Reader's Digest publishes 26 other titles, including faster-growing names such as Every Day with Rachael Ray and Backyard Living." The Journal adds, "The deal comes as private-equity firms are bidding on a growing number of media properties struggling to cope with shifts in consumer habits brought on by the Internet and other new media. Reader's Digest, well known to many older Americans and people overseas, has been losing circulation for many years. … Four years ago, under pressure from investors unhappy with the company's performance, the founding Wallace family agreed to eliminate a dual-share voting structure that had allowed them to retain control of the company. … But there's been no improvement in the performance of the business, based in a sprawling colonial complex in Pleasantville, N.Y. Revenue has been flat for the past three years. And the company, which has taken write-downs of book-fair business Books Are Fun, has posted operating losses for the past two years."

RTL Considers Bid For ITV Group. The Financial Times (11/17, Edgecliffe-Johnson, Terazono) reports, "RTL, Europe's largest broadcaster, is working with private equity backers on a possible £5bn-plus ($9.4bn) offer for ITV, the UK television company that is waiting for NTL, the US-listed cable company, to formalise the bid approach it made last week." The Times continues, "Its plan envisages private equity groups putting up most of the funds needed to acquire ITV, which has a market capitalisation of £4.5bn and almost £1bn in debt. … The structure would allow RTL to acquire a minority stake without calling on Bertelsmann, the German media group that owns 90 per cent of its shares, to fund the deal." The Times adds, "After Bertelsmann bought out its only outside shareholder in May for €4.5bn ($5.8bn), it said its debt load would preclude any large deals until the end of 2007. … RTL would not comment, but the group is understood to be concerned about overpaying, so a steep rise in ITV's share price could yet derail its plans. One media executive cautioned that the plan had just a 50 per cent chance of succeeding. … A formal offer by NTL for ITV could also deter RTL. The chairmen of ITV and NTL have yet to meet, but NTL has already begun lining up financing for the deal, which would greatly increase its debt load, and has approached Michael Jackson, the former Channel 4 chief executive, to run ITV if its offer succeeds."

Johnson & Johnson To Purchase Conor Medsystems For $1.4 Billion. The AP (11/17) reports, "Johnson & Johnson said late Thursday it will buy cardiac stent maker Conor Medsystems Inc. for $33.50 per share in cash, for a total value of about $1.4 billion. The purchase price represents a 21 percent premium to Conor's Thursday closing stock price." The AP continues, "The company said the deal gives J&J's Cordis unit the controlled drug delivery technology currently used on the CoStar Stent System, a paclitaxel-eluting cobalt chromium stent with a bioabsorbable polymer. … The CoStar Stent is currently sold outside the United States, and enrollment in its U.S. pivotal clinical trial has been completed. The stent is used for the treatment of narrowing of the arteries and the company hopes it will be used as a treatment for heart attacks." The AP adds, "Conor Medsystems' CoStar Stent uses reservoir drug-delivery technology that enables site-specific drug delivery as well as the potential for delivery of multiple drugs that may be useful in the treatment of cardiovascular, peripheral vascular and neurovascular diseases. .. The boards of both J&J and Conor have approved the transaction, which is expected to close in the first quarter of 2007, subject to antitrust clearance, Conor stockholder approval and other customary closing conditions."

Antitrust Officials Wary Of Gas Price-Gouging Law. The AP (11/17, Apuzzo) reports, "The head of the Federal Trade Commission predicted Thursday that Congress would pass a gasoline price-gouging law despite her warnings that the country doesn't need one and it might cause fuel shortages." The AP continues, "FTC Chairwoman Deborah Platt Majoras said she has warned Congress publicly and privately about the dangers of such a law. … 'We looked very carefully but didn't see any new legislation needed to protect consumers,' Majoras said at an antitrust conference Thursday. 'Will new legislation be passed? I think we will see a price-gouging statute pass, perhaps at the end of this (incoming) Congress.'" The AP adds, "With gas prices rising to over $3 per gallon this spring, the House passed a bill permitting large fines and jail time for price gougers. The Senate has not acted on it and Sen. Max Baucus, D-Mont., the incoming Finance Committee chairman, said Thursday, 'There's a lot more that has a higher priority.' … Majoras said she understood the public's frustration and concern but said an upcoming FTC report on the price spikes found that consumer demand was up at the time. … Testifying in May before the Senate Commerce Committee, Majoras said retailers might let the gas run out rather than raise prices and risk facing prosecution. She noted the price spikes after Hurricane Katrina last year resulted in more fuel getting to market. … The Justice Department's top antitrust official, Assistant Attorney General Thomas O. Barnett, attended Thursday's conference and said addressing fuel prices was a tricky issue for his agency. … He said that like all cartels, the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries is bad for consumers. But he said any effort to hold OPEC to U.S. competition laws would have to be balanced with national security and diplomatic interests."

Delta Seeks Creditor Support To Dodge US Airways Takeover Bid. The Wall Street Journal (11/17, Perez, Trottman) reports, "Delta Air Lines began trying to rally support from creditors for its push to fend off an $8.76 billion hostile takeover bid by US Airways, with the Atlanta carrier firmly reiterating its determination to emerge from bankruptcy as a standalone company." The Journal continues, "Delta Chief Executive Gerald Grinstein and other executives at the third-largest U.S. airline by traffic held a series of conference calls yesterday with creditors to sift through terms of US Airways' cash-and-stock offer, pressing creditors to back Delta's restructuring plan. The move could give Delta an early advantage in its fight to remain independent, since US Airways hasn't had any face-to-face meetings with Delta's official creditors committee. … US Airways officials were still trying to arrange a meeting with representatives of Delta's official creditors committee. People familiar with the situation said such a meeting could come as early as next week, with Delta officials expected to attend." The Journal notes, "The Atlanta airline said the executives were reviewing the unsolicited proposal, which seeks to combine US Airways, based in Tempe, Ariz., with its much bigger rival under the Delta name and become the biggest US airline in terms of passenger traffic."

Experts Differ On Merger's Potential Consumer Impact. The Christian Science Monitor (11/17, Marks) reports, "Whenever a big airline deal is proposed, the first question that arises usually is: What will it mean for the flying public? … In the case of US Airways' announcement this week that it hopes to acquire bankrupt Delta Air Lines for $8 billion, the simple answer is: higher prices. … That's because the merger would cut capacity by about 10 percent - in other words, passengers would have 10 percent fewer seats to choose from when they fly, which usually drives up prices. That would be good for the overall industry's bottom line. .. .But the dynamics behind this proposed merger, and the still precarious state of the nation's recovering aviation industry in the post-9/11 world, make the ramifications for the public far less clear. Add to that, it's far from a done deal: It still needs approval from the bankruptcy courts and the Justice Department. As a result, analysts have starkly different assessments of 'just what this will mean.'" The Monitor notes, "One camp thinks it's the best thing to happen to the industry bottom line since jet fuel prices dropped below $70 a barrel. That's because it will cut capacity. … But a different school of thought says that with planes already flying 80-to-90 percent full, overcapacity in the industry is no longer a major issue. After all, the traditional, so-called legacy carriers are making money even with oil at $60 a barrel."

USA Today (11/17, Reed, Hansen) reports, "Travelers in at least two dozen Eastern and Southeastern cities would see their air travel options significantly reduced by a merger between US Airways and Delta Air Lines." USA continues, "According to a USA TODAY analysis of airline data from Back Aviation Solutions, a merged carrier would have 50% or more of the scheduled capacity in 111 markets in the USA. That's up from 55 markets for US Airways and 31 markets for Delta. Both carriers are strong in the East and South, so not surprisingly, many of the communities that would see the biggest loss of choice are there, too." USA adds, "Delta management has been resistant to any takeover bid, and says it prefers to emerge from bankruptcy reorganization next year as an independent carrier. Delta CEO Gerald Grinstein had previously rejected two private approaches from his counterpart at US Airways, Doug Parker. … The proposed deal would require approval from the bankruptcy court, federal antitrust officials and US Airways shareholders."

US Airways' CEO No Stranger To Bold Moves. The AP (11/17, Weber) reports, "When JetBlue announced in April it was launching flights to Charlotte, N.C., a major hub city for US Airways, JetBlue's CEO belittled the service passengers in that city had been getting as 'substandard.' … US Airways' chief executive, Doug Parker, shot back in a letter to his own employees: 'US Airways is going to be here long after JetBlue.'" The AP continues, "Analysts, industry experts and those familiar with Parker's reputation said Thursday the 45-year-old's hostile bid to acquire a bigger rival in Delta Air Lines was not surprising, given bold statements like that one. … 'I think anybody has to be feisty to do what he's doing,' said Boston University School of Management Professor Allen Michel, referring to the unsolicited offer for Delta launched Wednesday by US Airways. The cash and stock bid to buy Delta once it emerges from bankruptcy is currently valued at $8.8 billion." The AP adds, "Parker's also been described as genial and approachable. Observers say those qualities could help him and his Tempe, Ariz.-based airline win over Delta employees. … Parker, who has held management positions at Northwest Airlines and American Airlines, led America West when it bought US Airways last year and adopted the US Airways name. While he's still integrating the two carriers, he says he's ready to tackle an even bigger challenge in acquiring Delta. This time, the company would keep the Delta name, becoming the nation's largest carrier in terms of revenue. … Delta's chief executive, Gerald Grinstein, said in a memo to employees late Wednesday that the Atlanta-based airline is committed to its plan to emerge from bankruptcy as a standalone carrier. … He also said 'the history of mergers in the airline industry is almost always one of failure, with over-promise of synergies and under-delivery of results.' … Parker clearly has a different view, that consolidation is the wave of the future in the airline industry. He also knows that the bankruptcy process gives him an opportunity to pitch an alternative plan to Delta's creditors. Whether his bid for Delta works or not, analysts tend to agree with Parker that major carriers need to combine to reduce capacity in the industry."

NYTimes Warns About "Dampened Competition" If Airline Merger Goes Through. The New York Times (11/17, 1.16M) editorializes, "US Airways' $8 billion offer for Delta Air Lines could kick off a wave of consolidation in the airline industry. The question for regulators is whether the result is a leaner, meaner industry with lower costs or just a case of less competition driving prices higher. Without allowing a free-for-all to break out, there is clearly some room for combining operations in this changing industry." But "the fact that the two airlines offer competing shuttle service between Boston, New York and Washington raises a big concern: that all these savings could come about as a result of dampened competition and thus at the expense of consumers. … Domestic carriers should take care when it comes to raising fares. There are plenty of foreign carriers that would love to gain access to the United States domestic market. If the locals get lazy and expensive, they could compel Congress to open the door to outside competition. It wouldn't be a bad idea to re-examine the idea now, before the merger wave has crested."

Grupo Mexico To Fight Antitrust Ruling Against Railway Merger. The AP (11/17) reports, "Mexican mining and railroad company Grupo Mexico said Thursday it will fight the federal antitrust commission's decision to uphold a previous ruling that blocked the company's plans to merge two railways. … The company 'will take all legal means at its disposal' to fight the ruling, Grupo Mexico said in a filing with the Mexican stock exchange." The AP continues, "In November 2005, Grupo Mexico said it would merge its Ferromex unit with Ferrosur, controlled by multibillionaire Carlos Slim. The antitrust commission rejected the proposed merger in June, and Grupo Mexico appealed. … The commission rejected the appeal on Wednesday, arguing that a merger would have led to excessive concentration in the railroad industry to the detriment of consumers and competitors." The AP adds, 'Grupo Mexico has argued it must expand in order to compete with U.S.-based railroad Kansas City Southern. .. .Kansas City Southern last year gained full control of local railway TFM, which runs through the heart of Mexico's industrial region to the border town of Nuevo Laredo from the Pacific port of Lazaro Cardenas."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Energy Interests Split On Drilling Legislation In Lame Duck Session. The Wall Street Journal (11/17, Harwood, 2.04M) reports in its "Washington Wire" that energy interests are "split on lame-duck drilling legislation. Industry, agriculture and labor groups seek House passage of Senate's offshore drilling bill, which would send measure to Bush's desk. 'We've got a bird in the hand,' says Jack Gerard of American Chemistry Council." Some companies "hold out for more ambitious House bill, which would allow states such as Virginia to opt out of anti-drilling moratoria. Robert Slaughter of National Petrochemical and Refiners Association says 'it will be difficult' to get Democratic majorities to revisit the issue later."

Oil Prices Plunge To Lowest Level In A Year. ABC World News (11/16, story 8, 0:10, Gibson, 8.78M) reported "the price of crude oil fell sharply" yesterday today. It "plunged by $2.50 a barrel, closing at the lowest price in a year." The New York Times (11/17, Mouawad, 1.16M) says "oil traders expressed doubt that OPEC members would carry out on their recent deal to trim production." Crude "for December delivery lost 4.25 percent, or $2.50 a barrel, to settle at $56.26. The drop, the steepest in 15 months, came as oil and natural gas inventories increased as a result of milder weather in the United States and Europe, reducing demand." The Times adds, "The uncertainty surrounding OPEC policies underscores the cartel's difficulties in coping with a slowing market after three years of rising prices and surging demand. Analysts view the group as too divided to be effective: at best, they expect OPEC members to fulfill only half the cuts pledged in Qatar."

WSJournal Urges House To Pass Senate Offshore Drilling Bill. In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (11/17, A20, 2.04M) writes that if the lame-duck Congress "wants an easy victory for the U.S. economy it'll whip through the offshore drilling bill that has passed the Senate and awaits action in conference." The legislation "doesn't go nearly as far as we or many in the House would like, but it's the best opportunity for new U.S. energy exploration in years." Short supplies and high prices for natural gas "are punishing American industry, causing plant closures and job flight overseas. It is one of the larger economic messes in recent history, yet the political class barely mentions it -- perhaps because the politicians have done more than anyone to cause it." The Journal writes, "[W]ith coastal, anti-drilling Democrats set to run Congress next year, now is the time for the House to swallow its pride, pass the Senate version without amendment to avoid a conference, and send it to President Bush."

FTC Head Predicts Congress Will Pass Gasoline Price Gouging Bill. The AP (11/16, Apuzzo) reports, "The head of the Federal Trade Commission predicted Thursday that Congress would pass a gasoline price-gouging law despite her warnings that the country doesn't need one and it might cause fuel shortages. FTC Chairwoman Deborah Platt Majoras said she has warned Congress publicly and privately about the dangers of such a law." In the spring, "the House passed a bill permitting large fines and jail time for price gougers. The Senate has not acted on it and Sen. Max Baucus, D-Mont., the incoming Finance Committee chairman, said Thursday, 'There's a lot more that has a higher priority.'" In testimony before a Senate committee in May, "Majoras said retailers might let the gas run out rather than raise prices and risk facing prosecution."

California Board Prepares Effort To Combat Global Warming. The Wall Street Journal (11/17, Fialka, 2.04M) reports California's Air Resources Board is "a semi-independent agency that has been given the job of drawing up the nation's first regulatory program intended to reduce greenhouse-gas emissions by all sectors of the economy." To accomplish this, Dr. Robert Sawyer, the chairman, "and his agency, which is known outside California as CARB, will likely face fierce lobbying by industries and consumer groups, and difficult political questions that haven't yet been answered in the U.S." But California regulations "have shaped national legislation in the past, and CARB's efforts will be closely watched by other states and by the new Democratic Congress in Washington, where emissions reduction is likely to get increased traction." The change "will be most dramatic in the Senate, where Barbara Boxer, a California Democrat, will succeed James Inhofe, an Oklahoma Republican, as chairman of the Committee on Environment and Public Works." Boxer, "who believes 'global warming could reshape the world as we know it,' says she will introduce federal legislation that is similar to California's."

years, LeRoy 'Frenchy' Authier's family has ranched and farmed along the banks of a slender stream known as Medicine Creek. … They grew wheat and raised cattle. But farms got bigger and prices got lower and after a while, the money didn't add up the way it used to. So nine years ago Mr. Authier's 46-year-old son, Mike, and his wife, Katherine, sold off the last of the cattle and turned to a new crop: pheasants." The Journal continues, "Today, they have four separate lodges on their land, including a converted barn and granary, that can accommodate up to 35 guests a day. Called the Medicine Creek Pheasant Ranch, about 30 miles south of the state capital of Pierre, it draws hunters from across the country. … Thanks to a federal program that pays farmers to idle millions of acres, the once-decimated pheasant is making a comeback. Many states in the nation's midsection are reporting their biggest populations of the game bird in nearly a half century. Hunters are also turning out in force, willing to pay people like the Authiers thousands of dollars a week to shoot the birds. … One result is an unexpected boom that is raising land values, propping up farms and generating new businesses in many parts of the Great Plains. In a good year the Authiers' pheasant operation will gross six times what the farm did, allowing them to raise their children in the house where Frenchy was born." The Journal notes, "The pheasant phenomenon has created an unusual alliance of farmers, hunters and environmentalists bent on preserving the program that pays farmers to leave some lands idle. For them, the biggest threat to the bird's well-being today isn't coyotes. It's corn, which is used to make ethanol -- the other big growth industry on the Plains. High oil prices have created intense interest in ethanol, an alternative fuel usually mixed with gasoline. As Congress prepares to write next year's farm bill, some want to see a portion of idled cropland planted with corn for ethanol production."

Michigan Land To Be Taken Into Tribal Trust. Indian Country Today (11/13, Toensing) reports from Bradley, MI, "The Match-E-Be-Nash-She-Wish Band of Pottawatomi's planned casino and entertainment center took a great leap forward recently when the federal government announced it would take land into trust for the project early next year." ICT continues, "The Interior Department will take 146 acres in Allegan County into trust for the tribe, which is known as the Gun Lake Tribe, on Jan. 5, 2007, according to an Oct. 27 Justice Department filing in the U.S. District Court in Washington, D.C., and with Michigan Gambling Opposition (MichGO), an anti-Indian casino group. … 'This is another very significant step forward for our tribe. We applaud the actions of the federal government in their efforts to provide relief to the tribe and the local communities that are eager for the thousands of jobs and economic growth the casino will provide,' Chairman D.K. Sprague said. … The tribe expects to begin construction next spring, Sprague said." ICT adds, "MichGO has until Jan. 5 to file an injunction against Interior, a legal step the group will take, spokesman John Helmholdt said. … 'MichGO will be filing the preliminary motion for injunction and we're going to continue to cooperate and work with the court in a timely manner and leave it up to the court to decide,' Helmholdt said. … The 300-member Gun Lake Tribe was federally acknowledged in 1999, but its effort to take land into trust have been snarled in court and at Interior since then. … Interior granted final approval to the tribe's land into trust application in May 2005. MichGO immediately challenged Interior in a lawsuit that is pending in the Washington federal court." ICT notes, "Last January, the tribe and the Justice Department filed for a summary judgment of MichGO's lawsuit, but the court has not acted since then. Around the same time, a federal appeals court dismissed an identical lawsuit that sought to delay the Pokagon Band of Potawatomi from developing Four Winds Casino Resort in southwestern Michigan. The dismissal set a precedent for MichGo's action against Gun Lake."

Track Coach Pleads Not Guilty In BALCO Probe. The AP (11/17, Kravets) reports, "Elite track coach Trevor Graham pleaded not guilty Thursday to accusations he hindered a continuing government steroids probe targeting high-profile athletes." The AP continues, "Graham, who has trained Justin Gatlin, Marion Jones and Tim Montgomery, is charged with three counts of making false statements to federal agents in an indictment issued Nov. 1 by the grand jury investigating performance-enhancing drugs in professional sports. … Graham was freed on US$25,000 bond after appearing before U.S. Magistrate Edwin Chen." The AP adds, "Graham operates Raleigh, North Carolina-based Sprint Capitol USA, a team of about 10 athletes that includes Gatlin, the 100-meter co-world record holder who tested positive for testosterone and other steroids in April."

The Washington Post (11/17) reports, "Graham, who faces three counts of making false statements about his relationship with an admitted steroid dealer, appeared in front of U.S. Magistrate Edwin Chen in San Francisco. … He began the massive steroids probe now known as BALCO (Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative), which has resulted in four criminal convictions but combined sentences of less than a year in prison."

Bloomberg (11/16) reports Graham "obtained illegal performance-enhancing drugs from an unidentified source and lied about it to U.S. Internal Revenue Service agents who interviewed him in June 2004, according to the U.S. Attorney's office in San Francisco. Graham also lied about his contacts with the supplier, the statement said. … Graham, who is based in North Carolina, wasn't charged with distributing steroids."

Cable TV Coverage. ESPN (11/16, 7:00 p.m.) aired, "Track coach Trevor Graham pleaded not guilty today to accusations he hindered a probe targeting slugger Barry Bonds and other high-profile athletes. Graham…is charged with making false statements to federal agents. Those charges came in an indictment issued by a grand jury investigating performance-enhancing drugs in professional sports."

CNN (11/16, 4:00 p.m.) aired, "Track coach Trevor Graham has pleaded not guilty to accusations that he hindered a government probe into steroids. Graham is out on bond on three counts of making false statements to federal agents."

Local TV Coverage. KNTV-TV, San Francisco-Oakland-San Jose (11/16, 6:00 p.m.) aired, "The man who sparked the BALCO story and investigation pleaded not guilty to lying about his role. A grand jury indicted Trevor Graham…on three charges of making false statements. They interviewed him in 2000 under immunity agreements but it did not cover lying."

KTVU-TV, San Francisco-Oakland-San Jose (11/16, 6:00 p.m.) aired, "Track coach Trevor Graham pleaded not guilty this morning in connection with the BALCO steroids scandal. Graham is charged with three counts of making false statements to federal agents. A federal grand jury indicted Graham two weeks ago."

Anderson Sent To Prison A Third Time. There are more than 300 media references to trainer Greg Anderson being ordered to return to prison for refusing to testify about alleged steroid use by Barry Bonds. Many media outlets combined their stories about Anderson's and Graham's court appearances. The Washington Post (11/17) reports a federal appeals court in San Francisco "ruled yesterday that Barry Bonds's personal trainer must return to prison for refusing to testify before a grand jury investigating performance-enhancing drugs in professional sports. Greg Anderson, 40, already has served two other brief prison stints for refusing to testify whether his boyhood friend lied when he said he never knowingly used steroids. Both times, Anderson, held in contempt of court, was released on procedural grounds. Anderson could serve more than a year behind bars unless he agrees to tell the grand jury what he knows about Bonds's alleged steroids use."

The Los Angeles Times (11/17) reports Anderson's attorney "argued that Anderson shouldn't testify because prosecutors are relying on information that they gained in an illegally obtained recording of Anderson discussing steroids in 2004. Prosecutors counter that their questions to Anderson are based on a search they conducted of Anderson's home, along with other athletes' secret testimony."

The AP (11/17) reports Anderson "has already been behind bars twice after being held in contempt of court for his refusal to testify to a grand jury investigating Bonds on allegations of perjury and tax evasion. Both times, the prison stints were cut short because of legal technicalities."

Cable TV Coverage. ESPN (11/16, 5:00 p.m.) aired, "Greg Anderson must report to the federal correctional institution in Dublin, California, in two days, and he could serve more than a year behind bars unless he agrees to testify against the Giants slugger. The grand jury is investigating whether Bonds lied when he said he never knowingly used steroids."

Local TV Coverage. KABC-TV, Los Angeles (11/16, 6:00 p.m.) aired, "Barry Bonds's trainer Greg Anderson was released from prison a month ago and within two weeks refused to testify against his friend before a grand jury for a third time, so for the third time Anderson has been ordered back to jail for contempt. This time he could sit in jail for a year, unless he talks."

KNSD-TV, San Diego (11/16, 4:00 p.m.) aired, "Baseball's Barry Bonds's trainer is heading back to prison for refusing to testify before a grand jury. An appeals court in San Francisco today ruled Greg Anderson [report to] a federal facility within two days. He could serve more than a year behind bars unless he agrees to tell the grand jury what he knows about Bonds's alleged steroid use."

KNBC-TV, Los Angeles (11/16, 5:00 p.m.) aired, "An appeals court in San Francisco ruled today that Greg Anderson must report to a federal facility within than two days. He could serve more than a year behind bars unless he agrees to tell the grand jury about what he knows about Bonds's alleged steroid use."

KPIX-TV, San Francisco-Oakland-San Jose (11/16, 6:00 p.m.) aired, "A federal appeals court ruled today that Barry Bonds's personal trainer Greg Anderson must go back to prison for refusing to testify before a grand jury investigating performance-enhancing drugs in professional sports. The friend of Bonds has been to prison twice this year and is ordered to return by November 20. This time, he could serve as much as a year."

Man Admits Selling Fentanyl-Laced Heroin Linked To 2 Deaths In Detroit. The Detroit News (11/16) reports a Detroit man "faces more than 24 years in prison after he admitted…to distributing heroin laced with the painkiller fentanyl that killed two people. U.S. District Judge Lawrence P. Zatkoff will sentence James Edgar Coleman, 36, on Feb. 6 on two counts of distributing a controlled substance causing death." Coleman "said he did not know the heroin contained fentanyl."

The Detroit Free Press (11/16, Schaefer) reports, "As part of a plea deal, Coleman would be sentenced to 24 1/3 years to nearly 30 ½ years. Coleman's lawyer, Warren Harris, said his client was sorry and took the deal because he could have gotten life in prison on other charges the government issued."

The AP (11/16) reports Coleman "entered the plea to two counts of delivery of a controlled substance resulting in death."

Judge In California Tentatively Rejects Medical Marijuana Challenge. The San Diego Union-Tribune (11/16, Mcdonald) reports a Superior Court judge "rejected an argument Thursday from San Diego County that the state medical marijuana laws are illegal because they conflict with federal drug prohibitions. In a tentative ruling, Judge William R. Nevitt Jr., said California laws permitting chronically ill patients to grow and smoke marijuana are voluntary, and as such do not automatically conflict with federals laws banning pot. … It is unclear whether Nevitt will issue a formal ruling from the bench or take the case under submission."

The North County Times (11/16) reports the county "argued that the California law should be 'pre-empted' by federal law, which says all marijuana use is illegal, under the U.S. Constitution's 'Supremacy Clause,' which says federal laws should be 'supreme' over state laws. Nevitt, however, said in his tentative ruling that the county's argument ignored the corollary to the Supremacy Clause that held in matters where states traditionally legislate, state law is considered pre-eminent."

The AP (11/16) reports San Diego County "sued the state of California in February after the Board of Supervisors refused to follow state rules requiring them to issue identification cards to medical marijuana users."

In a separate story, the AP reports, (11/17) attorneys for San Diego County "argued Thursday before a state court judge that the federal ban on marijuana use precludes states from exempting people who use the drug for medical purposes. … Nevitt did not indicate when a final ruling would be issued but set a Dec. 1 deadline for additional briefs on issues related to the case. In his tentative ruling, Nevitt agreed with attorneys for the state, who argued that California is entitled to pass its own drug laws and legislate programs that allow marijuana use for medical purposes."

On its Web site, KGTV-TV, San Diego (11/17) reports after hearing oral arguments…Nevitt declined to issue a final decision in the lawsuit brought by San Diego, San Bernardino and Merced counties. … The suit was filed against the local chapter of the National Organization for the Reform of Marijuana Laws, or NORML, after the San Diego County Board of Supervisors refused to implement part of the state law requiring officials to issue identification cards to medical marijuana users to protect them from prosecution. The American Civil Liberties Union, Americans for Safe Access and Drug Policy Alliance joined San Diego NORML in fighting the suit."

In Tennessee, Man Pleads Guilty In Marijuana, Money Laundering Conspiracy. The Knoxville (TN) News Sentinel (11/17, Satterfield) reports, Assistant U.S. Attorney Hugh Ward on Thursday "laid bare in U.S. District Court the details of Arizona drug supplier Phillip Arthur Apodaca's role in the marijuana-peddling conspiracy case involving Market Square businessman Scott West and his brother." Apodaca "pleaded guilty to charges of conspiring to push more than a ton of marijuana and plotting to launder at least $2.5 million in drug money. … Apodaca already faces a boost in his basic penalty range because the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, which toppled the West conspiracy, found guns in the supplier's possession when he was nabbed, Ward said."

ATF Joins Search For Suspects In Detroit Shootings. The AP (11/17, Vample) reports, "Police arrested a man suspected in a series of shootings Thursday that left two people dead and three others wounded within a span of 10 minutes." The AP continues, "The shootings took place shortly after 6 a.m. in a three- to four-block area on the city's west side, Detroit police spokesman James Tate said. … Killed were Arthur James Smith, 49, and Othelia Fry, 58, both of Detroit, said Yvette Walker, a Detroit police spokeswoman. The wounded men - Elton Ash, 51, Dennis Anderson, 49, and James L. Brown, 50 - were treated at Henry Ford Hospital and released, hospital spokeswoman Synthia Bryant said." The AP adds, "Police arrested the suspect Thursday afternoon at a house about a half-mile from where the shootings occurred, The Detroit News reported on its Web site. … Investigators received a tip from a woman who told them the suspect told her he had shot five people in the morning. The woman led police to the man, the newspaper said. … The U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives was offering a $10,000 reward for information leading to the arrest and conviction of those responsible for the shootings. … 'The magnitude of the violence, coupled with a gunman - or gunmen - at large precipitated our offer of assistance to the Detroit Police Department and our involvement in the manhunt,' said Valerie J. Goddard, the agent in charge of the ATF's Detroit office."

DHS IG Warns House Panel Of Risks In Virtual Border Fence Contract. In an article appearing on more than 50 news websites, the AP (11/16) reported an audit from DHS IG Richard L. Skinner says the department's plans for a "virtual fence" along the Southwestern border "could cost 15 times the initial $2 billion estimate," with early estimates ranging "from $8 billion to $30 billion." DHS spokesman Russ Knocke said he was not sure where Skinner's "numbers are coming from." He added that "the agency was open to listening to Skinner's ideas on how to strengthen oversight of the program." Skinner told the House Homeland Security Committee's management subcommittee Wednesday "that the type of contract awarded to Boeing for the border program creates additional risks that, 'unless properly managed, threaten achievement of cost, schedule, performance, and, ultimately, mission objectives.'"

IRS Filing Shows Minutemen Outspent Donations. The Washington Times (11/17, Seper, 88K) reports the Minuteman Civil Defense Corps, "under fire for a lack of financial accountability, spent nearly $450,000 last year for volunteers to patrol the U.S.-Mexico border -- about $31,000 more than it collected in donations and registration fees -- according to a report released yesterday." The organization's "first Internal Revenue Service Form 990 filing as a 501(c)4 tax-exempt charitable trust showed nearly $285,000 in MCDC contributions, or roughly 63 percent, were used to pay for program management and operating expenses, such as travel expenditures, salaries, educational materials and office expenses. Another $145,000, about 32 percent, went for MCDC's fundraising programs." The reports says "about $20,000, or 5 percent, was spent on field supplies, meals, fuel and background checks for the claimed 8,500 Minuteman volunteers, who last year staffed observation posts at selected points along the Mexican border from California to Texas in April and October." While the IRS papers "document MCDC collections and expenditures through Dec. 31, a reported donation total of $418,493 is significantly less than the $1.6 million MCDC President Chris Simcox told The Washington Times in July that the group had collected in donations since its April 2005 creation. That figure was said to include $1 million in direct MCDC contributions and $600,000 toward the construction of a $55 million border fence."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush's Agenda Said To Contradict Calls For Bipartisanship. McClatchy (11/17, Thomma) reports, "President Bush made nice with the Democrats for the television cameras after they won control of Congress, complete with pictures filled with handshakes, smiles and vows of working together. He even tossed Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld over the side, making many people think that maybe he was going to move more toward the center and reach out for bipartisan openings." However, "the agenda he's sent to Congress since then is full of Republican proposals that have no chance of winning bipartisan approval, enrage Democrats, rally his conservative base and appear to be intended to paint Democrats as obstructionist." Bush "has resubmitted several judicial nominations that had been blocked even before last week's elections. He's asked again that the Senate confirm John Bolton as ambassador to the United Nations. And he's urged approval of warrantless eavesdropping on suspected terrorists without any accommodation to Democrats' demands that a court sign off on the spying." These proposals "could be simply his opening bid in what would be a tough round of negotiations with the Democrats. Or they could be a political gambit designed to frame the Democrats early on as obstructionists while rallying a conservative base dispirited by last week's election losses. Either way, they contradict the initial post-election image that indicated that Bush was ready to reach out to Democrats."

Keroack Appointment "Latest Provocative Personnel Move" By Bush. The Washington Post (11/17, Lee, 690K) reports, "The Bush administration has appointed a new chief of family-planning programs at the Department of Health and Human Services who worked at a Christian pregnancy-counseling organization that regards the distribution of contraceptives as 'demeaning to women.'" Eric Keroack is "medical director for A Woman's Concern, a nonprofit group based in Dorchester, Mass." He "will become deputy assistant secretary for population affairs in the next two weeks, department spokeswoman Christina Pearson said yesterday." Keroack "will advise Secretary Mike Leavitt on matters such as reproductive health and adolescent pregnancy. He will oversee $283 million in annual family-planning grants that, according to HHS, are 'designed to provide access to contraceptive supplies and information to all who want and need them with priority given to low-income persons.'" The appointment "does not require Senate confirmation." It "was the latest provocative personnel move by the White House since Democrats won control of Congress in this month's midterm elections." The Los Angeles Times (11/17, 850K) runs the WPost story in this morning's edition.

NYTimes, WPost Chide Bush Over Judicial Nominations. In an editorial titled "Still Waiting For Bipartisanship," the New York Times (11/17, 1.16M) writes, "The voters sent a clear message last week that they do not want the far right of the Republican Party calling the shots in Washington. But President Bush has ignored the message, resubmitting a group of archconservative, underqualified judicial nominees that Senate Democrats have already said are unacceptable. With the Democrats about to take control of the Senate, it is highly unlikely that these men will be confirmed. But the renominations suggest that when it comes to filling judgeships, Mr. Bush is still not looking for either excellence or common ground. … Beyond their ideology, these nominees embody values that the American people rejected in the midterm elections."

The Washington Post (11/17, 690K) editorializes, "Given his pledges of bipartisanship…Bush's decision to resubmit a crop of his most controversial judicial nominations strikes a discordant note. … The real test of Mr. Bush's commitment to a more bipartisan approach to nominations will come in January, when he confronts the new Congress and its Democratic-led Senate Judiciary Committee. At that point, he should decline to renominate four of the current group of nominees. Democrats have valid objections on the merits to William J. Haynes II, William G. Myers III, Terrence W. Boyle Jr. and Michael B. Wallace -- all nominees to federal appeals courts." Peter D. Keisler, "Bush's highly qualified nominee to the US Court of Appeals for the DC Circuit…certainly warrants confirmation. Yet like a string of qualified nominees to the same court before him, he is caught up in a dispute over how many seats the court should have."

Some Think Rove's Days Are Numbered In Weeks, Not Months. The White House Bulletin / US News (11/16) reported, "The rumors that chief White House political architect Karl Rove will leave sometime next year are being bolstered with new insider reports that his partisan style is a hurdle to President Bush's new push for bipartisanship. 'Karl represents the old style and he's got to go if the Democrats are going to believe Bush's talk of getting along,' said a key Bush advisor. Other elements are also at play: The election of Sen. Trent Lott to the number two GOP leadership position in the Senate is also a threat to the White House and Rove, who worked against him when he battled to save his majority leader's job after his insensitive remarks about Sen. Strom Thurmond. And insiders report that Bush counsel Harriet Miers isn't a fan, believing that Rove didn't do enough to help her failed Supreme Court nomination among conservatives. In fact, one top West Wing advisor said that the unexpected ouster of Rove aide Susan Ralston over ethics questions was orchestrated by Miers as a signal to Rove to leave. The advisor said that Rove is aware of the situation and that a departure might come in 'weeks, not months.' A Rove ally, however, noted that he has a record of out-witting his critics."

Democratic Congress Expected To Approve Minimum Wage Increase. The CBS Evening News (11/16, story 4, 2:35, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "With the Democrats in charge of the new Congress, Senator Edward Kennedy will chair the committee that deals with the Federal minimum wage. It's now $5.15 an hour, and Kennedy said again today that raising it is at the top of his agenda." CBS (Bowers) added, "Illinois is one of 23 states with a higher minimum wage than the $5.15 level set by the Federal Government nearly a decade ago. This month, voters in six more states overwhelmingly approved getting a raise to minimum wage workers and adding a cost of living adjustment. It's an issue that's gaining traction with Americans. Incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi promises to make it a priority, putting pressure on President Bush to go along." Rose Elsenbrey, Economic Policy Institute: "I think that we will see a minimum wage increase within the next six or eight months."

The AP (11/17, Freking) reports President Bush "signaled readiness last week to consider some Democratic priorities such as a minimum-wage increase, overhauling immigration policy and finding compromise on renewing the No Child Left Behind education law."

Kennedy Aims To Extend Universal Coverage To Children. The Washington Times (11/17, Fagan, 88K) reports, "The soon-to-be chairman of the Senate health panel said yesterday his ultimate goal is to have the government provide health care coverage for all Americans." Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D) "said he knows it will take awhile to gain support for the idea, so he will focus in the meantime on extending coverage to different groups, starting with covering more children under the existing Children's Health Insurance Program (CHIP) -- something he thinks there is 'a lot of sentiment for.'" But Kennedy, "who yesterday laid out his agenda for the Health Education Labor and Workforce Committee, said universal health care is the goal."

Bush Administration Said To Be Redefining "Hunger." ABC World News (11/16, story 6, 2:35, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "In Washington, it's hard to believe. But the government has eliminated hunger. How did they do it? In a key government report, the word hunger is no longer being used to describe people without enough food. 35 million Americans fit into that category last year. The government called them hungry then. But no more." ABC (Stark) added, "Only in Washington could there be a debate about the meaning of the word hunger." Those who lack food now "have 'very low food security.'" Deborah Leff, Public welfare Foundation: "When they hear 'very low food security,' if sounds like bureaucratic jargon. It doesn't sound like people who can't get enough to eat." Stark: "Some say that may be the point. Just last year, the government used the word 'hunger' to describe, for example, those who run out of food and have no money to buy more, or families where parents skip meals so their children can eat. They were labeled as having 'food insecurity with hunger.' Now, they have 'very low food security.' 'Hunger' is out. The Bush Administration defends the change, saying it's based on recommendations from the national academies, which questioned whether the report truly measures hunger or just access to food."

WPost Mocks USDA's Avoidance Of Term "Hunger." The Washington Post (11/17, 690K) editorializes, "The agriculture Department has taken what you might call the Scarlett O'Hara approach to Americans without enough to eat: It will never call them hungry again. Rumbling stomachs? Malnourishment? That's not hunger, the department says. It's experiencing 'very low food security.' Maybe there's some scientific basis for this Orwellian recasting. … At least the USDA doesn't have jurisdiction over national monuments. Otherwise, just imagine it going after the inscription on the Statue of Liberty next: 'Give me your energy-deficient, your financially challenged, your space-impaired masses yearning to breathe free.'"

Democrats Snub Pelosi, Select Hoyer As Majority Leader. On the day in which she made history by coming the first woman speaker of the House, Nancy Pelosi is having to deal with very negative media coverage. The AP reports Democrats yesterday elected her "by acclamation," then "quickly snubbed her, selecting Steny Hoyer of Maryland as majority leader against her wishes." Pelosi had endorsed Rep. John Murtha, but "the secret-ballot vote for Hoyer was 149-86." Pelosi's own election is being largely overshadowed by Murtha's defeat. A number of reports and analyses pieces refer to Democrats rebuffing or stunning the Speaker-elect, and suggest the election fiasco raises questions about Pelosi's leadership. CNN's The Situation Room (11/16, Bash) said that "even before she takes the gavel, Pelosi is facing questions about whether she made a major strategic blunder." Democratic strategist Paul Begala, also on CNN's The Situation Room (11/16, Blitzer), said "It's a bigger defeat for Nancy Pelosi than for Jack Murtha." Pelosi "takes it on the chin here."

The CBS Evening News (11/16, story 2, 1:15, Couric, 7.66M) said Pelosi's "moment of triumph was followed by her first big political setback." Also on the CBS Evening News (11/16, story 3, 1:45, 7.66M), Bob Schiefer said the Murtha-Hoyer debate "has made the gap" between liberal and conservative Democrats in the caucus "even wider" and "it has raised real questions about her judgment." On ABC World News (11/16, story 5, 2:50, Gibson, 8.78M) George Stephanopoulos was asked to consider what Murtha's loss says "about her ability to lead the Democrats in the House." Stephanopoulos said "a lot of her opponents are saying they hope she learned a lesson, not to put personal loyalty above the interests of her caucus."

NBC Nightly News (11/16, story 4, 1:35, Reid, 9.87M) called it "a stunning defeat," and showed Pelosi saying, "We've had our debates and disagreements in that room and now that is over. As I said to my colleagues, as we say in church, let there be peace on earth and let it begin with us."

The Washington Post (11/17, Weisman, Romano, 690K) says the vote exposes "a deep political divide even before the party takes control." The vote "was viewed by many in the party as a repudiation of Pelosi's strong-arm tactics. … Pelosi's aggressive, last-minute campaign for Murtha in the face of overwhelming support for Hoyer left many Democrats worried that she has become too reliant on a tight inner circle, too reluctant to listen to the broader Democratic caucus and mistakenly convinced that she can dictate the direction the caucus must take."

The Los Angeles Times (11/17, Hook, Simon, 850K) headlines its front-page report "Pelosi's Early Setback Has Her Party On Alert," and says Democrats "gave Pelosi a brusque lesson in the limits of her power." It was "a battle that many felt Pelosi made unnecessarily bitter." Hoyer "didn't merely defeat Murtha, Pelosi's strong preference, but trounced him." The Times adds, "some Democrats were left wondering why Pelosi had injected herself into a bitter leadership battle with her last-minute support of Murtha over Hoyer, who had long been on track to claim the No. 2 job."

The Los Angeles Times (11/17, Simon, 850K) also runs an analysis piece this morning titled "Party Gets A Rocky Start," in which it quotes "a Democratic lawmaker who spoke on condition that he not be named for fear of retribution from the leadership." The lawmaker said, "These aren't the headlines we wanted to generate." McClatchy (11/17, Talev) also quotes "one moderate Democratic congressman, who spoke on condition of anonymity for fear of retribution," saying "Pelosi's backing of Murtha made her look petty and shook some members' faith in her leadership. 'She owes Murtha a lot; she owes the caucus more,' he said. 'A good leader knows when she has to tell a member no, even when it's your friend. She'll either get it and lead differently,' the congressman said, 'or she won't lead long.'"

The New York Times (11/17, Hulse, 1.16M) says Hoyer's win strains "the unity of the new majority party," and is "an indication that rank-and-file members would be willing to break from Ms. Pelosi." Some Democrats "portrayed her decision to inject herself into the race as a miscalculation that elevated the battle into an unnecessary early test of her power and ended up giving more influence to Mr. Hoyer. But they said they did not expect hard feelings to linger."

Dana Milbank writes in the Washington Post (11/17, 690K) that Pelosi "experienced her first smackdown" yesterday. Pelosi "had only herself to blame for this briefest of honeymoons." Yesterday "should have been a coronation for the first woman to be speaker. Instead, her party had plunged into fratricide, and cable news was running nonstop clips of Murtha talking with FBI agents posing as sheiks in the Abscam sting."

The Wall Street Journal (11/17, Rogers, Lueck, 2.04M) reports the "Democratic fight…showed the political dangers of…Pelosi's risk-taking leadership style as the incoming speaker," while USA Today (11/17, Stone, Nichols, 2.27M) says "the next speaker of the House lost her first test Thursday even before she takes office. The decision by House Democrats to choose…Hoyer to be majority leader over…Murtha…dampened what until now had been a jubilant time for their party."

CQ (11/17, Ferrechio) runs a similar story under the headline "In Rebuff To Pelosi, Democrats Elect Hoyer As Majority Leader," while the Washington Times (11/17, Hurt, 88K) says "yesterday's vote showed that nearly two-thirds of the new Democratic majority in the House was willing to defy Mrs. Pelosi's demand that they vote for Mr. Murtha. Since gaining 29 seats in the Nov. 7 election, House Democrats have privately expressed deep concern over Mr. Murtha and say Mrs. Pelosi blundered by backing him so forcefully."

The Financial Times (11/17, Yeager) reports, "Throughout the mid-term election campaign, Mrs Pelosi pledged that the first act of a Democratic-controlled Congress would be a tough package of rules and ethics reform, following a series of mostly Republican scandals. But she raised eyebrows this week with her endorsement of Mr Murtha, who has been called "ethically challenged" by government watchdogs." Murtha "has faced allegations that he abused his position as a member of the defence appropriations sub-committee by favouring a lobbying company of a former long-term staffer and clients of Robert 'Kit' Murtha, his brother."

Hoyer, together with a number of Democratic lawmakers, granted interviews to several cable shows last night, arguing their caucus is united and the leadership election will have no long-term consequences. But the New York Times (11/17, Hulse, 1.16M) notes "not everyone was willing to put aside the fight so quickly. Some supporters of Mr. Murtha, a longtime member of the Appropriations Committee whose candidacy was dogged by questions about his ethics record, were disgruntled and said they were trying to identify lawmakers who had broken pledges to support him. 'We won't trust them on issues like this the next time,' said Representative James P. Moran, a Murtha ally from Virginia who said Mr. Murtha had been betrayed." Moran was more conciliatory on PBS' NewsHour (11/16, Warner), where he said, "This is behind us. It's time to move forward, and Steny certainly worked hard enough to be deserving of majority leader, and I congratulate him. … The caucus has spoken."

And the Baltimore Sun (11/17, Davis, 257K) reports California Rep. Maxine Waters, "a Hoyer supporter, said Pelosi's campaign -- in which she and her lieutenants urged lawmakers to abandon commitments to Hoyer or risk losing their chances at coveted committee posts -- had raised serious questions within the party. 'What most people didn't understand was the why's of it all,' Waters said." But "she added -- in what could portend difficult days ahead as Pelosi attempts to impose order on her caucus -- that lawmakers had mostly ignored Pelosi's 11th-hour effort to sway them in Murtha's favor." Waters said on MSNBC's Hardball (11/16, Matthews), "Steny has demonstrated his leadership. He's paid his dues. Steny knows the name of every member in Congress, all of the new members. He pays attention. He's been there every Thursday morning to run those whip meetings. He took his licking and he kept on ticking. He lost but played the game of being a team member. And he's a members' leader."

Hoyer said on CNN's The Situation Room (11/16, Blitzer), "The caucus spoke with a strong voice hat they thought the leadership that I'm providing, and the team of Nancy Pelosi and Steny Hoyer together, creating the kind of unity we had in our caucus, is one they wanted to keep, now that we have won the majority." Hoyer said on MSNBC's Hardball (11/16, Matthews) that he and Pelosi "have known each other 40 years. We had this temporary disagreement, obviously, but we will get over that quickly. Why? Because we're going to move fast, and when you're moving fast, you are thinking about going forward, not what happened yesterday." On Fox News' The Big Story (11/16, Gibson), Hoyer said, "Nancy is a very loyal person. Jack Murtha is a close friend of hers, had worked hard for her election as whip and then as leader. And I think she felt that she owed that response to him. I understood that. But that's the past. We have been given a responsibility by the American people and we need to meet it together." Profiles in this morning's newspapers describe Hoyer as a moderate pragmatist. The Washington Post (11/17, Murray, 690K), in a story titled "Political Pragmatism Carried Hoyer To The Top," says Hoyer is "a practical moderate and Nancy Pelosi is a liberal idealist, and for more than 40 years they have competed like siblings, all the way to the pinnacle of politics." The New York Times (11/17, Zernike, 1.16M) runs a similar profile under the headline "Steny H. Hoyer, A Cultivator Of Loyalties." The Times says, "WASHINGTON, Nov. 16 — If you placed an order for a congressman, chances are you would get Steny Hoyer. There is the immovable silver hair and the gleaming smile, the assiduous courting of colleagues, supporters and lobbyists, even the requisite life-changing encounter with John F. Kennedy."

Rep. Charles Rangel said on Fox News' The Big Story (11/16, Gibson), "I was scared to death that this thing was going to explode right on the Democratic Party. … If you could have seen the emotion of the Democratic caucus as both of them -- Pelosi and Hoyer -- hugged each other, it just brought us together with a sense of unity that -- we were fearful, but it was really exciting." On MSNBC's Tucker (11/16, Carlson), Rangel made similar comments, saying, "I was frightened as heck that this was going to be a big obstacle to unity, but you would have to be there to see how these two professionals handled Steny Hoyer's victory. He could not have been more cordial, friendly and dedicated to the success of Nancy Pelosi as the first woman speaker. Murtha was terrific."

Rep. Barney Frank, asked on PBS' NewsHour (11/16, Warner) "how serious a defeat" the Hoyer victory is for Pelosi, said, "Not at all. In the first place, it was not her first power play. Her first power play was a very successful one. I know only controversy makes news, but we had a potential controversy between Rahm Emanuel…and Jim Clyburn, our caucus chairman. She worked out a deal whereby Jim became the whip, the number three, an African-American very important in an elected leadership position, only the second time in history that's happened, and Rahm became caucus chair. We had this fight. But the key point is this: Nancy Pelosi and Steny Hoyer have worked together as number-one and number-two on the Democratic side for four years."

Rep. Dennis Kucinich said on Fox News' Your World (11/16, Cavuto), "A lot of us like Jack Murtha a lot. We appreciate the work he did in helping us to create a majority by making Iraq the issue. But we're united. And that's something to keep in mind."

Rep. Chaka Fattah said on MSNBC's Hardball (11/16, Matthews), "I love Jack Murtha and I think the country loves him for his courage and standing up against this war. He got a lot of votes in the Democratic caucus today, but it didn't add up to a win for him. But I think those who know Jack Murtha know that that's one moment in time we're going to be united. Steny Hoyer deserves this victory. He got the lion's share of the votes today. And we're going be a united caucus."

Rep. Ellen Tauscher said on MSNBC (11/16, O'Donnell), "I don't think it was a feud. We were trying to sort out how to put the best team front and center for us to go into the majority. And we went with the team that brought us into the majority."

Rep. Steve Israel said on MSNBC's Hardball (11/16, Matthews), "I supported Steny Hoyer. This wasn't about the war in Iraq. This was about a leadership election. This is about two class acts who were competing for one position."

Blue Dog Coalition leader Rep. Allen Boyd said on MSNBC's Hardball (11/16, Matthews), "Most of our members supported Steny Hoyer."

More Commentary. In an editorial headlined "Speaker Pelosi Tempts Disaster," the New York Times (11/17, 1.16M) says "Pelosi has managed to severely scar her leadership even before taking up the gavel as the new speaker of the House. First, she played politics with the leadership of the House Intelligence Committee to settle an old score and a new debt. And then she put herself in a lose-lose position by trying to force a badly tarnished ally…on the incoming Democratic Congress as majority leader. … The new majority -- led by a presumably wiser speaker -- must realize by now that intramural vendetta is hardly a substitute for productive government."

E.J. Dionne, in the Washington Post (11/17, 690K), writes "Democrats might usefully take a break from their inane round of back-stabbing and score-settling to focus, for a few moments, on why voters gave them their congressional majorities. A lot of Americans are hurting in the pocketbook, and if Democrats don't use the next two years to help them, the party will squander the trust it has temporarily earned."

GOP Rep. Ray LaHood said on MSNBC's Tucker (11/6, Carlson), "I think Pelosi's in the self-destruct mode and has been in that mode all week. And she's not off to a very great start for somebody who's talking about bringing her whole caucus together. It looks like she's parted ways with many of them. … It shows a pretty ineffective speaker-elect."

Ex-Rep. J.C. Watts, a Republican, said on CNN's The Situation Room (11/16, Blitzer), "I think this is a small stumble, because I think the Democrats understand that if they allow this to become a problem in terms of governing, it sets them back tremendously over the next couple of years. So I think, hopefully, my advice to them would be they'll have these petty fights behind closed doors, but, hey, get over this. The election is over. Put a good face on it and move forward."

Federal Workers Union Hails Hoyer Selection. The Washington Post's (11/17, D4, Barr) "Federal Diary" column reports, "Federal employee groups yesterday welcomed the election of Rep. Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.) as the next House majority leader. Hoyer has championed federal pay raises and benefits for more than two decades. 'We have never before had such a good friend so high in the congressional leadership," said Margaret Baptiste, president of the National Active and Retired Federal Employees Association."

LATimes Endorses Harman For Intel Committee Chairmanship. The Los Angeles Times (11/17, 850K) editorializes that Pelosi's "embarrassing experience" of endorsing Rep. John P. Murtha, should make her "reconsider another ill-advised promotion: Her apparent intention to bestow the chairmanship of the House Intelligence Committee not on the panel's ranking Democrat, Rep. Jane Harman but on Rep. Alcee L. Hastings." A "litany of explanations have been adduced to explain why Pelosi would bypass Harman, an expert on intelligence matters who has won the respect of both parties while criticizing some of the Bush administration's excesses in the war on terror," but "none of them is persuasive," and Harman "has earned this chairmanship." Pelosi "should think twice before indulging in a witch hunt of colleagues who can work well with Republicans," and Harman fits the position "far more than Hastings."

Gates To Begin Capitol Hill Visits Today. The AP (11/16, Flaherty) reports Defense Secretary-designate Robert Gates "is making his first round of visits on Capitol Hill" since his nomination. The "one-on-one meetings Friday with lawmakers are in anticipation of Gates' confirmation hearing next month. The Senate Armed Services Committee plans to hold the hearing the week of Dec. 4."

RAND Analyst Says Gates Will Have Opportunities At DOD. In a WashingtonPost.com (11/17) essay, RAND Corporation senior analyst Gregory Treverton writes that, if confirmed, Gates "will not have much time in office but he will have opportunity." He "comes to the job without much baggage, either of ideology or policy. He didn't campaign for the job -- indeed, he turned down the position of director of national intelligence when it was offered -- so he has some independence. And he comes to office when desperation might make for a serious debate about policy toward Iraq." Treverton lists Iraq, military transformation, and intelligence as areas Gates can impact during his tenure.

Bipartisan Senate Bill Seeks To Improve Drug Safety. The AP (11/17, Bridges) reports, "A bipartisan bill represents the best shot in years to improve the safety of drugs the Food and Drug Administration regulates, but needs bolstering to heal the ailing regulatory agency, witnesses told lawmakers Thursday." The bill, "introduced in August by Sens. Mike Enzi, R-Wyo., and Ted Kennedy, D-Mass., comes on the heels of a string of high-profile drug recalls and safety warnings. Among them was the 2004 withdrawal of the popular painkiller Vioxx after long-term use was linked to an increased risk of heart attack and stroke." USA Today (11/17, 2.27M) says "representatives from the pharmaceutical industry and consumer and patient groups agreed Thursday that a bipartisan bill working its way through the Senate would improve drug safety and public confidence."

New OPM Groups To Focus On Federal Workforce Issues. The Washington Post's (11/17, D4, Barr) "Federal Diary" column reports, "In an effort to take a more strategic approach to federal workforce management, an interagency group has reorganized with an eye to how best to help Uncle Sam recruit and train a new generation of public servants." The "Chief Human Capital Officers Council, was created in 2002 to advise agencies on how to improve federal personnel systems." The Post adds that "Projections show that 40 percent of the federal workforce will retire by 2015, casting agencies into a war for talent with corporations, consulting firms and other employers."

Possibility Of Replacing Cheney As Vice President Floated. In his USA Today column (11/17), Al Neuharth says that for the 2008 election, "Dick Cheney unequivocally has taken himself out of the running. So he's toast. It's hard to think of a good reason he should remain in office and logical to assume that some Republicans are pushing him to leave. It could be on 'doctor's orders.' He's 65 with serious heart problems." President Bush "then could name a vice presidential successor who they hope might be nominated and win in '08. But the appointment would need approval of both houses of Congress. With control shifting to the Democrats in January, time may be of the essence." Names that are "likely on the short might-be list (alphabetically): Bill Frist, 54, Senate majority leader from Tennessee; Rudy Giuliani, 62, former mayor of New York City; John McCain, 70, U.S. senator from Arizona; Condoleezza Rice, 52, secretary of State." If Cheney "goes, Bush could make political history by naming the first woman and first black as veep."

Bush Urged To Resist Entitlement Compromise That Includes Tax Hikes. In his Wall Street Journal column (11/17), Daniel Henninger discusses the impact of the Reagan tax cuts in the US and in Eastern Europe, adding, "Last week former Clinton Treasury Secretary Robert Rubin exhorted the Democrats to raise taxes 'to solve the nation's fiscal problems.' The Rubin Solution may not be easy. Even a Democratic Congress might realize that raising taxes today is swimming against the global tides. In reversing the Clinton tax increases, passed in another age 13 years ago, and spreading tax cuts to the financial sector, George Bush has driven the roots of the Reagan tax philosophy deeper. If he resists a grand compromise on entitlements that raises taxes, it may prove to be his most enduring legacy."

Healthcare, Energy, Economic Justice Suggested As Democratic Agenda Items. In his Washington Post column (11/17, A17), David Ignatius says, "What are the issues where the Democrats should plant their flag and try to create a new majority? Two are no-brainers that should have broad bipartisan support next year: reviving the Clinton administration's push for national health-care policies that can save costs and improve care, and getting serious about alternative energy policies that can reduce demand for foreign oil. Sen. Hillary Clinton has already staked out these issues, which will enhance her stature as a 2008 presidential candidate." A "third big Democratic idea was advanced this week by Jim Webb, the senator-elect from Virginia, who promises to be one of the most interesting voices in the new Congress. He argued in the Wall Street Journal that the Democrats should focus on economic justice."

LATimes Says Big Three's Days Of Federal Help Are Over. The Los Angeles Times (11/17, 850K) editorializes "Very little, if anything, is expected to come of the meeting," between President Bush and the heads of General Motors, Ford and DaimlerChrysler's Chrysler Group, after "months of lobbying for some face time." It was "a reflection not only of the newfound weakness of the industry but of a change in global circumstances." Although the US auto industry is "an important part of the nation's economy," the days of "massive federal bailouts for the likes of Chrysler are over."

OTHER NEWS:

Stocks Soar To New Record After Positive Inflation News. The CBS Evening News (11/16, story 5, 0:15, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "There's one piece of good news tonight about prices: Cheaper gasoline has us talking about deflation instead of inflation for a second straight month. Consumer prices dropped by a half percent in October. So far this year, inflation is running 2.4%. That's a full point lower than last year." ABC World News (11/16, story 9, 0:10, Gibson, 8.78M) says "the Dow gained 54 points to close at 12,305. And that's its third-consecutive record." The Wall Street Journal (11/17, McKay, 2.04M) notes "the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index rose 0.2%, or 3.19 points, to 1399.76, shy of its first close above 1400 since November 2000. The broad-based index is up 12% this year. The Nasdaq Composite Index rose 0.3%, or 6.31 points, to 2449.06, up 11% year to date."

The Washington Post (11/17, Schneider, Henderson, 690K) runs a similar report titled Inflation Drops Again As Gasoline Prices Fall," in which is says "inflation continued to moderate in October as falling oil prices, a slack housing market and a decline in clothing costs reinforced the sense of a gradually slowing economy." Labor Department "statistics released yesterday indicated that overall prices declined 0.5 percent in October on a seasonally adjusted basis, following a similar decline in the previous month. Excluding volatile fuel and food costs, prices rose 0.1 percent, the smallest increase since December and a sign that core inflation is declining."

The Wall Street Journal (11/17, Gerena-Morales, 2.04M) headlines its story "Inflationary Signs Weaken Broadly," and quotes Nariman Behravesh, chief economist at consulting firm Global Insight, saying the inflation report "is unmitigated good news. … It will provide great comfort to the Fed because they've been saying that inflation is going to come down -- and it has. People who were worried about [high] core inflation can breathe a little easier." In fact, the Financial Times (11/17, Callan, Guha) titles its story "Inflation Slowdown Raises Rate Cut Hope." The New York Times (11/17, Porter, Peters, 1.16M) and Christian Science Monitor (11/17, Scherer, 59K), among other newspapers, also report on the inflation numbers.

KBR Shares Soar On NYSE Debut. The Wall Street Journal (11/17, Civils, 2.04M) writes that Halliburton "has shed a big part of its business, for better or worse. KBR, the engineering and construction unit with a huge presence in Iraq, was successfully offered to the public Thursday after a slight delay. Halliburton's stock, which has rallied in anticipation of the spinoff, has done well since the Iraq war began, rising from around $10 to an all-time high of $42 earlier this year. Shares closed Thursday at $32.51, down $1.04 on the New York Stock Exchange." The Washington Post (11/17, D3, Witte, 690K) says analysts said Halliburton's "main reason for making the move was that KBR had become a drain on the company's share price. While KBR takes in huge revenues through its government contracting and engineering work, its profit margins are considerably thinner than those of the rest of Halliburton."

KBR Could Still Face Difficulties With UK's MoD. The Financial Times (11/17, Gangahar) says KBR shares "soared as much as 25 per cent on their debut." KBR "ignored calls from the UK's Ministry of Defence to postpone its float," which the ministry requested "to give it time to determine the financial viability of KBR." But the Houston Chronicle (11/17, Clanton, 530K) says KBR's decision to ignore the UK request "might still come back to bite it." KBR CEO William Utt will meet with a top MoD official Monday "to discuss the impact of the move on a strategically important naval dockyard, which is majority-owned by KBR." The UK "has threatened to reject the lucrative contract if both sides cannot come to terms."

Several House Races Remain Too Close To Call. USA Today (11/17, Stone, 2.27M) reports, "Recounts, runoffs and Saturday's Ohio State-Michigan football game stand in the way of deciding House races that remain too close to call 10 days after the election. Nearly a dozen races were unsettled at the start of the week." Four races "have been called since Tuesday, all but one in favor of the incumbent. Connecticut Republican Rep. Rob Simmons lost to Democrat Joe Courtney by 91 of nearly 250,000 votes cast." Republicans "lead in all five races in which absentee and provisional ballots are still being counted." One of the "closest contests is being waged in North Carolina, where GOP Rep. Robin Hayes leads Democrat Larry Kissell by about 450 votes. Poll workers are hand-tallying nearly 1,500 provisional ballots." In Ohio, Rep. Deborah Pryce, "who has said she'll step down from her GOP leadership position, leads Democrat Mary Jo Kilroy by 3,536 votes. Election officials won't count provisional ballots until Sunday, so workers can watch the Ohio State-Michigan game Saturday." Freshman Republican Rep. Jean Schmidt "leads Democrat Victoria Wulsin by about 2,800 votes. Provisional and absentee ballots could be counted by Tuesday." The "most contentious standoff is in Florida in the district that Republican Katherine Harris — a central figure in the disputed 2000 presidential election recount — gave up for her failed run for senator. Just 401 votes separate the leader, Republican Vern Buchanan, from Democrat Christine Jennings." A recount is "underway, but that's not likely to explain why more than 18,000 voters in heavily Democratic Sarasota County left the House race blank on their electronic touch-screen ballots." Two other races "will be decided in runoffs next month. In Louisiana, state Rep. Karen Carter is challenging fellow Democrat Rep. William Jefferson, who is under investigation for alleged bribery." In Texas, GOP Rep. Henry Bonilla "faces Democratic former congressman Ciro Rodriguez."

Democrat Won't Seek Recount In Wyoming House Race. The AP (11/17, Moen) reports Democratic challenger Gary Trauner "said Thursday he would not seek a recount in his narrow loss to Republican Rep. Barbara Cubin in Wyoming's closest House race in 36 years." Trauner said in a statement, "It is time to put this election to rest and look to the future." The AP adds Cubin "beat Trauner by 1,012 votes out of 193,369 cast. The State Canvassing Board certified the election results Wednesday."

Democrats Hopeful For Continued Success In 2008. The Wall Street Journal (11/17, Harwood, 2.04M) reports in its "Washington Wire" that, "Democrats see improved electoral map as 2008 field expands. House Democratic campaign chief Emanuel touts gains among suburbanites and higher-income voters -- Democrats won among those earning $50,000 to $100,000. Republican consultant Steve Lombardo, citing Democratic advances among Catholics, says 'only another election or two' can prove staying power of such trends." Sen. Dodd of Connecticut, "who may join Democratic nomination race, calls for 'New Age of Idealism.' His annual Williamsburg retreat for supporters attracts greater interest given his 2008 aspirations and ascension to Senate Banking chairmanship.

McCain Says GOP Needs To Return To "Common Sense Conservatism." The AP (11/17, Sidoti) reports Sen. John McCain "called on the Republican Party to return to its common-sense conservatism — and implicitly cast himself as the one who can lead the party's rebirth." In the "first of two speeches that could set the tone for a potential presidential campaign," McCain said, "We lost our principles and our majority. And there is no way to recover our majority without recovering our principles first." The AP adds that on the "same day he launched a presidential exploratory committee, McCain said voters felt that Republicans valued their incumbency over their beliefs on such conservative standards as limited and efficient government — and he urged a return to those tenets." McCain "spoke before members of the Federalist Society, the organization of more than 25,000 conservatives and libertarians including high-profile members of the Bush administration, the federal judiciary and Congress. Later Thursday, he was delivering a broader speech about the future of the Republican Party to another conservative pillar, GOPAC." McCain is "taking advantage of the postelection period to outline a vision for the party much like Ronald Reagan did after the Republican defeat in the 1976 presidential election." As expected, McCain "also filed paperwork with the Federal Election Commission that will allow him to raise money and travel the country while weighing a bid." Despite all "the action, McCain says he will wait until after the Christmas holiday to decide whether to make a second bid for the White House."

The New York Times (11/17, Nagourney, 1.16M) reports McCain "said Thursday that Republicans had lost the midterm elections because 'we abandoned our principles' on fiscal policy and government restraint, inviting a backlash from Americans over what they saw as widespread hypocrisy." McCain, "in back-to-back speeches delivered on the day he formally created his presidential exploratory committee — portrayed the election result as deserved punishment of Republicans for their performance in office, rather than an affirmation of the Democratic Party. Speaking to two conservative audiences still reeling from the Republicans' losses of the House and Senate, he said Republicans could recover from the election but only if they took lessons from the results." McCain said, "Hypocrisy, my friends, is the most obvious of political sins — and the people will punish it." The Times adds the speeches "were what aides described as the start of a new phase in Mr. McCain's likely try for the presidency, though he will make a formal decision on whether to run next year. The addresses, amounting to a sharp repudiation of his own party as well as an unambiguous embrace of conservative ideology, come as Republicans debate what lessons should be drawn from the defeat."

The Washington Post (11/17, A7, Balz, 690K) reports McCain "took the first formal steps toward a 2008 presidential campaign yesterday and used a pair of speeches before Republican audiences to argue that his brand of conservative, reform-minded politics and hawkish foreign policy can restore the GOP to power." McCain "cited Reagan frequently as the guidepost for the future of the party. In contrast, he never mentioned Bush by name, although he was implicitly critical of the administration's conduct of the war in Iraq. By choosing two conservative audiences for his first major post-election speeches, McCain demonstrated his desire to mend relations with the right, which helped deny him the nomination in 2000." McCain's "moves yesterday were the latest evidence suggesting that the 2008 presidential campaign will accelerate to warp speed earlier than in any other period in recent history." McCain advisers "likened yesterday's speeches -- to the GOPAC political action committee and the Federalist Society -- to an address Reagan delivered in 1977 after the Democrats won the White House and GOP fortunes appeared to ebb."

The Washington Times (11/17, Dinan, 88K) reports the story under the headline, "McCain Says GOP Needs To Recover 'Lost' Principles." The Times reports McCain "said a majority of voters are still conservative and added the Republican Party must return to basic principles of limited government in order to recapture their support." He also said "last week's elections, in which Republicans lost control of the House and Senate, were not an endorsement of Democratic ideas, nor of an isolationist approach to foreign policy." At the Federalist Society, McCain "drew a standing ovation at the beginning and at the end of his remarks."

CNN's The Situation Room (11/16, Crowley) reported, "This is the day that John McCain filed papers for an exploratory presidential committee, but the fact is that the words he's going to speak today to these two conservative groups shows he's doing a lot more than exploring."

Stone said Sen. John McCain is "pretty strong. I think he's the frontrunner. Rudy Giuliani, who I have enormous respect for, would be a terrific vice presidential candidate, but at the end of the day how he will wear in the primaries remains to be seen. John McCain is fundamentally a conservative in a conservative party. And the Republican Party tasted defeat last week, they didn't like the taste. John McCain's the only candidate they have on the horizon who is competitive in places like Pennsylvania and New Jersey and Ohio, and therefore he's our strongest candidate."

Asked on MSNBC's Hardball (11/16, Matthews) if he is "a McCain man," Rep. John Shadegg said, "I think he's the star-quality candidate we need."

Edwards Still Undecided On '08 Run. Ex-Sen. John Edwards, asked on CNN's The Situation Room (11/16, Blitzer) if he wants to be president, said, "Maybe, a resounding maybe. I haven't decided for sure, but I'm seriously thinking about it. … I'll decide in the next few months. And it will be dependent in part on how Elizabeth is doing. But right now, she's doing great. And whether I think it's an important thing for the people that I would want to represent for me to run for the White House."

Ford Not Ruling Out Challenge To Alexander In 2008. Asked on CNN's The Situation Room (11/16, Blitzer) about the fact that Sen. Lamar Alexander is up for reelection in 2008, Rep. Harold Ford Jr. said, "I read that somewhere. The next two years will be interesting." Blitzer: "You're certainly not ruling that out?" Ford: "No, not at all."

RNC Says No Offer Was Made To Steele. The Washington Times (11/17, Hallow, 88K) reports the Republican National Committee "this week said it never offered Maryland Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele 'a specific role' at the committee after his unsuccessful campaign for the U.S. Senate." Many conservatives "were surprised this week when, after reports that some leading Republicans favored Mr. Steele to succeed Ken Mehlman as chairman of the RNC, the White House leaked word to news agencies that President Bush would back Florida Sen. Mel Martinez for the top post at the committee." Steele "told The Times on Wednesday that neither White House adviser Karl Rove nor Mr. Mehlman 'offered me formally' any job." Steele said, "I got calls from various state party chairmen and national committee members to take the chairman's post on Thursday and Friday of last week. I told them, 'This is clearly a White House decision. We'll just have to wait to see what the White House decides.' This isn't something I actively pursued. It grew up out of the grass roots." Steele added that "all this is moot now. The president has made his decision, and I am a team player."

DeLay's Replacement Seeks Investigation Of Missing Computer Files. The New York Times/AP (11/17) reports the "newest member of Congress, who is temporarily filling former Majority Leader Tom DeLay's Texas seat, wants an investigation into the destruction of computer files in her office by staffers she inherited from DeLay." Rep. Shelley Sekula-Gibbs, R-Texas, "said the staffers resigned en masse and walked out Tuesday, a day after she was sworn in to fill DeLay's seat for the next seven weeks. A Capitol Hill newspaper, Roll Call, reported the staffers did not like the way she was treating them." Sekula-Gibbs "said in a statement Thursday that seven employees in her Washington office and the district office in Stafford, Texas, outside Houston, 'deleted records and files without my knowledge or permission' on the same day she was sworn in." Sekula-Gibbs "said the walkouts were 'suspicious' in that the seven took the time to delete files before leaving without notice." The AP adds David James, "former deputy chief of staff for DeLay, released a statement Thursday saying that the computers in the office were 'scrubbed and reconfigured' according to House rules on transition between members and that work performed for the congresswoman during the brief time he worked there was preserved."

The Washington Post (11/17, A4, Babington, 690K) reports, "Just when it seemed things could get no stranger regarding the House seat once held by Texas Republican Tom DeLay, his successor called for an investigation into missing computer records last night, and an aide accused her of 'disrespect and unprofessionalism.'" Rep. Sekula-Gibbs "said that former DeLay employees apparently deleted the office's computer files shortly before they walked out, en masse, on Tuesday." Sekula-Gibbs, "a dermatologist, arrived for Congress's lame-duck session with ambitions for funding a fence along the Mexican border, making a number of tax cuts permanent and achieving other goals that may or may not be possible in the handful of appropriations bills on Congress's plate."

GOP Alienation Of Latinos Seen As Key To 2006 Losses. In a Los Angeles Times op-ed (11/17),

Tamar Jacoby of the Manhattan Institute says, "Republicans are asking what they did wrong in the 2006 midterms. This is a question with many answers. But few missteps were more foolish — and few will be harder to correct — than those made with Latino voters. The appointment this week of Cuban-born Sen. Mel Martinez of Florida to chair the Republican National Committee is a good way to make a new start. But the damage done in the last year goes deeper than symbolism, and it will take more than one appointment to undo it." Republican hard-liners "in the House refused to enact the president's immigration reform. They passed a bill making felons of illegal immigrants, not because it was good law but merely to make a political point." The results "were hardly surprising. Last week, Latinos voted 70% to 29% in favor of Democrats."

Moore Makes Pledge To Conservatives. In a Los Angeles Times op-ed (11/17), Michael Moore offers "A Liberal's Pledge to Disheartened Conservatives." The pledge includes offers to "always respect" conservatives who vote Republican, including "never, ever, call[ing] you 'unpatriotic' simply because you disagree with us. In fact, we encourage you to dissent and disagree with us." The liberals will "let you marry whomever you want," and will "soon bring our sons and daughters home from Iraq," and bring "your sons and daughters home too."

O'Connor Recounts Receiving Package Containing Poison. The New York Times (11/17, Greenhouse, 1.16M) reports, "A discussion of recent threats to judges' safety, at a bar association conference in suburban Dallas last week, became startlingly specific when Sandra Day O'Connor, the retired Supreme Court justice, recounted that each justice had received in the mail 'a wonderful package of home-baked cookies' that contained 'enough poison to kill the entire membership of the court.'" Justice O'Connor's remarks "were reported on Thursday in The Star-Telegram in Fort Worth."

Shadegg Is Matthews' "Favorite Candidate." On his MSNBC Hardball (11/16) show, Chris Matthews introduced Rep. John Shadegg as "a real Barry Goldwater principled conservative" and told him, "you're my one favorite candidate on the Republican side." Asked if he can win his race for minority whip today, Shadegg said, "I believe I can. I'm certainly hopeful. I'm not going to give you a count and tell you that we've got it locked up; we don't."

Conservative Think Tank Promoter Profiled. The New York Times (11/17, Deparle, 1.16M) profiles Lawrence W. Reed, "one of those people with so much passion for an unusual line of work that he invented a new occupation, and it has helped shape the conservative movement from here to the Himalayas." Reed "runs a conservative think tank school. Twice a year, ideological allies from across the globe travel to his program at the Mackinac Center for Public Policy in Midland, Mich., to study the tricks of the idea-peddling trade. Policy institutes have been central to a national organizing strategy that has long won the right a reputation for savvy, and state-level versions are growing in number and clout." Pushing "causes like lower taxes, less spending and school choice plans, they have offered conservatives a base of influence independent of electoral politics. Indeed, after the Republican losses in the midterm elections, many conservatives said this carefully tended world — of research organizations, single-interest groups, foundations and publications — was vital to the movement's revival."

Milton Friedman Dead At 94. The Wall Street Journal (11/17, Ip, Whitehouse, 2.04M) reports, "A half century ago, Milton Friedman's advocacy of free markets over government intervention and his prescription for inflation-fighting by central banks were treated as fringe notions by many economists. By the time the Nobel Prize-winning economist died yesterday at the age of 94, his views had helped to reshape modern capitalism." Friedman "provided the intellectual foundations for the anti-inflation, tax-cutting and antigovernment policies of President Ronald Reagan and British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher and an era of more-disciplined central banking. His ideas helped to end the military draft in the 1970s, gave birth to staple conservative causes such as school vouchers and created the groundwork for new economic views about the Great Depression, unemployment, inflation and exchange rates." The New York Times (11/17, Noble, 1.16M) calls Friedman "the grandmaster of free-market economic theory in the postwar era and a prime force in the movement of nations toward less government and greater reliance on individual responsibility." The Los Angeles Times (11/17, Peterson, 850K), Washington Post (11/17, A1, Sulliva, Losada, 690K) and USA Today (11/17, Kirchhoff, 2.27M) run similar reports.

action also blinded him to its successes. But it would be wrong to confuse his libertarian instincts with lack of human sympathy. He was an early proponent of the negative income tax, now known as the earned income tax credit -- which supplements the wages of millions of low-income workers. And while he opposed rent control, public education and Social Security, he promoted government vouchers to help people buy housing, education and medical care."

The Wall Street Journal (11/17, 2.04M), in an editorial, calls Friedman "arguably the greatest economist of the 20th century," and notes "this newspaper had the privilege of publishing Milton Friedman's articles on numerous occasions over the years. We've also disagreed with him from time to time, notably on exchange rates and drug legalization. … On the death of Ronald Reagan, whom he advised, Mr. Friedman wrote on these pages that 'few people in human history have contributed more to the achievement of human freedom.' The same can and long will be said of Milton Friedman." The Wall Street Journal (11/17, 2.04M) also runs an op-ed by Friedman, titled "Why Money Matters."

In Singapore, Bush Promotes Trade, Issues Warning To North Korea. In Singapore, the first leg of his Asian trip, President Bush promoted free trade and addressed the situation with North Korea. Bush's trip generated no network TV coverage last night. Press accounts this morning tend to have a negative tone, emphasizing what they see as Bush's weakened political position. Also, with Bush traveling to Vietnam, several reports also see an analogy between the Vietnam and Iraq wars – one that may be overshadowing Bush's message. The New York Times (11/17, Sanger, 1.16M) runs a report titled "On To Vietnam, Bush Hears Echoes Of 1968 In Iraq 2006," in which it says that "until now, when asked what he had learned from Vietnam, Mr. Bush has almost reflexively reached for the same line: That he does not micromanage his generals, the way Mr. Johnson did. It is a response drawn from conservative orthodoxy about what went wrong in Vietnam, underlying an argument that had the generals been allowed to fight their way, the United States might have won." But "he may feel compelled to say more after he lands in Hanoi. Mr. Bush will find himself inside government halls adorned with paintings of Ho Chi Minh."

Likewise, the Washington Times (11/17, Curl, 88K) headlines its analysis of Bush's trip "Comparisons With Vietnam Shadow Bush Trip," reporting "the specter of the Vietnam War 30 years ago and comparisons to the US-led war in Iraq have followed him to the Pacific Rim." The Los Angeles Times (11/17, Gerstenzang, 850K) also says Bush "was shadowed by an issue that was politically difficult for him when he first ran for president, just as it was for [President] Clinton: the question of military service during the Vietnam War. And there was new attention to an issue that is politically painful for him in 2006: whether the Iraq war is turning into a new generation's equivalent of the torturous Vietnam conflict."

USA Today (11/17, Jackson, 2.27M) reports "Bush pressed familiar points in Asia on Thursday on trade and anti-terrorism policies, but Democrats are making it clear the political environment has changed back home." Bush told an audience in Singapore that "the United States wants to expand trade in Asia and work to restrict the spread of nuclear weapons, particularly from North Korea." But "in Washington, Democrats preparing to take charge of Congress next year challenged Bush over his approaches to free trade and North Korea, as well as the war in Iraq. 'The next few months will be a time of great transition here in Congress and hopefully in American foreign policy,' Rep. Tom Lantos, D-Calif., said." Lantos "will be the next chairman of the House International Relations Committee." He "called for sending an American envoy directly to North Korea to negotiate a halt to its nuclear weapons program."

The Wall Street Journal (11/17, Dreazen, 2.04M) says Bush's "Asia swing" is being "overshadowed by political troubles at home and diplomatic disputes abroad." In Singapore, "Bush fired back at newly empowered Democrats challenging his free-trade push." He "urged Asian countries to work with the US to rejuvenate a long-stalled round of global trade talks and endorsed the idea of a free-trade agreement with all 21 Pacific Rim members -- even as he felt compelled to rally support anew in his own government for such efforts. 'We hear voices calling for us to retreat from the world and close our doors to its opportunities, he told an audience at the National University of Singapore in his first major speech of the trip. " 'These are the old temptations of isolationism and protectionism, and 'America must reject them.'"

The Washington Post (11/17, A15, Fletcher, 690K) reports Bush yesterday "warned North Korea that the United States would consider it a 'grave threat' and would hold North Korea responsible if it transfers nuclear bomb technology to another country or to a terrorist organization." During a speech at the National University of Singapore, he urged

Pyongyang to take "concrete steps" to end its nuclear program, and he called on other Asian countries to send the same message. Meanwhile, in comments to reporters in Hanoi, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "said there was deep skepticism among the group's members that North Korea actually intended to abandon its nuclear weapons." Asked if she would favor delaying talks until she was certain North Korea would take steps to show its commitment, Rice said: "I don't think it makes sense for us to have talks unless we think that it's going to be fruitful." The AP (11/17, Hunt) called Bush's plea an attempt to "exert his authority on the world stage" after being "hurt by election losses back home."

The New York Times (11/17, Sanger, Cooper, 1.16M) reports Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, "speaking with reporters in Hanoi, said that the coming resumption of long-running six-way talks with North Korea over its nuclear program would be pointless without shows of good faith from both sides." The Times adds, "Together, the statements by Mr. Bush and Ms. Rice suggest how much the issue of North Korea's newly acquired nuclear-power status is likely to dominate the APEC meeting, which usually focuses on trade issues."

The Financial Times (11/17, Kazmin, Daniel), meanwhile, says "Vietnam's communist rulers will on Friday suppress their irritation at the US rejection of a trade bill and roll out a red carpet for…Bush. They are keen to deepen a relationship crucial to their country's future prosperity." But "the second US presidential visit since the end of the Vietnam war has spawned little of the public enthusiasm generated by Bill Clinton's ground-breaking trip six years ago."

Seoul Backs UN Resolution Condemning Pyongyang. The Financial Times (11/17, Fifield) reports South Korea Thursday "said it would vote in favor of a United Nations resolution condemning North Korea for its human rights record, an about-face from its traditional practice of avoiding antagonizing its neighbor." The Times says the "shift comes as Ban Ki-moon, the former foreign minister, prepares to take over the running of the UN, a move that has contributed to Seoul's realization that it cannot stay silent about what it sees as one of the world's worst human rights situations." Song Min-soon, the incoming foreign minister, said Pyongyang's "nuclear test and missile launches contributed to the change in position."

US Panel Seeks Broader Sanctions Against China. AFP (11/17, Parameswaran) reports that a "Congress-appointed panel sought broader sanctions against Chinese firms proliferating unconventional weapons and wanted Beijing to inspect ships plying to or from nuclear-armed North Korea's ports." The United States-China Economic and Security Review Commission "said in its annual report that current sanctions against Chinese companies that proliferate equipment and technology related to weapons of mass destruction should be 'broadened and harmonized for increased effectiveness.'"

White House Surprised By Vietnam Trade Bill "Stumble." The Wall Street Journal (11/17, Harwood, 2.04M) reports in its "Washington Wire" that its "Vietnam trade stumble catches White House by surprise. Red-faced Trade Representative Schwab, in Hanoi, is forced to parse congressional procedures after trade pact wins majority but falls short of two-thirds required under special parliamentary rules. 'Getting this through Congress was a huge deal' for Vietnam, an administration official says amid Bush's Asia trip." Textile lobbyist Augustine Tantillo "says misfire underscores spread of 'cold feet' among lawmakers about free trade. North Carolina Republican Rep. Robin Hayes, whose dead-heat re-election race remains undecided, chides party leaders for bringing up the measure so soon after the election."

More Commentary On US-Vietnam Ties. Author Aimee Phan writes in USA Today (11/17, 2.27M), "For many Vietnamese-Americans, a trial last week in Vietnam was their worst nightmare realized. Three Vietnamese-Americans were convicted on terrorism charges last Friday. Along with four Vietnamese nationals, they were found guilty of plotting to use radio equipment to call for a public insurgency against the Communist regime. The defendants were accused of having ties with the Government of Free Vietnam, which Hanoi regards as a terrorist organization. According to its website, the California-based pro-democracy group claims to advocate peaceful protest against the current regime." The case "gives the Bush administration an opportunity to leverage trade relations with Vietnam in exchange for improved human rights policies."

The Washington Post (11/17, 690K) editorializes, "The Vietnam deal…demonstrates the perversity of congressional obstructionism on trade. US negotiators have helped to secure access to Vietnam's markets as a condition for its joining the World Trade Organization. The negotiation is complete, and Vietnam will join the WTO irrespective of what Congress says." But "Congress does have the power to shoot itself in the foot: If it refuses to ratify the deal, other WTO members will enjoy the market access that Vietnam has promised while the United States is denied it. An attempt to pass enabling legislation failed in the House this week, and a second attempt was pushed into December." The Post goes on to criticize "a minority in Congress who represent vulnerable textile regions and a majority that is supportive but lethargic."

Putin Discusses Goals For APEC Summit. Russian President Vladimir Putin writes in the Washington Times (11/17, 88K) about Russia's role in Asia, noting that during this week's APEC summit in Hanoi "we are going to discuss a plan of action…towards building a system of free and open trade and investment in the region." At the same time, Putin noted that "one of its key goals" is "countering international terrorism," along with measures to "completely eradicate the social roots of terrorism -- poverty, hunger and chronic unemployment." As a major supplier of energy to world markets, he said Russia is also "open to cooperation," but remains "convinced that the terms should be beneficial for all partners." In conclusion, Putin said he would "like to emphasize that we are optimistic about APEC's future" and that Russia "intends to take a vigorous part in addressing future challenges together with other members."

Hoagland Urges White House To Reinforce Relations With Russia. Washington Post (11/17, A25, 690K) columnist Jim Hoagland writes, "For George W. Bush, meeting Vladimir Putin is no longer an uplifting opportunity to look into the Russian leader's eyes and glimpse a kindred soul. Their encounters have become exercises in damage limitation or unavoidable bits of scheduling during international conferences." Although he says it "is easy to understand why Bush has dropped his earlier enthusiasm for Putin," Hoagland notes that Washington and Moscow "have two looming opportunities to put political and trade relations on a sounder footing and make their relationship less vulnerable to personal ups and downs." At this month's NATO summit in Latvia, he says Bush "may be tempted to go back on a tentative compromise that Washington has struck with its European and Canadian allies concerning future alliance membership for Georgia and Ukraine." And the second is Congress' approval of a bilateral agreement reached with Russia on its application to join the World Trade Organization. Although Bush's "clearing vision of Putin's flaws and the American leader's candor with his peers are welcome developments," Hoagland cautions that they "make it even more important for the United States and Russia to seize opportunities that reinforce a relationship that cannot for long be dominated by personal ties."

Senate Backs Nuclear Deal With India. The New York Times (11/17, A10, Shanker, 1.16M) reports the Senate "gave overwhelming approval late Thursday to President Bush's deal for nuclear cooperation with India, a vote expressing that a goal of nurturing India as an ally outweighed concerns over the risks of spreading nuclear skills and bomb-making materials." The agreement "calls for the [US] to end a long moratorium on sales of nuclear fuel and reactor components. For its part, India would divide its reactor facilities into civilian and military nuclear programs, with civilian facilities open to international inspections." However, "Critics have been unwavering in arguing that the pact would rally nations like North Korea and Iran to press ahead with nuclear weapons programs despite international complaints and threats. Opponents of the measure also warned that the deal would allow India to build more bombs with its limited stockpile of radioactive material, and could spur a regional nuclear arms race with Pakistan and China." The AP (11/17, Klug) notes the vote was 85 to 12.

The Financial Times (11/17, Johnson, Bokhari, Luce) says the approval "came despite concerns that the deal would encourage India to expand its nuclear weapons arsenal and spur a regional arms race with nuclear rivals Pakistan and China. Washington is especially concerned that China's President Hu Jintao will give the green light to an ambitious expansion of Beijing's controversial nuclear co-operation with Pakistan during his visit to Islamabad next week." The Times also notes that the "delicacy of south Asia's nuclear balance was underscored on Thursday as Pakistan test-fired a nuclear capable medium-range missile, a day after peace talks with New Delhi." The Los Angeles Times (11/17, Chu, 850K) also reports "there are already signs that Beijing may retaliate," and notes : On Hu's expected announcement in Pakistan."

The Wall Street Journal (11/17, A8, Solomon, 2.04M) reports, "Despite the deal's easy passage through the Senate, congressional officials said a number of roadblocks still need to be cleared before the US can begin shipping nuclear fuels to the subcontinent." The House "passed a different version of the pact, and the two chambers need to try and reconcile the versions before they adjourn in December. And Washington still needs the Nuclear Suppliers Group, an international body that regulates the trade in nuclear fuels, to provide New Delhi with clearance. After that, the Bush administration and the International Atomic Energy Association still must reach an agreement with New Delhi over the inspection regime that's required in order for the transfer of nuclear fuels."

Meanwhile, the Washington Post (11/17, A14, Linzer, 690K) says advocates of the plan "see it as a way to cement ties with a rapidly modernizing, friendly democracy whose economic and military strength could one day rival China's." For its part, the Post notes that "although the effort has garnered little attention outside Washington, it has the potential to radically alter US foreign policy for decades. Bush administration officials say they believe it will accelerate India's rise as a regional counterweight to China and provide the United States with a new foothold in Asia." Undersecretary of State Burns welcomed the bipartisan support late yesterday and called the agreement "one of the most important foreign policy initiatives of the last several years."

European Nations To Present New Mideast Peace Initiative. The Financial Times (11/17, Burnett) reports Spain, France and Italy "plan to present a new Middle East peace initiative to their European partners at an EU summit in December," Spanish Prime Minister José Luis Rodríguez Zapatero said Thursday. Spain "hopes to gain the backing of Germany and Britain for the initiative, calling for an immediate ceasefire, the formation of an internationally recognized Palestinian unity government and a peace conference. French President Jacques Chirac said France would "act jointly" with Spain, Italy and other European countries to "try to initiate indispensable moral and political reforms in the Middle East."

Blair Says New Initiative Could Come "Within Weeks." In an interview with the Washington Post (11/17, A15, Sullivan, Jordan, 690K), British Prime Minister Tony Blair Thursday "offered hope for progress" on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, saying that "sensible Arab and Muslim countries" now see "strategic reasons" for finding a solution and that new initiatives could come "within weeks." Blair said "this is an opportunity for us if we are prepared to seize it now," citing leaders of Saudi Arabia, Egypt and Jordan as among those who "want to make progress" on an issue he called the "crux" of problems in the Middle East. Blair declined to provide specifics but said British officials were holding private talks with Middle Eastern governments as well as the Bush administration about measures "to move this forward." The Post notes that Blair is also planning a trip in the next few weeks to the Middle East, which he said was facing a "critical moment."

Olmert Says No Large Scale Gaza Offensive Planned. The New York Times (11/17, A12, Fisher, 1.16M) reports, "Despite calls from some Israelis for an invasion of Gaza after" a rocket attack killed a woman Wednesday, Prime Minister Ehud Olmert "signaled that he would respond with restraint." He told reporters on his flight home from the United States that "while Israel would continue targeted attacks, a large-scale assault would not necessarily solve the problem of the crude homemade Qassam rockets fired by Palestinian militants into Israel nearly every day." The Times notes that "this is a delicate time in negotiations among Palestinian leaders who are trying to form a unity government of professionals and technocrats," and Olmert's remarks "seemed to indicate that a new Israeli offensive would not add to the already-deep difficulties of striking a deal."

Palestinian Factions Build Up Arms As Tension Rises. In a front page article, the Washington Times (11/17, A1, Mitnick, 88K) reports that "an arms race by rival Palestinian militants has nearly doubled the price of guns in anticipation that fighting in the Gaza Strip between Hamas and Fatah militias will spread to the West Bank." The Times notes that "since Hamas took over the Palestinian Authority in March, tension between Hamas- and Fatah-affiliated militias has frequently exploded into street warfare," and "as the vacuum of lawlessness that has existed in the Palestinian territories for years grows even wider, rival security outfits as well as gunmen from mafia-like clans are moving to fill the gap."

US Hospital Ship Improved Public Opinion In Muslim Countries. The Washington Times (11/17, Bawa, 88K) reports that "public opinion polls conducted in two of the more populous Muslim countries showed that humanitarian aid from a US Navy hospital ship had healed more than health problems." The polls by the Washington group Terror Free Tomorrow showed that "when people were made aware of the mission, it left a positive perception of the United States." Responding to the polls' findings, undersecretary of state for public diplomacy, Karen Hughes, said humanitarian efforts "undermine ideological support for terror." Noting "a misunderstanding about America," Hughes noted, "People don't realize that the United States is the No. 1 donor of medicine and food to the Palestinian people."

Blair Urges US Take Lead On Climate Change. In an interview with the Washington Post (11/17, A15, Sullivan, Jordan, 690K), British Prime Minister Tony Blair Thursday "made an impassioned plea for the United States to lead the world on climate change, an issue that Blair has championed despite reluctance from the Bush White House." Blair said there is now "a big opportunity for the administration and for America on climate change," and urged the White House to "come up with a sensible plan and framework."

Rice Welcomes Agreement On Darfur Peacekeepers. The New York Times (11/17, Cooper, 1.16M) reports Secretary of State Rice said that "by agreeing in principle to allow a joint United Nations-African Union peacekeeping force into the war-stricken Darfur region," Sudanese President Omar Hassan al-Bashir "has a chance to rehabilitate its image in the rest of the world." Speaking to reporters in Hanoi, Rice "hailed the deal" struck in Addis Ababa by UN Secretary-General Kofi Annan and Bashir, saying, "I think it certainly is a real opportunity to resolve what is an extremely difficult problem, and to get back on a road where innocent people can be protected and the Sudanese government has a chance to make right with the international system."

Separately, the New York Times (11/17, A3, Worth, 1.16M) reports Sudan Thursday "agreed in principle" to allow a joint United Nations-African Union peacekeeping force into Darfur, "reversing its longstanding refusal to let United Nations troops in." The agreement "raised hopes for a more effective peacekeeping effort in Darfur." However, the Times cautions that it is "not clear how soon the new force can enter Darfur," because "two major issues must still be worked out before the agreement becomes final: the number of troops, and how the commander will be selected." The AP (11/17, Neuhaus) quotes Annan as saying a meeting "should take place in the next couple of weeks to resolve outstanding issues by the end of the year."

Sudan Shuts Out Outside World From Darfur. The Christian Science Monitor (11/17, Houreld, 59K) reports, "As outgoing UN chief Kofi Annan began a major push to stem the escalating crisis during high-level meetings in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, Thursday, the Sudanese government told top UN humanitarian official Jan Egeland that all his proposed destinations on a three-day trip to Darfur are too insecure to visit this weekend." Last week, the Norwegian Refugee Council "announced it was being forced out of Darfur after its permit to operate had been indefinitely suspended for the fifth time, making working conditions 'impossible.' Other foreign aid workers say they have been denied permission to reenter the country after leaving to attend a family emergency or to seek medical treatment." Even the African Union "monitoring force of nearly 7,000 soldiers is also frequently stymied in its investigative attempts. During the one-day talks in Ethiopia with UN, EU, and Arab League officials Thursday, Mr Annan pushed for a 'hybrid' force of AU and UN peacekeepers to be allowed into Darfur. But early indications were that Sudan would reject this."

Burmese Military Wipes Out Minority Villages To Build Security Gate. The Washington Post (11/17, A1, Faiola, 690K) reports, "According to estimates by relief groups, Burmese forces have burned down more than 200 civilian villages here in Karen state, destroyed crops and placed land mines along key jungle passages to prevent refugees from returning to their home villages." At least "20,000 civilians have been displaced over the past eight to 10 months," and "dozens of people have died," as "a consequence of Burma's largest military offensive against its own people in more than a decade, according to aid groups and Western diplomats." Observers say they are "attempting to build a broad security cordon around their new capital near the inland city of Pyinmana," and the Burmese have "already begun moving government offices there from Rangoon, the old capital, and are finishing work on a sprawling military bunker."

Royal Becomes French Socialists' Presidential Nominee. The AP (11/17, Charlton) reports, "Segolene Royal got a running start Thursday to her campaign to become France's first female president, decisively beating two rivals to wrap up the nomination for the main opposition Socialist Party in a single round of voting." The victory "spared" Royal a "second round against her two rivals from the party's old guard — Former Prime Minister Laurent Fabius and former Finance Minister Dominique Strauss-Kahn." In the final tally, Royal "had collected 60.62 percent of votes, while Strauss-Kahn won 20.83 percent and Fabius gained 18.54 percent," with "about 82 percent of the 219,000 party members eligible to vote cast ballots. Strauss-Kahn and Fabius both conceded their defeat.

The New York Times (11/17, Sciolino, 1.16M) also reports, "With most of the vote in," Royal, 53, "a regional president and former minister, won 60.6 percent of the vote of the party's nearly 219,000 members in an unusual primary." The victory "helped validate" Royal's standing as "the only candidate capable of beating the right's frontrunner, Nicolas Sarkozy, the Interior Minister who is seeking his UMP party's nomination for the 2007 presidential election." An Ipsos opinion poll released on Thursday found Royal and Sarkozy "statistically tied if they were to face off in a second round of voting, after other candidates had been eliminated." Her opponents "agree that her looks help," and "in poll after poll, her telegenic smile and elegant profile have appealed to a French public yearning for a new style of leadership."

The Wall Street Journal (11/17, Gauthier-Villars, 2.04M) reports that Stephane Le Foll, chief of staff for the Socialist Party's head secretary, "declined to give a percentage" by which Royal "was expected to win, but said some 75,300 votes had been counted out of a total 180,000 ballots cast." Her nomination "highlights France's deep desire for change after nearly twelve years of economic stagnation and sagging morale under the rule of current President Jacques Chirac." The ruling UMP party "is expected to choose its candidate early next year."

The Washington Post (11/17, A15, Anderson, 690K) reports, "Riding a wave of popular disgust with France's political status quo," Royal on Thursday "used an Internet-fueled, personality-driven campaign to capture the Socialist Party's nomination for president and boost her bid to become France's first female head of state." Le Monde newspaper "estimated that she captured about 61 percent of the vote in turning back challenges from Strauss-Kahn and Laurent Fabius, "who both garnered about 19 percent, Le Monde projected." Political analysts and opinion surveys suggest that Royal "will face a tough challenge uniting the left for the first round of the general election so that it does not splinter its vote and hand a victory to the hard right."

Immigration Increases In Ireland. The Washington Times (11/17, Healy, 88K) reports that after several centuries "that has seen Irish men and women emigrating around the world, taking their culture and legends with them, a decade of rapid economic growth has made the land of shamrocks a primary destination for hordes of immigrants, mainly from Eastern Europe." The Times notes, "Foreign nationals now account for 10 percent of the population, twice as many as just two years ago, forcing the government for the first time to begin drafting a formal immigration policy to deal with the influx. 'Over "80 percent of the new immigrants are under age 44, and almost half come from states that joined the European Union in 2004. Large numbers are employed in the retail, agriculture and construction sectors, helping to fuel one of the fastest-growing economies in Europe."

China's Thirst For Energy Seen As Undercutting Sanctions Against Myanmar. The New York Times (11/17, Perlez, 1.16M) reports that in the waters off Myanmar, "an Asian energy rush is on. Huge pockets of natural gas have been found. China and India are jostling to sign deals. Plans are afoot to spend billions on new ports and pipelines." Yet in towns onshore, "not a light is to be seen. ... People receive two hours of electricity a day from a military government that is among the world's most repressive. But attempts at outside pressure to prod the government to address its people's needs and curb abuses have faltered, in large part because China's thirst for resources has undermined nearly a decade of American economic sanctions." Critics say " On topic on President Bush's agenda for the APEC summit "will be how to keep up the pressure." But "[h]e is not likely to find cooperation, not from rivals like China and Russia, or even countries like Singapore and Indonesia, which trade freely with Myanmar." The "energy rush is the latest demonstration of how the hunt for oil and gas, and China's economic leverage, are reshaping international politics, often in ways that run counter to American preferences."

Friedman Urges China To Adopt Environmental Policies. Columnist Thomas Friedman writes in the New York Times (11/17, 1.16M) that regarding China's environment, "the same kind of bruising effort it took for Deng Xiaoping to move China from communism to capitalism will be required to move China from its polluting model of capitalism to a sustainable one." Moving China "to a new sustainable model will take more than ordinary leadership," and "a giant leader who by sheer force of will moves the whole system against all the entrenched habits and interests." It will take a "green Deng Xiaoping," otherwise, "every day here will feel like midnight at noon."

Congress Urged Not To Close Door On Free Trade In Andes. Columnist Mary Anastasia O'Grady writes in the Wall Street Journal (11/17, 2.04M), "Sometimes it seems that our elected representatives in Washington are not all that bright. Either that or they don't always act with the best interests of the American people in mind." Take the opposition in Congress "to the pending free trade agreements between the US and Peru and Colombia. The Bush administration has already signed the FTA with Peru and is expected to sign the Colombia FTA by the end of next week. But to be implemented, both pacts need to be ratified by the US Congress. Right now, with the Democratic leadership opposed and some Republicans unwilling to back the president, that looks doubtful." O'Grady concludes, "Colombia is not the only place where a Big Labor oligarchy has been known to call the shots for the rest of us. The Democratic-led Congress taking over in January is likely to experience a similar tyranny. That means that the only hope now for a step forward in US-Latin American trade relations lies with Republicans, who would be wise to pass these FTAs before they leave the majority in December."

NYTimes Says Kosovo "Limbos" Too Unstable. New York Times (11/17, 1.16M) editorializes, "For the past seven years, the tiny Balkan region of Kosovo has been in limbo," but "limbos are unstable." Belgrade will "always object to Kosovo's independence," and the "best chance of moderating its reaction is the promise of eventual membership in the European Union and a clear warning that Europe will be watching how it treats its new neighbor." The Kosovars "should be clear that donors and everyone else will be watching just as closely to see how they treat their own Kosovar Serbs."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Closing Arguments Made At 9/11 Investigation Perjury Retrial. The New York Times (11/17, Rivera, 1.16M) reports, "Lawyers gave closing arguments yesterday in the latest phase of a drawn-out legal battle involving a Jordanian immigrant accused of trying to mislead a grand jury investigating the Sept. 11 attacks. Prosecutors say the immigrant, Osama Awadallah, who is on trial for the second time in Federal District Court in Manhattan, lied repeatedly when he told a grand jury in October 2001 that he did not know Khalid al-Midhar, who took part in the attacks, and when he denied writing Mr. Midhar's name in a school notebook. … Mr. Awadallah's lawyer, Jesse Berman, countered by saying that his client never meant to give the grand jury wrong information, and did so only after enduring 20 days of incarceration that left him confused, frightened and paranoid." The Times notes, "Under questioning by the F.B.I., Mr. Awadallah said he knew" 9/11 hijacker Nawaf al-Hazmi, "who worked at the same gas station and worshiped at the same mosque. He also said he remembered an acquaintance of Mr. Hazmi and described him physically but said he had never learned his name. When shown a picture of Khalid al-Midhar, Mr. Awadallah claimed not to recognize him."

The AP (11/17, Caruso) reports, "In his closing argument at the retrial on Thursday, defense attorney Jesse Berman said Awadallah, who was 20 when he was arrested, was simply exhausted, confused and frightened during his grand jury testimony and didn't intend to mislead anyone. … He accused FBI agents and prosecutors of deliberately provoking and upsetting Awadallah, who was handcuffed to his chair. In the weeks leading up to his testimony, Awadallah was kept in solitary confinement and was subjected to strip searches. He also claimed to have been beaten by his jailers. … Assistant U.S. Attorney Karl Metzner told jurors there was no evidence Awadallah was confused, forgetful or disoriented by mistreatment. … 'He didn't make a mistake. He lied deliberately,' Metzner said."

Pentagon Plans Pricey Military Commissions Compound At Guantanamo. The Miami Herald (11/17, Rosenberg, 286K) reports the Pentagon "plans a Military Commissions compound at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, costing up to $125 million, a major undertaking meant to accommodate up to 1,200 people at the Navy base for the first U.S. war crimes trials since World War II." If Congress approves the funding, "it would be the largest single construction expenditure at Guantánamo since the Bush administration set up the offshore detention and interrogation center in January 2002. No Defense Department official would speak about the project with his or her name attached. But one Pentagon insider with knowledge of the plan said officials envision the fast-track construction of a major compound at an abandoned airfield that in the 1990s housed a tent camp for Cuban rafters."

Report Shows US Allowed No Witnesses For Gitmo Detainees. The AP (11/17, Ben Fox) reports, "The US military called no witnesses, withheld evidence from detainees and usually reached a decision within a day as it determined that hundreds of men detained at Guantanamo Bay were 'enemy combatants,' according to a new report." The analysis found "hearings that determined whether a prisoner should remain in custody gave the accused little opportunity to contest allegations against him."' They "provided an advance copy of the report to The Associated Press late Thursday and planned to release it Friday on the Internet." Their findings "based on an analysis of records of military hearings of 393 detainees, comes as the US government seeks to severely restrict detainee access to civilian courts, arguing that the Combatant Status Review Tribunals should be their main legal recourse."

Friend Of 9/11 Hijackers Convicted As "Accessory To Murder." The Washington Post/AP (11/17) reports a Moroccan man, Mounir Motassadeq has been "convicted of being an accessory to murder in the Sept. 11, 2001 … as a German appeals court ruled Thursday that evidence showed he knew that the plotters planned to hijack and crash planes." The AP adds, "The Federal Court of Justice found that a Hamburg court decided wrongly last year to acquit Motassadeq of direct involvement in the attacks, even as it convicted him of membership in a terrorist organization and sentenced him to seven years in prison."

The CBS Evening News (11/16, story 8, 0:15, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "The court said the Moroccan man acted as an accessory to murder in the attacks and played a direct role in the plot. He could get 15 years in prison."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Man Arrested At Detroit Airport With Information On Nukes, Cyanide. USA Today (11/17, Leinwand, 2.27M) reports, "Federal agents continue to investigate a Dallas man arrested at a Detroit airport Tuesday after arriving on a flight from Amsterdam with nearly $79,000 in cash and a laptop computer that, according to court papers, contained information about nuclear materials and cyanide." Sisayehiticha Dinssa, who will appear for a detention hearing Monday, "is charged with illegally concealing more than $10,000 in his luggage and with smuggling bulk cash into the USA. If convicted, Dinssa could be sentenced to five years in prison on each charge." ICE spokesman Greg Palmore said Thursday that agents had "no evidence to suggest Dinssa was involved in a terrorism plot," but added that they were seeking more information "to get clear about what this guy was up to." The AP (11/16) reported Dinssa, an unemployed US citizen from Dallas, "arrived in Detroit from Nigeria by way of Amsterdam and was headed for Phoenix," according to Assistant US Attorney Leonid Feller.

ABC News (11/17, Thomas, Ryan) reports, "Customs officers also discovered that Dinssa was in possession of a laptop computer for which he had no power source. During an initial look at the computer, 'Inspectors discovered some files that had been downloaded with information about cyanide and nuclear materials,' an affidavit from an ICE agent filed in the U.S. District Court in Detroit noted. … According to two senior U.S. government officials briefed on the matter, the files appear to be beyond what someone would normally download from the Internet. According to U.S. officials, Dinssa may have been researching the materials extensively. … Dinssa had claimed he was only carrying $18,000. It is undetermined if this is an alleged smuggling case or potentially something more sinister." ABC notes, "FBI agents and investigators from the U.S. Attorney's Office are expected to obtain a search warrant and examine the hard drive of the computer to determine the nature of the computer files. The Justice Department has asked that Dinssa be held in custody until he makes an appearance Monday in federal court for a detention hearing."

El-Masri To Be Granted US Visa, But May Still Be Denied Entry. The Washington Times/UPI (11/17, Waterman) reports, "A German Muslim whose detention and torture by the CIA prompted an apology from Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will be granted a visa to come to the United States, although he might still be refused entry. 'Khaled el-Masri was found inadmissible to the United States on the basis of ... terrorist activities, and issued a visa on the basis of a waiver from the Department of Homeland Security,' a State Department official told United Press International. The official declined to comment further," as did DHS spokesman Russ Knocke. "Under US law, a visa does not give a foreigner the right to enter the United States -- something that is granted at the port of entry by inspectors working for the Department of Homeland Security."

Information-Sharing Plan To Help Local Governments Handle Terror Alerts. The Washington Post (11/17, A10, DeYoung, 690K) reports, "A new plan to improve information-sharing about terrorism, signed by President Bush this week and delivered to Congress yesterday, establishes a Washington-based 'threat assessment group' that includes federal, state and local officials. It also aims to reduce more than 100 restrictive and confusing categories of 'sensitive' federal information to a half-dozen or fewer so local-level officials can better understand what they are told." Thomas E. McNamara, whose office, under Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte, wrote the plan, "expects the new Interagency Threat Assessment Coordination Group, based at the National Counterterrorism Center and headed by the Department of Homeland Security, to be operating by year's end."

Report Urges US To Consider New Chemical Weapons Destruction Technologies. The AP (11/16) reports the National Research Council, in a study requested by the Army, said technologies "used to destroy chemical weapons in Europe and Japan are faster than one in the U.S. and should be considered." The council said the "foreign systems are as safe and sometimes more environmentally friendly that those in use here."

Palestinian Acquitted Of Terror Charge Stripped Of US Citizenship. The AP (11/17) reports, "A former University of Arkansas graduate student from the Middle East lost his U.S. citizenship Thursday and was sentenced to 15 months in federal prison. Arwah Jaber, who was born in the West Bank, was previously acquitted of an aiding-terrorism charge but convicted of lesser offenses, including obtaining his citizenship fraudulently. … Prosecutors said he planned to join Palestinian Islamic Jihad, labeled by U.S. authorities as a terrorist organization." The AP notes, "Jaber said at his trial that he did not cite his Palestinian name, Orwah Houshia, in immigration papers — though he applied for credit cards using that name — because he had used Arwah Jaber on all his immigration papers up until then."

VaxGen Wins Anthrax Vaccine Testing Extension. The Washington Post (11/17, Merle, 690K) reports that the government has given more time to the California biotechnology firm VaxGen Inc. "to conduct human testing of its anthrax vaccine, postponing a decision on whether the program should be canceled." The FDA "threw the effort into doubt earlier this month after calling a halt to testing in response to questions about the drug's reliability. The decision put the company in potential violation of its contract with the Department of Health and Human Services, which required testing to begin Nov. 13." The Post adds, "VaxGen said HHS has decided to extend the company's deadline for resolving the issue until Dec. 18. At stake is a contract potentially worth $1 billion."

WAR NEWS:

Four Americans Kidnapped In Iraq. ABC World News (11/16, story 4, 1:30, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "A senior military official has told ABC News of another mass kidnapping in that country, as another convoy of contractors was taken hostage today. It happened near the city of Nasiriyah. 19 trucks were captured. And there are many people missing, four of them believed to be Americans." ABC (Karl) added, "Defense officials tell ABC News, that coalition forces have mobilized to try to find those four missing Americans. This incident happened today…near the Kuwaiti border. It involved a Kuwait-based company called Crescent Security Group." The CBS Evening News (11/16, story 7, Couric, 7.66M) also reported "four Americans who work in Iraq for private companies are missing." NBC Nightly News (11/16, story 5, 0:25, Williams, 9.87M) said "Pentagon and military officials are telling NBC News as many as 14 people, including four American contractors, have been kidnapped."

The AP (11/17, Mroue) reports "an official familiar with the incident said preliminary reports being checked by the military indicated that the attack occurred at a checkpoint near Nasiriyah and that four Americans were believed to have been taken captive." The official, "who requested anonymity because of the security situation in Iraq," said "it appears that some of the convoy drivers had been released, and were being interviewed by the military. He said initial reports suggest that the attack occurred at a checkpoint in a location where normally there is no blockade."

Five More US Soldiers Killed. Meanwhile, the Los Angeles Times (11/17, Roug, 850K) reports, "Five more American soldiers have been killed in Iraq, the US military said, and gunmen, rockets and roadside bombs killed at least 17 Iraqis and wounded 25 others Thursday. … At least 2,864 U.S. troops have died in Iraq since the 2003 American-led invasion, according to icasualties.org."

Intelligence Officials Say Violence In Iraq Is Increasingly Complicated. The Washington Post (11/17, A19, Pincus, 690K) reports attacks "in Iraq reached a high of approximately 180 a day last month, reflecting an increasingly complicated conflict that includes sectarian clashes of Sunni and Shiite militias on top of continuing strikes by insurgents, criminal gangs and al-Qaeda terrorists, according to the directors of the CIA and the Defense Intelligence Agency." CIA Director Gen. Michael V. Hayden said, "No single narrative is sufficient to explain all the violence we see in Iraq today." The Post adds, "Attempting to describe the enemy, Lt. Gen. Michael D. Maples, the DIA director, listed 'Iraqi nationalists, ex-Baathists, former military, angry Sunni, Jihadists, foreign fighters and al-Qaeda,' who create an 'overlapping, complex and multi-polar Sunni insurgent and terrorist environment.' He added that 'Shia militias and Shia militants, some Kurdish pesh merga, and extensive criminal activity further contribute to violence, instability and insecurity.'" In "unusually harsh terms, the two intelligence directors spelled out how quickly the violence in Iraq has escalated this year, from about 70 attacks a day in January to about 100 a day in May and then to last month's figure."

Iraqi Government Issues Warrant For Prominent Sunni Cleric. The Los Angeles Times (11/17, Roug, Daragahi, 850K) reports, "Iraq's Shiite-led government issued an arrest warrant Thursday for the country's leading Sunni Arab cleric, accusing him of colluding with insurgents, a potentially explosive charge that could exacerbate tensions between the country's warring sectarian groups and further divide a fragile national government." The move against "Harith Dhari, the head of the Muslim Scholars Association, comes two days after an audacious daytime kidnapping in Baghdad ruptured the government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, setting Sunni politicians against Shiites." The Times adds, "Dhari has been a vocal, sometimes sarcastic, critic of the government, questioning the legitimacy of Saddam Hussein's criminal trials, and ridiculing the government's reconciliation efforts." The warrant "virtually is certain to rekindle threats of a boycott of the government by Sunni Arab politicians." The Washington Times (11/17, Mroue, 88K) notes Mohammed Bashar al-Faidi, spokesman for the Sunni Association of Muslim Scholars, "condemned the warrant for Mr. al-Dhari's arrest. 'This government should resign before the Iraqi people force it to resign,' Mr. al-Faidi said from Jordan. 'The association calls on its people to be calm.'"

The Washington Post (11/17, A16, Raghavan, 690K) reports "the move came as cracks emerged within Iraq's six-month-old unity government over the numbers of government employees taken in a mass kidnapping on Tuesday and whether some were tortured and killed."

Administration To Request Up To $160 Billion For Iraq, Afghanistan Wars. USA Today (11/17, Wolf, 2.27M) reports the Bush Administration is "preparing its largest spending request yet for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, a proposal that could make the conflict the most expensive since World War II." The Pentagon is "considering $127 billion to $160 billion in requests from the armed services for the 2007 fiscal year, which began last month, several lawmakers and congressional staff members said. That's on top of $70 billion already approved for 2007." Since 2001, Congress "has approved $502 billion for the war on terror, roughly two-thirds for Iraq. The latest request, due to reach the incoming Democratic-controlled Congress next spring, would make the war on terror more expensive than the Vietnam War." The new request "being considered for the war on terror would be about one-fourth what the government spends annually on Social Security — and 10 times what it spends on its space program."

Democrats Raise Possibility Of Cutting Iraq Funds. Rep. Jim Moran said on PBS' NewsHour (11/16, Warner), "The irony is that now Jack Murtha is chairman of the Defense Appropriations Committee. That is the one committee that can at least change the course in Iraq. … So the irony here is that Jack is in an even more pivotal position to achieve his objective vis-a-vis Iraq."

Rep. Dennis Kucinich said on Fox News' Your World (11/16, Cavuto), "I have to talk to a lot of my Democratic colleagues to convince them that the wisest course is to stop the funding. It's inevitable that we're going to get out of Iraq. I mean, we're going to leave. Sooner or later, the funds are going to be cut off. So why don't we do it now? Why don't we do it now before more deaths, before we waste the taxpayers' dollars? … There will be enough money to bring the troops home. … The American people asked for a new direction. And part of that new direction should be out."

Kennedy Calls For National Intelligence Estimate On Iraq. Sen. Ted Kennedy said on MSNBC (11/16, O'Donnell), "Gen. Abizaid indicated to the Armed Services Committee that the conditions with regard to sectarian violence were getting much better over in Baghdad and generally in Iraq. Then, in the afternoon, we had Gen. Maples, who represents the Defense Intelligence Agency, who said there is continued deterioration, the rise of sectarian violence. So we have a division with their presentation to the Armed Services Committee. What is necessary is for the intelligence agencies to get together with a National Intelligence Estimate. … That has not been done in two years. It's basically inexcusable that it hasn't been done."

No Agreement On Turning Over Security To Iraq. The Christian Science Monitor (11/17, Grier, 59K) reports "there is near agreement" in Congress "on at least one aspect of Iraq policy: the Iraqis themselves need to shoulder more of the burden of stabilizing their country. But this consensus breaks down over the obvious follow-up question. How?" Many Democrats, "newly emboldened by their election victories, favor an approach that might be labeled 'tough love.' It goes something like this: If the US plans a phased pullout of troops within four to six months, the Iraqi government will face up to what has to be done." But the White House – "and the top generals of the US military - favor a strategy that they consider more nurturing. The US needs to intensify efforts to train the Iraqi armed forces to fight for themselves, according to Gen. John Abizaid, US commander in the Middle East. A scheduled US pullout might simply cause Iraq's sectarian factions to prepare for chaos to come." The "gap between these approaches suggests that despite the recent shift in US politics, in Washington there are heated debates over Iraq yet to come."

House Republican Whip Roy Blunt said on MSNBC's Hardball (11/16, Matthews), "I think we are interested in what happens now with the new secretary of defense. I think many of our members, including me, think that if that decision would have been made earlier, it would have given our members a little more ability out there to talk about the fact that everything is under review. We have got to constantly be looking at the goals we set, whether we're meeting them or not, if they're still achievable, and what the Iraqis are doing to do their part."

Military Experts Said To Oppose McCain Plan To Boost Troop Levels. The Washington Post (11/17, A17, White, 690K) reports the "debate about how to proceed in Iraq, which in the past few months has focused on withdrawing U.S. troops, now includes serious discussion about adding more forces to the fight." Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) "repeatedly suggested this week that the United States needs thousands more troops in Iraq, and members of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group have discussed similar ideas as they prepare a much-anticipated policy recommendation. Members of Congress raised the concept on Wednesday in hearings with the region's top U.S. military commander." In a speech "last night to Republicans, McCain, who is considering a presidential bid in 2008, reiterated his desire for more troops to solve a 'dire' situation." But military officials "and defense experts, however, said yesterday that significantly escalating the number of U.S. combat troops in Iraq is largely implausible because it would severely strain the military, would be unsustainable for more than a few months and would offer no discernable long-term benefit." Military officials "and experts said yesterday that they think such a plan could work only temporarily because the Army and Marine Corps are stretched thin by ongoing conflicts. They said a large number of troops sent into Iraq would be hard to sustain over time without dipping significantly into the National Guard and reserves."

Deployments, Lack Of Funding Said To Be Wearing Down Armed Forces. In a McClatchy op-ed (11/17), Joseph Galloway says, "It's past time to start repairing the damage the Bush administration's way of war has done to our Army and our Marine Corps." Doing so "will take many years and many billions of dollars." The Army, "and its National Guard and Reserve, have been worn down - some would say worn out - by the endless deployments of troops on one-year combat tours to Iraq and Afghanistan. Many professional soldiers and their families are now enduring their second or third trips to Iraq, certain that a fourth or fifth awaits them if they continue to serve." Their equipment, "from Abrams tanks to Bradley fighting vehicles to Stryker armored cars to Humvees and helicopters, is wearing out even faster than the soldiers are. The money to repair and rebuild those vehicles - Army Chief Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker says he needs $17 billion for that right now - hasn't been forthcoming from this administration and the outgoing Congress." Army officials "say they're a total of some $25 billion short of what they need to sustain the current levels of operations."

"Coalition Of The Willing" Continues To Shrink. The Washington Times (11/17, Sands, 88K) reports Iraq's "coalition of the willing is becoming an increasingly exclusive club." The "coalition of foreign countries willing to deploy their forces in Iraq has shrunk steadily -- and soon could shrink even more. Twenty-three countries remain in the U.S.-led coalition and the United Nations' mission serving in and around Iraq, down from a high of 42 that joined the United States in the invasion or the postwar occupation of Iraq. More than half of those contributors have fewer than 150 troops, engineers or military trainers in the Iraq theater." Like President Bush, "many leaders of the contributing countries are resisting intense domestic political pressures to bring the troops home, especially as the casualty levels rise and the problems of the embattled Iraqi government mount."

Baker Thought To Be Seeking Political Consensus On Iraq Alternatives. McClatchy (11/17, Strobel) reports when James Baker "became President George H.W. Bush's secretary of state in 1989, one of the first things he did was cut a bipartisan deal to end years of poisonous wrangling over U.S. policy in Central America - an issue as divisive then as Iraq is today." Now, Baker "faces a similar - but tougher - challenge as he and retired congressman Lee Hamilton co-chair a committee that's increasingly seen as the last, best hope for finding a respectable exit from Iraq." Baker is "proceeding much as he did when he negotiated over Nicaragua and El Salvador in the '80s, according to individuals close to him and the panel, known as the Iraq Study Group." Baker saw the "disputes over Central America policy as 'first and foremost a domestic political issue,' he wrote in his 1995 memoir, 'The Politics of Diplomacy.' If the politics couldn't be defused, 'any hopes for a diplomatic solution, much less achieving a bipartisan foreign policy, were doomed.'" McClatchy adds the ISG is "widely portrayed as seeking new solutions to halt Iraq's slide into civil war and extricate the 141,000 U.S. troops there." But there "may not be any good solutions, and Baker's real goal is to forge a bipartisan consensus at all costs, the people close to him and the group say."

Few Alternatives Seen In Iraq Policy. The AP (11/17, Flaherty) reports that as President Bush, Congress and the ISG "seek new approaches for the unpopular war, warnings from the top American commander in the Middle East make clear there is no simple answer." At the "end of the day, military deployments will be up to President Bush, who has staunchly defended his handling of the war." Bush said he "is open to fresh approaches. With pressure on him to find a different path, the only thing most experts agree on is that each idea presents considerable risk." The problem, Abizaid "conceded, is the Baghdad government, which he said is only beginning to understand that it must support the Iraqi Army and not the Shiite militias engaged in near civil war against Sunni fighters." Abizaid told the House Armed Services Committee "about putting his faith in the Iraqi government and its forces, 'Well, maybe it's a dumb bet. But I don't think so.'" The AP adds, "If that seemed a halfhearted endorsement of his own strategy, his description of other alternatives was even more glum." Abizaid "swatted down a suggestion being pushed by many congressional Democrats, including Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., to begin decreasing U.S. troop levels because it could cause instability. Democrats are expected to support that plan when they take over control of Congress next year." Abizaid also "said a proposal by Sens. John McCain, R-Ariz., and Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., to bolster the 141,000 U.S. troops already there could not be sustained because the American military is stretched too thin already. He said troop increases would also erode the effort to force Iraqis to take on more responsibility."

Lack Of Iraqi National Consciousness Said To Be Root Of Failed Maliki Government. In his Washington Post column (11/17, A25), Charles Krauthammer says, "Iraq's first truly democratic government turned out to be hopelessly feeble and fractured, little more than a collection of ministries handed over to various parties, militias and strongmen. The problem is not, as we endlessly argue about, the number of American troops. Or of Iraqi troops. The problem is the allegiance of the Iraqi troops. Some serve the abstraction called Iraq. But many swear fealty to political parties, religious sects or militia leaders." At this "earliest stage of democratic development, Iraqi national consciousness is as yet too weak and the culture of compromise too undeveloped to produce an effective government enjoying broad allegiance." The Maliki government "is a failure. It is beholden to a coalition dominated by two Shiite religious parties, each armed and ambitious, at odds with each other and with the ultimate aim of a stable, modern, democratic regime. Is this America's fault? No. It is a result of Iraq's first democratic election." It was "never certain whether the long-oppressed Shiites would have enough sense of nation and sense of compromise to govern rather than rule. The answer is now clear: United in a dominating coalition, they do not."

Rumsfeld Tells American Spectator Dinner US Should Not Abandon Iraq. The Washington Times' "Inside the Beltway" column (11/17, McCaslin) reports, "The American Spectator's 2006 Robert L. Bartley dinner on Wednesday was 'off-the-record,' but we can tell you that outgoing Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld's keynote address made clear that the United States should not abandon Iraq anytime soon. Subsequent remarks from Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, which were filled with praise for Mr. Rumsfeld and the U.S. military (several injured Iraq war veterans were in the packed audience at the Mandarin Oriental hotel), echoed the secretary's sentiments."

Aides Likely To Follow Rumsfeld's Departure From Pentagon. The Washington Post (11/17, A23, Kamen, 690K) reports in its "In the Loop" column that Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld's "firing is sure to spark the departure of many of his top aides. One assistant secretary, Peter Rodman, has already moved back to the Brookings Institution -- but that was long planned, we're told." Several others "are on the endangered species list. Stephen Cambone, the undersecretary for intelligence, is surely gone. His deputy, Lt. Gen. Gerald Boykin-- famed for his memorable remark that 'my God was bigger than his' and other sage observations -- won't be far behind." Others on "the various DOD departure lists include acquisitions chief Kenneth Krieg; comptroller Tina Jonas; assistant secretary Thomas W. O'Connell, who runs Special Operations and Low-Intensity Conflict; and top Rumsfeld aide Robert Rangel, though Rangel is highly regarded in the building and among some House folks." Reporters will "be watching to see if spokesman Dorrance Smith, who just beefed up his public affairs staff with a 'rapid response' team to correct media lies, mischaracterizations and inaccuracies, hangs on."

Rumsfeld Website's Math Criticized. The Washington Post (11/17, A23, Kamen, 690K) also reports in its "In the Loop" column, "Seemed Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld had barely left his Oval Office firing ceremony when the Pentagon Web site popped up with a new feature titled 'Six Years of Accomplishments' with Rummy. First and foremost were his accomplishments in the 'war on terror,' where overall, military efforts 'liberated 50 million people in Afghanistan and Iraq.' More specifically, they've 'liberated 31 million Afghans from Taliban control and destroyed Al-Qaeda sanctuary.' And they've 'liberated 27 million Iraqis from a brutal dictatorship and turned over sovereignty of the country to an Iraqi government.'" The Post adds, "Math, apparently, is not a strong point. Somewhere it seems they lost -- or gained -- 8 million people."

About 2,200 Marines Heading To Anbar Province. The AP (11/17, Burns) reports that roughly 2,200 Marines are heading "from their ships in the Persian Gulf to an undisclosed location in Iraq's western Anbar province to help shore up US combat power in an area riddled with insurgent violence." The move is an indication "of the severity of the conflict in Anbar. The insurgency is entrenched and well-organized in a province where US soldiers and Marines are being killed almost daily." The AP adds, "The move was disclosed on Wednesday by Gen. John Abizaid during testimony to the Senate Armed Services Committee." Abizaid "approved the deployment 'to help address' concerns expressed by Maj. Gen. Richard Zilmer, who commands all US forces in Anbar."

Contractor Employees Claim Boss Shot At Iraqi Civilians. The New York Times (11/17, Chivers, 1.16M) reports that two former employees of the American private military contracting company Triple Canopy "have claimed in a Virginia court that they witnessed their supervisor deliberately shoot at Iraqi vehicles and civilians this summer, and that the company fired them for reporting the incidents." They say the company "retaliated against the men for reporting that the supervisor had committed violent felonies, and perhaps murder, on the job." The lawsuit also claims the men have been blacklisted in "the private military contracting industry, rendering them unemployable in the lucrative trade of providing private security in Iraq." The suit was filed in late July, and on Thursday, "the court set a trial date for next summer."

The Washington Post (11/17, A20, Jackman, 690K) says, "Triple Canopy was the ninth-largest contractor for the US State Department in fiscal 2005, with payments totaling more than $90 million, government records show. Former Army Ranger Shane Schmidt, former Marine Charles L. Sheppard III and their shift leader "were all working on an assignment for KBR when the shootings occurred near Baghdad on July 8, alleges the suit, filed in Fairfax County Circuit Court." The lawsuit "alleges wrongful termination and wrongful interference with their professional future."

Sunnis Seek Refuge In Fallujah. The AP (11/17, Hurst) reports that while security is tight and Fallujah "has become a refuge from the death squads and mortar battles in Baghdad," US Marines say about 150 Iraqis flee here each week from the capital, 40 miles to the east." Fallujah's population is "overwhelmingly Sunni Arab," and as a result,

Fallujah "has not experienced the raging sectarian warfare that has the capital teetering on the brink of civil war." The migration is "part of a larger exodus out of Baghdad, where entire neighborhoods have been uprooted."

Administration Downplays Usefulness Of Iran, Syria Talks. The Wall Street Journal (11/17, Harwood, 2.04M) reports in its "Washington Wire" that the Administration "downplays usefulness of talking to Iran and Syria about Iraq. Although Baker-Hamilton group, top Democrats and Britain's Blair recommend talks, Secretary of State Rice insists Iran or Syria would demand concessions and couldn't cure Iraq's rising sectarian violence."

Soldier Sentenced To 90 Years For Rape, Murder Of Iraqi Girl. The Washington Post (11/17, A18, White, 690K) reports, "An Army specialist who admitted that he and a group of other U.S. soldiers raped a 14-year-old girl and killed her and her family in an Iraqi village was sentenced to 90 years in prison yesterday, by far the longest sentence for a U.S. soldier in connection with the death of an Iraqi civilian since the war began in 2003." Spec. James P. Barker, 23, "could be eligible for parole in 20 years, as part of a plea agreement with prosecutors that spares him the possibility of a death sentence. Barker has indicated he will testify against other soldiers in the case, some of whom face the death penalty."

US Airstrikes In Afghanistan Increase. The New York Times (11/17, Cloud, 1.16M) reports that the Air Force has conducted "over 2,000 air strikes in Afghanistan over the past six months, a sharp increase in bombing that reflects the growing demand for American air cover since NATO has assumed a larger ground combat role, Air Force officials said." The "intensifying campaign has focused on southern Afghanistan, where NATO units, primarily from Britain, Canada and the Netherlands, as well as American Special Forces have been engaging in the heaviest and most frequent ground combat with Taliban rebels since the invasion five years ago." The NATO forces are "mostly operating without heavy armor or artillery support, and as Taliban resistance has continued, more air support has been used to compensate for the lightness of the units."

Army Retooling To Fight Insurgencies. McClatchy (11/17, Brown) reports the United States Army Combined Arms Center "has retooled the Army's leadership and training programs to focus on what motivates insurgents, the strategies and tactics they use and the cultures in which they operate." The shift "away from major combat operations to irregular warfare is one of the most significant changes in doctrine and training the Army has undertaken since World War II." Irregular "war and stability operations were considered lesser tasks that required little preparation or practice. Large-scale war remained the Army's focus even after the invasion of Iraq in 2003. Since then, however, that focus has changed as it's become clear that Iraq and Afghanistan are part of a long guerrilla struggle that could last decades."

DOJ:

Gonzales To Address Air Force Academy Saturday. The Rocky Mountain News (11/16) reports, "U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales will speak to about 700 cadets at the Air Force Academy on Saturday. … His talk will include upholding civil liberties and the war on terrorism."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

DOJ To Ease Thompson Memo Rules On Corporate Fraud. Bloomberg (11/17, Schmidt) reports, "The U.S. Justice Department plans to make it harder for prosecutors to force companies to waive their legal rights in plea negotiations to avoid indictment, people familiar with the plan said." Bloomberg continues, "The proposed changes address concerns that companies are being asked unfairly to reveal confidential talks with their lawyers and cut off legal support for employees under investigation, the people said. Businesses, lawmakers and federal judges have complained that the department rules adopted in the wake of corporate accounting scandals in 2001 and 2002 erode the rights of companies and employees. … 'This is a policy issue that needs to be addressed and there has been a lot of criticism from a lot of different directions,' said former Justice Department official George Terwilliger, a partner at the White & Case law firm in Washington. 'There is also a recognition that we need to be careful how we tinker with the engine of commerce.'" Bloomberg adds, "Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty is likely to announce the revised policy in a speech early next month, the people said. They stressed that the changes won't be dramatic and are still being debated within the department. … McNulty, who also heads President George W. Bush's corporate fraud task force, hasn't signed off on the proposed changes, the people said. He was traveling and unavailable for comment. … 'We want to get it right,' McNulty told a Senate Judiciary Committee hearing in September. 'We don't want to do something that is inappropriate or unreasonable.' … Brian Roehrkasse, a Justice Department spokesman, said the rules are under review and any changes would be in accord with 'safeguarding the integrity of our financial institutions' and 'the public interest.' … The policy in question -- originally outlined in a 2003 memo by then-Deputy Attorney General Larry

Thompson -- offers leniency to companies that cooperate with prosecutors. It suggests that companies can benefit by waiving attorney-client privilege and by not paying the legal bills of 'culpable employees.'"

Lay's Death Prompts Senate Bill To End Practice Of Vacating Convictions. The Wall Street Journal (11/17, Burns) reports, "The death of former Enron Corp. chief executive Kenneth Lay prompted Senate lawmakers to introduce legislation Thursday that would end the practice of dismissing convictions of defendants who die before an appeal is final. The bill by Senate Judiciary Committee members Dianne Feinstein, a Democrat from California, and Jeff Sessions, a Republican from Alabama, was written with help from the Justice Department, which had sought changes after Mr. Lay's death on July 5. Mr. Lay died just weeks after being convicted on criminal charges including securities and bank fraud; a federal district court judge in Houston dismissed the convictions in October. Under current U.S. law, criminal convictions are tossed out when defendants such as Mr. Lay die before they exhaust their right to an appeal." Sessions "noted that Mr. Lay's trial took months and cost taxpayers millions. In such cases, he said 'it is wrong to force the victims or the government to start over from scratch.'" The two senators "said the Justice Department supports the 'principles' contained in the bill. … As written, the bill would end the practice of vacating convictions in such cases and establish new procedures that would allow some cases to continue."

The Houston Chronicle (11/17) reports, "In the wake of a federal judge's decision vacating the late Ken Lay's fraud and conspiracy convictions, two senators introduced a bill today to allow victims to seek restitution when a defendant convicted of a crime dies before his appeals have been completed. … The same day the Justice Department filed notice it will appeal U.S. District Judge Sim Lake's decision to clear Lay's name 'in light of pending legislation.'" The Chronicle continues, "Last month, Lake wiped out the one-time Enron Corp. chairman's convictions because Lay died before the appeals process had been completed. … In reaching that decision, Lake was following a precedent set in the New Orleans-based 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals — the same court that will hear the government's challenge." The Chronicle adds, "The 5th Circuit is unlikely to side with the Justice Department because that court set the precedent Lake followed, said Brian Wice, a Houston attorney who specializes in appeals issues. But the government needs to appeal to that court before it can appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court, he said. … Earlier this month, a three-judge 5th Circuit panel already refused to order Lake to reverse his decision. The panel reiterated Lake's position that legal precedent says that 'when a defendant who has been found guilty of a federal crime dies before exhaustion of his appeal, his prosecution must be abated, his conviction vacated and his indictment dismissed.' … The ruling responded to an appeal of Lake's decision by an Enron shareholder."

The AP (11/17, Ben Evans) reports, "Republican Sen. Jeff Sessions is joining a California Democrat to try to scrap the legal precedent that allowed Enron founder Kenneth Lay's fraud conviction to be cleared from his record after he died in July." The AP continues, "The clearing of Lay's record has hurt prosecutors' efforts to extract $43.5 million in restitution from Lay's estate. Sessions' legislation is an attempt to address that. … Working with the Justice Department, which asked for similar legislation shortly after Lay died, Sessions of Mobile joined Democrat Dianne Feinstein of California to introduce a bill this week that would keep federal convictions in force when a defendant dies, while allowing victims to continue seeking restitution." The Chronicle adds, "Courts traditionally have interpreted the law differently, erasing the convictions of defendants who die before having the chance to appeal. … The bill would make the changes retroactive to July 1 so that they would apply in the Lay case. … 'When a criminal conviction involves financial restitution to the victims of the crime, or when the conviction could be used in a later civil lawsuit, those effects of the conviction should not be erased by the death of the defendant,' Sessions, a former U.S. attorney, said in a release. 'It is wrong to force the victims or the government to start over from scratch.'"

Skilling Settles Enron Employees' Pension Dispute. The Houston Chronicle (11/17) reports, "Former Enron CEO Jeff Skilling has settled the last dispute in litigation by former Enron employees seeking to recover at least some of their pensions that disappeared when the company crashed." The Chronicle continues, "The ex-CEO, who is slated to begin serving more than 24 years in prison next month, has withdrawn his opposition to an $85 million settlement that plaintiffs reached with former company directors and other executives two years ago. … In exchange, plaintiffs resolved claims against Skilling — the last named defendant who hadn't settled — effectively bringing the litigation to a close. … 'Yes, it's over. Our clients are thrilled,' said Lynn Sarko, an attorney who represents ex-Enron employees, today. 'While they are grateful that some of their retirement money was recovered, it will never make up for the destruction of their retirement nest egg.'" The Chronicle adds, "The lawsuit, which recovered about $265 million in settlements — including the $85 million held up by a Skilling appeal — was filed on behalf of more than 20,000 employees after Enron went bankrupt in December 2001. The Labor Department later filed similar litigation, which was folded into the main lawsuit. … The $85 million settlement is derived from insurance money that covered Enron directors and other executives who served on the company's administrative committee. They, as well as Skilling, were named as defendants in the litigation."

Study Examines Stock Options Manipulation. The New York Times (11/17, Dash) reports, "Abuses of stock option grants are perceived to have spread like a virus among high-technology companies. But a new study suggests that hundreds of old-economy companies may also have caught the backdating bug." The Times continues, "In a paper to be released today, researchers estimate that 590 nontechnology companies appear to have manipulated options so their chief executives received them at the lowest price of the month. That compares with 130 technology companies that appear to have backdated their chief executives' options to a monthly low during a 10-year period to the end of 2005." The Times adds, "Traditional manufacturing and service firms make up the bulk of publicly traded companies, so it comes as no surprise that the sheer number of manipulated grants outside the technology sector is larger. … Yet old-economy companies also appear to have made improper grants somewhat less frequently than their new-economy peers, making patterns more difficult to find. That combination, the researchers suggest, has allowed old-line companies to escape much of the scrutiny." The Times notes, "The study is the latest in a series of papers by academic and governance research groups that attempt to measure the extent of the backdating scandal and to explain how it spread. More than 120 companies are under investigation by the Securities and Exchange Commission. The Justice Department and Internal Revenue Service are conducting separate reviews. More than 50 executives and directors have been forced out or fired as a result."

The Wall Street Journal (11/17, A2, Hechinger) reports, "About 850 U.S. chief executives received backdated or otherwise manipulated stock option grants that boosted their annual pay, on average, by at least 10%, according to a new study." The Journal continues, "The study, released yesterday by professors at Harvard and Cornell universities and the French business school Insead, bolsters the view of federal prosecutors who have viewed stock-option backdating as means to steal money from shareholders. Defenders of the companies who engaged in the practice have said that backdating often involved minor sums and was merely an alternative way of providing market-based pay." The Journal adds, "More than 130 companies are under federal investigation in the stock option timing scandal, which has claimed the jobs of more than 50 executives and directors. Five former executives face criminal charges."

The Financial Times (11/17, Guerrera, Masters) reports, "The research by three academics is the first to suggest a link between lax internal controls and stock options backdating. The scandal has so far engulfed more than 130 US companies in internal and regulatory probes but the study suggests that number could climb to 720. … The research also found that, contrary to a widespread perception, 'old economy' companies used the practice almost as much as rivals in 'new economy' sectors – a feature underlined by one of the most recent casualties of the scandal, Bruce Karatz, the ousted chief executive of the housebuilder KB Home. … The results of the study, which looked at options granted by 8,000 companies between 1996 and 2005, will undermine claims by some companies and lawyers that backdating was a widespread and legitimate way of rewarding chief executives."

Comverse CEO Tries To Put Down Roots In Namibia While Fighting Extradition To US. The Wall Street Journal (11/17, A1, Stecklow) reports from Windhoek, Namibia, "Wolfgang Balzer, general manager of the Hotel Thule, now realizes there was something unusual about the Israeli family who checked in this summer for a month, identifying themselves as the Jacobs. … Saying they were planning on settling here, they didn't use credit cards and paid their bill in advance. The husband, who usually kept to himself, became extremely agitated when CNN wasn't available for a few days on their television. … 'I personally thought he was a lawyer or something and he was going to work here,' the hotel manager says. He learned otherwise in late September." The Journal continues, "That's when it emerged that the husband was Jacob 'Kobi' Alexander, a fugitive wanted in the U.S. on fraud charges related to stock-options backdating. The former chief executive of Comverse Technology Inc., a New York software company, had skipped out on the chance to begin talks with U.S. prosecutors that his own New York lawyers had initiated, according to a person familiar with the discussions. … He was arrested at U.S. prosecutors' request on Sept. 27 during lunch with his wife at a country club, even though Namibia has no extradition treaty with the U.S. A Namibian bank regulator had noticed large transfers to Mr. Alexander's local account and tipped off U.S. authorities. Mr. Alexander already had received a two-year work permit under his own name, even though he used an alias at the hotel. The Namibian government asked him to invest $43 million to help qualify for permanent residency." The Journal notes, "Life on the lam has been full of bizarre twists for Mr. Alexander, a 54-year-old Israeli citizen and wealthy ex-CEO who abandoned his family's life in Manhattan for this remote, arid spot in southern Africa. … He was released from jail six days after his arrest on $1.4 million bail, a record amount in this country. Now he continues to live here, out in the open, sometimes buying ice cream in a local mall for his three children. If extradited and convicted in the U.S., he faces up to 25 years in prison. While his team of local lawyers has been fighting extradition, he appears to be trying to settle in Namibia for the long haul."

Judge Bans Former Adelphia Official From Company For Life. The Wall Street Journal/AP (11/17, A17) reports, "A federal judge barred a former Adelphia Communications Corp. executive from ever serving again as an officer or director of a publicly traded company." The AP continues, "Ruling in a case brought by the Securities and Exchange Commission, the judge said former Adelphia vice president Michael C. Mulcahey had helped the former cable-television giant's founding family engage in a fraud that contributed to the company's 2002 collapse. … Mr. Mulcahey was acquitted of criminal fraud charges in 2004, but the SEC sought regulatory sanctions for his conduct." The AP adds, 'U.S. District Judge Kevin Castel conducted a trial in July and ruled yesterday that although Mr. Mulcahey wasn't an 'architect' of fraud at Adelphia he had 'egregiously' violated 'numerous securities laws.' … The judge also ruled, however, that Mr. Mulcahey hadn't been personally enriched by fraud at the company. He declined to order any fines against Mr. Mulcahey, who made $140,000 in his best year with Adelphia, but banned him from receiving 'anything of value' in the future from the family of the company's founder, John Rigas, who was convicted along with a son on fraud charges."

Hewlett-Packard Profits Surge Amid Unfolding Scandal. The New York Times (11/17, Darlin) reports, "In a period punctuated by distracting revelations of company spying, Hewlett-Packard nevertheless sharply increased its revenue and made more profit from the revenue." The Times continues, "Net income for its fourth quarter, which ended Oct. 31, rose to $1.7 billion, or 60 cents a share, from $416 million, or 14 cents a share, a year ago, which included $1.57 billion in restructuring charges. After adjusting for the manner in which the charges are accounted for, net income increased 27 percent. Revenue increased 7 percent, to $24.6 billion." The Times adds, "With $91.7 billion in revenue for the year, a 6 percent increase over 2005, the company overtook I.B.M. as the world's largest technology company. (The consensus of analysts puts I.B.M.'s 2006 revenue at $90.72 billion.) H.P. has also overtaken Dell as the world's largest PC vendor mostly because sales of its notebook computers grew 24 percent. … 'We certainly aren't taking any victory laps, but we are pleased with the progress,' the chairman and chief executive, Mark V. Hurd, said." The Times notes, "The company's top executives were distracted through much of the quarter by revelations of spying operations conducted against several directors and journalists. The imbroglio led to the resignation of Patricia C. Dunn, the company's chairwoman, who this week pleaded not guilty to four felony charges. A former company lawyer and its director of ethics, Kevin Hunsaker, also faces charges. He has pleaded not guilty. Three contractors were also charged and have also pleaded not guilty. … The fallout from the affair has not ended. The company disclosed that the Securities and Exchange Commission has opened an investigation of the handling of disclosures of board information. It also said the Federal Communications Commission has requested information on the company's spying, which included using false pretenses to obtain private phone records. The California attorney general is expected to sue Hewlett-Packard in civil court. In addition, the United States attorney in Northern California continues his investigation."

CRIMINAL LAW:

US, Canada Agree To Share Forensics Data. The AP (11/17) reports, "U.S. and Canadian law enforcement officials agreed Thursday to begin sharing forensics data from crimes scenes in both countries." The AP continues, "A memorandum of understanding signed by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Canadian Minister of Public Safety Stockwell Day marks the first in which the United States has agreed to immediate sharing of crime-scene information with a foreign government. … 'And while terrorism is a primary concern for all of us, it is not our only job,' Gonzales said. 'Criminals are constantly searching for new ways to prey upon our communities. To stop them, we must maintain the same vigilance we show against terrorists.'" The AP adds, "Before Thursday's action, the two countries exchanged only a limited amount of ballistics information. … Under the agreement, each country will be able to view real-time forensics data, allowing bullets and firearms to be linked across crime scenes in both countries, said Michael Sullivan, acting director of the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives. … Canada has strict laws governing handgun sales, with the result that the majority of handguns used to commit crimes in Canada are purchased in the United States, Sullivan said." The AP notes, "The signing took place as part of the ninth annual United States-Canada Cross-Border Crime Forum, which is held at the historic Biltmore Estate in western North Carolina. The two-day meeting brought together hundreds of law-enforcement officers from the two countries."

The Asheville (NC) Citizen-Times (11/17, Barrett) reports, "U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, Secretary of Homeland Security Michael Chertoff and other government officials from the United States and Canada are on the Biltmore Estate today for a meeting on fighting crime along the two countries' border." The Citizen-Times continues, "Canadian Minister of Justice Vic Toews and Stockwell Day, Canada's minister of public safety and emergency preparedness are also scheduled to attend. … Approximately 130 people are attending the forum, including Canadian and U.S. officials and the U.S. Attorneys General from all the border states with Canada." The Citizen-Times adds, "Biltmore Estate spokesperson Elizabeth Sims said a past visit to the estate by Gonzales' wife inspired forum organizers to choose Biltmore for their meeting. … 'Mrs. Gonzales visited the property a couple of years ago and stayed at the inn and she just really liked the Biltmore Estate,' Sims said. 'So when they began looking for a location for this meeting, they thought we were a great place.'"

The Canadian Press (11/17) reports, "Canada and the United States signed a deal yesterday to share more information quickly on guns, bullets and cartridges related to crime scenes. … The agreement will enable police on both sides of the border to compare evidence electronically and instantaneously instead of exchanging it manually on a case-by-case basis." CP adds, "U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales also emphasized co-operative steps to combat the illegal flow of U.S. firearms north of the border, including a focus on the rise of gun-related violence in the Toronto area. … Canada has long complained about the weapons, particularly handguns, smuggled in from the United States."

WLOS- TV (11/16, 11:00 p.m.) Greenville, Spartanburg, Asheville, broadcasted, "33 top Bush Administration officials come to Asheville to discuss border security and fighting crime with their Canadian counterparts. US Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Homeland Security Chief Michael Chertoff hosted the gathering at the Biltmore Estate. More than 100 law enforcement officials watched as the two sides signed an agreement to share firearms information. Gonzales said, "It will improve our ability to identify crime scene evidence and will advance joint efforts to fight gun crimes." WSPA- TV and WYFF- TV also ran this story in the same cities.

Abramoff Reportedly Fingers Reid, Other Democratic Senators. ABC News' "The Blotter" blog (11/15, Ross, Schwartz) reported, "As convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff reported to federal prison today, a source close to the investigation surrounding his activities told ABC News that Sen. Harry Reid (D-Nev.) was one of the members of Congress Abramoff had allegedly implicated in his cooperation with federal prosecutors." A spokesperson for Reid "said the senator had done nothing illegal or unethical." Reid spokesman Jim Manley said, "We have no idea what Abramoff is telling prosecutors to save his skin, but I do know that these kind of old allegations are completely ridiculous and untrue." ABC adds, "A source close to the investigation says Abramoff told prosecutors that more than $30,000 in campaign contributions to Reid from Abramoff's clients 'were no accident and were in fact requested by Reid.'" Abramoff has "reportedly claimed the Nevada senator agreed to help him on matters related to Indian gambling." Sources "close to the federal investigation say Abramoff has offered testimony about his contacts with 'six to eight seriously corrupt Democratic senators' and an ever larger number of Republican members of Congress." In addition to Reid, "the sources say Abramoff has been most closely questioned about his contacts with Sen. Conrad Burns (R-Mont.), who was defeated in last week's election."

Texas Appeals Court Rules Bush Overstepped Authority In Medellin Case. The AP (11/17, Graczyk) reports from Houston, "A state appeals court chastised President Bush for intervening in the case of a condemned killer born in Mexico, one of several dozen cases in which Bush ordered new hearings amid international complaints." The AP continues, "The Texas Court of Criminal Appeals on Wednesday rejected the argument from Jose Ernesto Medellin that he was denied legal help he should have received under international treaties. … Medellin, who spent most of his life in Texas, was sentenced in 1994 to die for the rapes and killings of two teenage girls. .. . 'We hold that the President has exceeded his constitutional authority by intruding into the independent powers of the judiciary,' the court said in a 64-page ruling." The AP adds, "Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said the department was reviewing the ruling and considering its options. … Medellin was supported in his appeal by dozens of countries, legal groups and human rights organizations, as well as former American diplomats and the European Union. Much of the international community is opposed to capital punishment and the execution of Mexican nationals in Texas, the nation's most active death penalty state, is a particularly touchy point." The AP notes, "At issue overall was how much weight U.S. courts should give to decisions of the International Court of Justice in The Hague, which ruled the convictions of Medellin and 50 other Mexican-born prisoners violated the 1963 Vienna Convention. The pact requires consular access for Americans detained abroad and foreigners arrested in the United States. … In February 2005, Bush unexpectedly ordered new state court hearings for all 51 prisoners. The Texas court said Wednesday neither the Constitution nor any act of Congress gives the president the power to issue such an order. … The decision means Medellin, 31, is not entitled to additional review of his international rights claim."

… One called for giving Lawrence the death penalty. The other recommends a life sentence. … Lawrence's lawyers argued the decision was inconsistent. On Thursday, a federal judge announced he agreed." WBNS-TV adds, "Federal judge Gregory Frost issued a written decision reading the jury's sentencing on Lawrence's murder verdicts were inconsistent -- giving life on one charge and then death on another. The judge wrote: 'The court has no choice but to set aside the death sentence and order a new sentencing hearing.' … The judge added, 'The discrepencies point to irrational arbitrary juror conduct.' … Franklin County Prosecutor Ron O'Brien told 10TV Thursday that he will meet with Justice Department officials to decide the next step. O'Brien said they will likely appeal this decision to the Federal Appeals Court."

Florida Officials Join FBI In Foley Probe. The South Florida Sun-Sentinel (11/17, Othón) reports, "Not seen publicly since resigning from Congress in a national scandal, Mark Foley emerged on Thursday in Palm Beach County after the death of his father. … The former Congressman, who left his post as a U.S. representative in September after the disclosure that he had sent sexually explicit emails to Congressional pages, is in town for Ed Foley's funeral. Ed Foley, 85, died Tuesday." The Sun-Sentinel continues, "Foley's emergence comes as the Florida Department of Law Enforcement indicated it has shifted from a preliminary inquiry to a 'full-fledged criminal investigation' regarding Foley. … As the scandal unfolded and more details were made public concerning Foley's communications with teenage boys, the U.S. Justice Department and FDLE indicated they were launching inquiries. … 'We found that there might be criminal violations that would warrant a full investigation,' said FDLE spokeswoman Kristen Perezluha, adding that the agency also is assisting the FBI. 'We don't know, but that's what we're going to look into.'"

Judge Stays Safavian Sentence. Government Executive (11/17, Palmer) reports, "In an unexpected move, a judge granted a request Thursday from David Safavian, the former head of the Office of Management and Budget's procurement policy shop, for a stay of his prison sentence, pending an appeal of his June conviction of obstructing justice and making false statements." GE continues, "Safavian filed an appeal in September challenging his conviction on four counts of making false statements to General Services Administration employees and obstructing an investigation by GSA's inspector general. The charges stem from Safavian's relationship with lobbyist Jack Abramoff while serving as chief of staff at GSA, and focused on a Scotland golf trip the men took together, along with other officials, in 2002." GE adds, "Appeals can take several years, so Safavian's sentence of 18 months -- if upheld -- will not begin until after that ruling. … In his opinion granting the request, U.S. District Judge Paul Friedman cited the section of U.S. Code that says that if a person is not likely to flee, and the appeal raises a substantial question of law likely to result in a reversal, new trial or different sentence, then the judge can grant a request for release on bond. … Safavian's lawyer, Barbara 'Biz' Van Gelder, raised numerous legal issues before, during and after the trial, including questions about the admission of controversial e-mails between Safavian and Abramoff as evidence."

US Attorney, FBI Investigating Cleveland Public Housing Land Deal. The AP (11/17) reports from Cleveland, "Federal prosecutors are investigating the $150,000-an-acre purchase of inner-city land by the city's public housing agency. U.S. Attorney Greg White said Wednesday that his office and FBI agents had begun a preliminary investigation of the purchase by the Cuyahoga Metropolitan Housing Authority. White confirmed the investigation one day after Todd Davis, a developer whose company sold the land to the agency, met with federal investigators."

Pennsylvania Couple Suing To Obtain New York Fugitive Reward. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (11/17, Nephin) reports, "A couple filed a lawsuit to claim a $350,000 reward offered for Ralph 'Bucky' Phillips, a former fugitive who is accused of shooting a New York state trooper and suspected of shooting two others." Jack and Gloria Young of Warren, Penn., "called Warren city police shortly before midnight on Sept. 7 after seeing a suspicious person near their property, a tip they say led directly to the capture of Phillips. 'But for my clients' phone call, (police) still would not have found Bucky, or at least not found him that night,' Robert C. Greene, an attorney for the Youngs, said Thursday." The AP notes, "The couple is suing the Police Benevolent Association of the New York State Troopers Inc., which they say is wrongly withholding the reward. … The FBI put up an additional $100,000 reward. The lawsuit does not address that reward, but Greene said the couple is considering suing the FBI also."

Reputed Philadelphia Mob Associate Released On Bond. The Philadelphia Inquirer (11/17, Anastasia, 385K) reports, "Reputed mob associate Damion Canalichio was released on $75,000 bond yesterday after his arrest earlier this week on two-year-old drug-dealing charges. Canalichio, 37, is the second high-profile mob figure to be arrested in the last month in what some law enforcement sources say is part of a concerted federal push against alleged South Philadelphia mob boss Joseph Ligambi." The Inquirer notes, "The fact that authorities waited more than two years to bring charges in the case has fueled speculation that Canalichio is a target in a broader probe. His attorney, Joseph Santaguida, said yesterday that he originally thought his client was going to be arrested on illegal-gambling charges. In June, the FBI raided Canalichio's home and an apartment on Snyder Avenue out of which he…allegedly operated. No drugs were found, but authorities reportedly seized records and documents tied to a gambling operation."

Boston Mobster Serving Life For Murder Paroled For Christmas. The Boston Herald (11/17, McPhee, 184K) reports, "Vincent Federico -- the convicted killer who became a made man in the Mafia while on a weekend prison furlough in a ceremony that was bugged by the FBI -- will be paroled for Christmas after he disavowed any mob ties, the Herald has learned. Federico, now 46, is a second-degree lifer at MCI-Norfolk in connection with the murder of a Cambridge man, Robert McFarlane, who was hit by five bullets as he helped a friend move out of a North End apartment above Federico's in 1977. Federico had argued with the victim for no apparent reason before shooting him…according to the parole decision." The Herald notes, "The FBI bug in the Medford basement was long considered the most important incursion ever by law enforcement into the innermost sanctums of organized crime, and the tapes helped bring down the Patriarca family."

US Investigating Alleged Sex Tourism By San Francisco Police Officer. KTVU-TV San Francisco (11/16) reported on its Web site from a story broadcast yesterday, "Federal authorities confirmed Thursday an investigation into the past actions of San Francisco police Officer Donald Ramirez, who died of an apparent suicide last month in a Cambodian jail cell where he was being held for sex crimes." Cambodian "authorities had apparently arrested Ramirez for sexual activity with a 14-year girl." ICE spokeswoman Virginia Kice "said Thursday that Ramirez had been under investigation since 2001," but "they never found any evidence of a crime. 'We have received several new leads and we will pursue those vigorously,' Kice said." KTVU noted, "Akha human rights activist Matthew McDaniel says he told an FBI agent that Ramirez '…had a real appetite for underage girls' when the agent contacted him a decade ago in Burma."

Bay City News Wires (11/16, 5:25 p.m. PST) reported, "Police commissioner Joe Veronese said last week of the investigation that 'there was no greater issue in the department than this.' The police commission, however, has yet to announce if it will take up the issue. Other police organizations are staying away from any involvement in the incident. 'Whatever he does in his off-duty time is his matter,' Police Officers Association Vice President Kevin Martin said. 'This is not a POA issue.'"

Judge Denies Bail For KeyBank Executive Charged With Embezzlement. The AP (11/17) reports, "A former KeyBank vice president accused of embezzling $29 million is a risk to flee and must be jailed to await his trial, a federal magistrate ruled Thursday in denying bond for the suspect. Magistrate Judge Patricia A. Hemann said the overseas travels of David F. Verhotz, 56, of Cleveland, likely gave him contacts that would be useful if he fled. In addition, she noted that more than $8 million is still missing." The AP notes, "An affidavit filed by the FBI said Verhotz took out loans in the names of three European banks and put the money in his accounts."

Texas Bank Manager Pleads Guilty To Embezzlement. The San Antonio Express-News (11/17, Contreras) reports, "Nancy Lynn Limmer has been a New Braunfels councilwoman and bank branch manager, but on Thursday she became a federal felon. In a federal court hearing in San Antonio, Limmer, 44, admitted that she defrauded more than $161,000 from the First Commercial Bank in New Braunfels, where she'd worked for 17 years. … She admitted misappropriating money from customers' accounts at the branch she headed in New Braunfels between April 2002 and August 2005." The Express-News notes that Limmer cooperated "with the FBI" and agreed to "a plea deal before Assistant U.S. Attorney Tom McHugh presented the case to a grand jury."

Connecticut Investment Advisor Pleads Guilty To Defrauding Clients. The Hartford Courant (11/15, Gosselin, 190K) reported, "Avon investment adviser David M. Faubert lived the high life for five years, taking lavish vacations, buying expensive cars and developing a love for the Foxwoods and Mohegan Sun casinos. But that lifestyle costs money. And as Faubert racked up $1 million in gambling losses and became a heavy cocaine user, he found a new source of financing: more than $4.5 million of his clients' money." On Tuesday, Faubert "pleaded guilty in U.S. District Court in New Haven to 10 counts of mail fraud, one count of embezzlement from an employee benefit plan and four counts of filing false tax returns, all between 2000 and 2005." The AP (11/15) noted, "Faubert told clients that he would guarantee them an 8 percent rate of return if the clients invested money in a fixed investment account he controlled, authorities said. As a result of Faubert's promises, 21 clients provided him with about $5.5 million. But authorities say the fixed investment account did not exist, and Faubert deposited the money into his business and personal accounts."

Florida Man Sentenced To 15 Years In Prison For Child Porn Possession. The Tampa Tribune (11/17, Silvestrini) reports, "A former Polk County sheriff's employee was sentenced Thursday morning to 15 years in federal prison after pleading guilty to child pornography charges. After he is released, James Patrick Odle, 24, of Winter Haven, will be on probation indefinitely under the terms of his sentence. Odle was a civilian detention technician at the South County Jail in Frostproof when investigators from the FBI's Innocent Images Task Force searched his room in his parents' home." The Tribune notes, "A forensic examination of his computers and electronic storage devices revealed more than 5,000 images, including three video files, of children engaged in sexually explicit conduct, according to the U.S. attorney's office."

Former USF Dean Pleads Guilty To Child Porn Charge. The AP (11/17) reports, "A former dean at University of San Francisco's School of Education has agreed to plead guilty to a child pornography charge and serve more than 5 years in prison, federal prosecutors said." The AP continues, "William T. Garner, 66, of San Francisco, acknowledged in the plea deal that he knowingly possessed more than 15,000 images of minors engaged in sexually explicit acts, U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan said. … 'The children depicted in these images are the victims of horrible abuse, and we will vigorously prosecute individuals possessing these materials,' Ryan said in a statement." The AP adds, "Garner and prosecutors agreed to recommend a 63-month prison sentence, a fine of $12,500 and $50,000 in restitution to be paid to the San Francisco Child Abuse Prevention Center, Ryan said. The penalties still must be approved by a judge. .. .The maximum penalty for the charge is a 10-year prison term and a $250,000 fine."

Global Crossing Official Blasts New Wiretapping Rules. CNET News (11/17, Broache) reports, "An executive from a company that manages a large portion of the Internet's infrastructure on Thursday slammed federal wiretapping rules expected to take effect next spring." CNET continues, "Paul Kouroupas, vice president of regulatory affairs for Global Crossing, strongly criticized the Federal Communications Commission's broadening of a 1994 law--originally intended to cover telephone providers--as disproportionately costly, complex, and riddled with privacy concerns. His company is one of the world's largest Internet backbone providers. … 'Our customers are large Fortune 500 companies--not too many of those companies are conducting drug deals or terrorist activities out of Merrill Lynch's offices or using their phones in that way,' Kouroupas said at an event here sponsored by the DC Bar Association. 'By and large we don't get wiretap requests, yet we're faced with the costs to come into compliance,' which he estimated at $1 million." CNET adds, "At issue is an order issued last fall by the Federal Communications Commission that set a deadline of May 14, 2007, by which most broadband and Internet phone providers are required to reengineer their networks for easier snooping by law enforcement. The move expanded the Communications Assistance for Law Enforcement Act, or CALEA, which Congress wrote to impose obligations on telephone companies, but not Internet providers. … Even without the new FCC rules, police have the legal authority to conduct Internet wiretaps, but they have claimed the need for a 'standardized' system. The formal broadening of the rules followed lobbying from the FBI, the Drug Enforcement Administration and the Justice Department, which said they needed to be able to eavesdrop more readily on criminals who spurned traditional telephone lines."

DC Police Arrest Man In Burglary At Site Of Lawyer's Slaying. The Washington Post (11/17, B01, Klein, Schwartzman) reports, "A burglary at a Northwest Washington townhouse has drawn the attention of D.C. homicide detectives investigating the unsolved slaying of a prominent lawyer three months ago at the same address." The Post continues, "Police have arrested a 36-year-old man in the burglary of the house, which was unoccupied during the break-in Oct. 30. Authorities quoted the man, Phelps Collins, as saying that he got inside with help from a friend -- the brother of the townhouse's owner. … Detectives have not drawn a connection between the break-in and the stabbing of Robert Wone on Aug. 2, but homicide detectives have been looking into the burglary in hopes of uncovering potential leads, authorities said. Wone, 32, was stabbed in the chest while visiting friends at the home in the 1500 block of Swann Street NW, on the edge of Dupont Circle." The Post adds, "New details about the burglary emerged through interviews, court papers and testimony at a hearing for Collins this week in D.C. Superior Court. Collins was arrested last Friday on a burglary charge. … Police said Collins told them that the friend, Michael Price, had a key to the house because it belonged to his brother, Joe Price. Police also quoted Collins as saying that Michael Price turned off the alarm once the two men entered the house. About $7,700 worth of electronics were stolen, police said. … Michael Price has not been charged in the burglary."

Stores Use Internal Security To Stop Thieves. USA Today (11/17, O'donnell) reports from Seminole, FL, "Justin Reed is scanning images from 18 cameras at a Beall's department store here when saleswoman Carissa Tunis calls from the juniors department to direct his attention to four young men behaving oddly. … Reed, sitting in the store's so-called loss-prevention room, zeros in on the men and sees one slip a wallet in his pocket. He goes back over the image a few times to be sure. When another camera shows the group leaving the store, Reed and Jim Stevenson, a Beall's loss-prevention senior manager, slip out the security door and nab a 17-year-old." USA continues, "As the two beefy investigators hustle the teen back inside, he pleads that he's just off probation. They call the police anyway. Within minutes, he's the first of two shoplifters arrested during four hours that USA TODAY spent observing the store's crime-fighting efforts. … On this November day, the culprit is a fairly harmless high school dropout. But the retail industry spends billions on technology and investigators such as Reed to combat what they call 'organized theft rings': gangs of shoplifters who sweep through stores with military precision. The retailers are fighting back with a new national crime database, electronic receipts, digital video recording technology and their own brand of detective work." USA adds, "Stymied by police and courts that are often unwilling or unable to tackle crimes they may see as petty theft, the retailers build their own cases against the gangs, connecting crimes that often cross county and state lines. To help document the scope of this organized thievery, investigators for Walgreens, Target, Safeway, Limited Brands and others even follow thieves from their stores to the 'fences' where they sell the goods. … The FBI and retail groups expect that by the end of this year, every major retailer will be able to share crime data — including photos of suspects from their store cameras — in a computer database. Beall's, a Florida-based chain, and other retailers now track shoplifting gangs using the database, which has already helped link a suspect to thefts of $500,000 worth of goods from 12 retailers. The man is still a fugitive, but warrants for his arrest are out in three states."

Baltimore Bars Hit By String Of Armed Robberies. The Baltimore Sun (11/17, Linskey) reports, "A masked man put a gun to the head of a bartender at Dizzy Issie's and demanded that she open the register while he counted to five. The man yelled, 'Keep down don't move' to the 50 or so people at the hipster Remington bar. A second man, also masked, stood lookout at a side door." The Sun continues, "After prying the till free, the pair ran out with about $800 and hopped into a waiting car. Shaken customers picked themselves up. Several called police, and then everyone cleared out for the night. … Police say they believe the same men have held up eight bars in the past three weeks, usually the same way." The Sun adds, "Either two or three men enter the tavern wearing gloves and masks or bandanas to cover their faces, according to police. One man, waving a gun, immediately jumps behind the bar and, in most cases, removes the entire cash drawer. Another man stands as a lookout and prevents people from leaving the bar. … In addition to the Tuesday night robbery at Dizzy Issie's, police believe the group is responsible for holding up three other bars this week -- one in Charles Village on Monday night, one in Upper Fells Point late Wednesday and another in Pigtown early Thursday morning. In recent weeks other bars have been held up in Remington, Mill Hill and Carroll-South Hilton in West Baltimore."

DC Has High Rate Of Gun Slayings. The Washington Times (11/17, Cella) reports, "The District is among the major U.S. cities with the highest percentage of people being killed by firearms, despite having one of the strictest gun-control laws in the country." The Times continues, "A recent Metropolitan Police Department report on homicides from 2001 to 2005 states that 901 of 1,126 homicide victims, or about 80 percent, were fatally shot. … 'It's a problem,' Chief Charles H. Ramsey said. 'It may be something that's with us for a while.'" The Times adds, "Firearms last year alone were used to commit 157 of the District's 196 homicides, or about 80 percent. That percentage has remained relatively consistent since 2001, when a five-year low of 78.4 percent of homicides were committed using guns. .. .FBI crime statistics for 2005 show 10,100 of the country's 14,860 homicide victims, or 68 percent, were killed by guns. .. .The District's percentage of gun homicides is comparable to those in other big cities, according to the U.S. Bureau of Justice Statistics. … In 2004, the last year for which comprehensive statistics were available, the 79.3 percent of homicides involving guns in the District was higher than the 61.1 percent in New York. Chicago reported 75.2 percent, and Baltimore had 77.5 percent."

Target Of California Corruption Probe Faces Molestation Charges. The Los Angeles Times (11/17, Hong, Pringle) reports, "A political corruption scandal took a sordid turn Thursday when a defendant in the Vernon voter-fraud prosecution was charged with sexually molesting four boys while serving as dean of students at Daniel Murphy Catholic High School." The Times continues, "John Joseph Malburg, son of Vernon Mayor Leonis Malburg, who is also accused in the corruption case, pleaded not guilty to numerous counts of child sexual abuse, lewd acts and making a videotape for sale of a minor engaged in sex acts." The Times adds, "Authorities said one student appeared in a sexually explicit tape in exchange for a higher grade. In addition, Malburg, 37, is charged with possessing child pornography and secretly videotaping boys while they showered at his Hancock Park home. … As an offshoot of the 19-month corruption probe, investigators began to examine Malburg's contact with the boys over a period of 10 years, according to the Los Angeles County district attorney's office." The Times notes, "The Archdiocese of Los Angeles learned about the sex abuse inquiry sometime before Malburg was fired in July but did not notify parents at the Fairfax-area school, spokesman Tod M. Tamberg said. … Tamberg said the district attorney's office asked the archdiocese to keep the matter confidential. Jane Robison, a district attorney's spokeswoman, could not confirm that."

CIVIL LAW:

Trial Begins In Suit Against FBI Alleging Wrongful Convictions. The AP (11/17, Lindsay) reports, "Two Boston men spent 30 years in prison for an underworld slaying they did not commit after a judge ruled that the FBI withheld evidence that would have cleared the pair to protect a mob hitman who was serving as an informant. … Now, in a trial that opened Thursday, those men and the families of two others who were wrongfully convicted are seeking damages from the government that could total more than $100 million." The AP continues, "Joseph 'The Animal' Barboza was a known mob assassin responsible for numerous hits during Boston's gangland wars of the 1960s. He was also so vital to FBI efforts to crack the mob that the agency allowed him to wrongly implicate four men for murder, attorneys for the plaintiffs said in opening statements. … Joseph Salvati and Peter Limone and the families of two other men who died while behind bars accuse the federal government of malicious prosecution, conspiracy and depriving the men's family of companionship. … 'It was a rigged game, a charade, a story concocted by Mr. Barboza and assented to by the FBI,' said attorney Austin McGuigan, who represents Salvati. 'There was no hope the real story in this case would be uncovered.'" The AP adds, "The case is the latest development in a scandal that unfolded in Boston about a decade ago, when it was learned that the FBI had a corrupt relationship with the mob, protecting killers who were informants and even tipping them off to pending indictments. … The lawsuit was filed after the Justice Department released documents in 2001 that showed the FBI withheld evidence from state prosecutors that could have cleared the men so the agency could protect an informant who actually committed the crime."

The Boston Globe (11/17, Murphy) reports, "There's no question that the FBI recruited notorious hitman Joseph 'The Animal' Barboza as a witness against local Mafia leaders, then turned him over to state prosecutors in a case that led to the wrongful conviction of four men for a 1965 gangland murder in Chelsea. … But Thursday, on the first day of a civil trial seeking more than $100 million in damages from the federal government, a Justice Department lawyer insisted the FBI can't be blamed because state prosecutors were responsible for investigating and trying the case. … 'The FBI is not liable,' said the government attorney, Bridget Bailey Lipscomb. … But lawyers for Peter Limone, Joseph Salvati, Henry Tameleo, and Louis Greco accused the FBI of making a 'mockery' of justice by failing to tell state prosecutors or defense lawyers about evidence that suggested Barboza had framed the four men for the slaying of small-time hoodlum Edward 'Teddy' Deegan."

Boston Herald Columnist Assails FBI, Lipscomb. In his Boston Herald (11/17, 184K) column, Peter Gelzinis writes, "That the prospect of justice has arrived 40 years late for Joe Salvati and Peter Limone, along with two fellow defendants who died in prison, Louis Greco and Henry Tameleo…is shameful. That the Department of Justice has seen fit to send Bridget Bailey Lipscomb back to Boston to defend the putrid reputation of the FBI…well, that could be called a blessing. With Ms. Lipscomb at the government table, the only question may well be how much of a potential $100 million in civil damages will these men and their families see. Five months ago, Lipscomb's attempt to convince U.S. District Court Judge Reginald C. Lindsay that the FBI could not be blamed for enabling their Teflon rat, Whitey Bulger, to slaughter John McIntyre, turned into graceless courtroom hash." Gelznis adds, "This time, however, the FBI's crime is even more egregious. And the case will be heard by a different federal judge, U.S. District Court Judge Nancy Gertner."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Democrats Vow To Strengthen Oversight Of DOJ Civil Rights Division. The Boston Globe (11/17, Savage) reports, "Democrats on the Senate Judiciary Committee yesterday vowed to impose intense oversight on the Justice Department's Civil Rights Division next year, telling a Bush administration official in charge of the agency that the next Congress will scrutinize whether civil rights laws are being properly enforced." The Globe continues, "Speaking at the first Civil Rights Division oversight hearing since May 2002, the Democrats cited several newspaper articles about the agency over the past year -- including a Globe analysis of changes in the hiring process for lawyers in the division -- and said they would investigate the administration's stewardship of the agency after they regain power in January. … 'There are disturbing reports that career lawyers have been shut out of the division's decision-making process, that the division's civil rights enforcement on behalf of racial minorities has sharply declined, and that the department has packed the division with attorneys who have no background in civil rights litigation,' said Senator Patrick J. Leahy, Democrat of Vermont, who will become committee chairman in January." The Globe adds, "Senator Russell Feingold, Democrat of Wisconsin, said he wanted to know whether the Bush administration was exerting political interference on the division's decisions about when to file cases. The agency has long been a source of political tension because it is charged with enforcing antidiscrimination laws and reviewing changes to state voting rules. … Wan Kim , assistant attorney general for civil rights, said he welcomed congressional attention. … 'I certainly share your . . . interest in oversight,' Kim said, adding that he has 'a deep and abiding respect for this committee and the work that it does in making sure that all branches of government are operating consistent with the law.'" The Globe notes, "One major focus by the lawmakers was a change in hiring procedures. In July, the Globe reported that in late 2002, the Bush administration disbanded a longstanding hiring committee of veteran career lawyers. Political appointees took over screening résumés, interviewing applicants, and deciding who should fill vacancies in the permanent civil service ranks. … After the change, successful applicants were significantly less likely to have civil rights backgrounds, according to a Globe analysis of résumés obtained under the Freedom of Information Act. New hires were also more likely to have conservative credentials, such as membership in the Federalist Society, a group that takes a skeptical view of aggressive civil rights enforcement."

DOJ Sues California Apartment Owners Alleging Discrimination. The AP (11/17) reports, "The U.S. Justice Department sued two apartment building owners for housing discrimination Thursday, claiming they favored Vietnamese tenants over Hispanic tenants." The AP continues, "Gary Luke and Mary Ngo, owners of adjacent apartment complexes in Garden Grove in Orange County, violated the federal Fair Housing Act barring discrimination against people based on national origin, the government claims. … The lawsuit arose from a charge made recently by the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development. The suit seeks monetary damages, civil penalties and a court order prohibiting future discrimination." The AP adds, "Federal authorities say Luke and Ngo issued notices in the last year to Hispanic tenants telling them they had 60 days to leave so their units could be renovated. … When Hispanic tenants later tried to move back into the remodeled units, all were either told that they could not return or were promised rental applications that were never provided, authorities said. … Vacated units were later rented out to Vietnamese tenants, the government said."

DOJ May Be Probing GOP Maryland Election Fliers. The Washington Post (11/17, B02, Rich, Eggen) reports, "A senior Justice Department official said yesterday that the misleading fliers distributed by Republicans in Maryland on Election Day may -- or may not -- be the subject of an investigation by the department's criminal division." The Post continues, "Wan Kim, assistant attorney general for the department's civil rights division, said during a Senate hearing that he believed the matter was under investigation but quickly added, 'I'm not 100 percent sure about that.' … Two public affairs officers at Justice Department headquarters in Washington said they could neither confirm nor deny that an investigation is underway." The Post adds, "The fliers -- authorized by the campaigns of Republicans Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr., who lost his bid for a second term, and Michael S. Steele, who was defeated in his bid for a Senate seat -- have been widely denounced for implying, incorrectly, that the two candidates were endorsed by prominent black figures including former NAACP leader Kweisi Mfume and Prince George's County Executive Jack B. Johnson (D)."

Two Face Additional Sex Trafficking Charges In Tennessee. The Robertson County (TN) Times (11/17, Howard) reports, "Two people are facing additional federal charges this week for allegedly forcing a Mexican teenager into prostitution as part of a sex trafficking ring that operated in Nashville and Memphis, federal officials said." The Times continues, "A federal grand jury in Memphis issued indictments Thursday charging Juan Mendez and Cristina Andres Perfecto with using fraud and coercion to force an adult woman and the teenager into a life of prostitution. They were charged in October with sex trafficking of children." The Times adds, "Federal investigators believe the teenager was smuggled into the country from Oaxaca, Mexico, and thought she was going to get a job as a waitress at a Nashville restaurant. … She was taken to a Harding Place-area apartment, where she was beaten, raped and forced to have sex with as many as 40 men per day, according to court documents." The Times notes, "The girl, now 15, was taken into the custody of the state Department of Children's Services and placed with a Spanish-speaking foster family, DCS spokesman Rob Johnson said. … Raymundo Flores, Raul Santillan-Leon and Fernando Reyes-Santillan also were indicted on charges of conspiracy to launder money and harbor illegal immigrants at a brothel in Memphis, justice department officials said in a news release. … All five of those indicted were connected to the same sex-trafficking ring, according to federal officials."

Judge Asked To Limit DOJ's Involvement In Probe Of Mississippi Inmate Death. The Biloxi (MS) Sun Herald (11/17, Fitzgerald) reports from Gulfport, MS, "Ryan Teel's attorney wants a judge to instruct the government not to interfere with the defendant's investigation in preparation of Teel's trial involving an inmate death." The Herald continues, "The Harrison County Sheriff's Department has denied the defense a request to examine the county jail booking room and to question jail employees, according to a motion filed by Jim Davis, Teel's attorney. … Teel, a former corrections officer, is set to stand trial May 28 on criminal charges of civil rights violations in the fatal beating of Jessie Lee Williams Jr. The incident occurred in the jail booking room on Feb. 4. Regina Rhodes, also a former jailer, pleaded guilty to her role in the assault and to lying to cover it up." The Herald adds, "Davis asked for an emergency telephone conference with a judge today to discuss his concerns. … Allowing the defense access to the booking room and jail employees is 'necessary in order to properly prepare for trial,' Davis wrote in his motion. He was not available for comment Thursday. … Teel is in custody at an undisclosed location." The Herald notes, "Davis' latest motions claim Capt. Steve Campbell, who runs the sheriff's professional standards unit, agreed Nov. 7 to allow a booking room visit and witness interviews, but changed his mind the next day. Campbell said permission was needed from the U.S. Attorney's Office, an affidavit stated. … Sheriff George H. Payne Jr. declined comment and referred questions to his attorney, Cy Faneca, who said he advised the sheriff to let the U.S. Justice Department make that decision. … 'We are not involved in the criminal case because the Justice Department is conducting that investigation,' Faneca said. 'Nobody has told us what the ground rules are, so it certainly would be prudent to let Justice make that decision.' … The U.S. Attorney's Office, which is prosecuting Teel in the criminal case, operates under the Justice Department. … U.S. Attorney Dunn Lampton said his office will file a response to Davis' complaint today."

UCLA Police Use Stun-Gun On Student In Library ID Dispute. The AP (11/17) reports, "A UCLA police officer shocked a student with a stun gun at a campus library after he refused repeated requests to show student identification and wouldn't leave, police said." The AP continues, "The student, Mostafa Tabatabainejad, was shocked Tuesday at about 11 p.m. as police did a routine check of student IDs at the University of California, Los Angeles Powell Library computer lab. … 'This is a long-standing library policy to ensure the safety of students during the late-night hours,' said UCLA Police Department spokeswoman Nancy Greenstein." The AP adds, "She said police tried to escort Tabatabainejad, 23, out of the library after he refused to provide identification. Tabatabainejad instead encouraged others at the library to join his resistance, and when a crowd began to gather, police used the stun gun on him, Greenstein said. … Tabatabainejad was arrested for resisting and obstructing a police officer and later released on his own recognizance."

Study Says California Initiative Limited Minority Contracts, Admissions. The Washington Post (11/17, A23, Williamson, Strauss, 690K) reports the "number of minorities -- particularly black Americans -- winning government contracts and being admitted to public colleges and universities in California has dwindled since a ballot measure was passed 10 years ago outlawing preferential treatment for minorities in those areas, according to a study released yesterday." The report "comes as the longtime controversy over affirmative action is gaining new attention. Michigan voters last week adopted a constitutional amendment essentially taking the same action as California, and the American Bar Association is facing criticism from some groups for strengthening its diversity requirements for accreditation of law schools." The study "of California's Proposition 209 shows that it has had a major effect, according to Ellis Cose, who wrote the report for the Institute for Justice and Journalism at the University of Southern California's Annenberg School for Communication."

Laws To Make English Official Language Gaining Support. USA Today (11/17, Dorell, 2.27M) reports, "Voters and town boards in several states recently passed laws making English the official language, garnering Hispanic support in one case for what many say was a message to Washington." Arizona voters "last week approved Proposition 103, a constitutional amendment making English the official language of the state. Passing similar laws were the city councils of Taneytown, Md.; Farmers Branch, Texas, and the town board of Pahrump, Nev." While English-only proposals in the U.S. Congress have gone nowhere, the Arizona measure passed by a 3-to-1 ratio, with 48% of Hispanics supporting it, according to an Associated Press exit poll." Jose Esparza, vice chairman of the Arizona Latino Republican Association, said "Hispanic support is a sign that 'the majority of Hispanics believe that the key to success in America is to learn the language of the land, learn English.'"

Black Entrepreneurs Face Unique Challenges In Emerging Industries. The Washington Post (11/17) reports on the challenges faced by black entrepreneurs in the DC area, focusing on Enlightened Inc, a technology consulting firm. The Post reports, "Sitting around a conference table, eight employees of Enlightened Inc., a technology consulting firm, were struggling to polish a proposal that could well determine the firm's future. It was not going well. … Chief executive Antwanye Ford was rubbing his forehead in frustration. … Enlightened's bid for a multimillion-dollar contract to update the computer system used by the District's probation and parole officers was simply not good enough, he told his staff. The proposal needed more graphics, more punch. As Ford saw it, this bid was his fledgling black firm's ticket to a new competitive league. …

Suddenly, Ford's cellphone was vibrating. He excused himself and headed into his private office. It was Larry Daniels, one of the District's chief accountants who oversees city spending. Daniels had received complaints about Enlightened's work on another project, a $400,000 contract to do inventory of D.C. property: police cars, fire trucks, public school furniture. … It was too much. Frustrated and embarrassed, Ford heaved his bottle of water across the room. 'You only get one opportunity, maybe two at the most, to prove yourself,' he later fumed to a visitor. 'As a minority, you have to work extra hard. . . . We're constantly being watched and judged.'" The Post adds, "As the day wore on, Ford felt that what he had spent years seeking -- acceptance, respect, an unchallenged level of achievement -- had been put at risk. In danger of losing one contract and not winning another he coveted, Ford wondered: Would his aspirations for Enlightened ever be realized? Would he feel this extra pull to prove himself if he were not black? … Ford's anxiety about image is common among black businessmen who are barreling into territory where relatively few of them have established ownership: information technology, construction, real estate, financial management. Many bring with them advanced degrees, years of corporate experience, and cultural and emotional complexities that can both enrich and burden their lives as business owners. Many struggle with whether they must sacrifice their identity to be successful. In Ford's case, that means questioning whether Enlightened should even promote that it is black-owned."

Conservatives Criticize State Marriage Amendments. In a New York Times op-ed (11/17), David B. Rivkin Jr. and Lee A. Casey, lawyers who served in the Justice Department under Presidents Ronald Reagan and George H. W. Bush, say, "Conservatives have consoled themselves since Election Day with the knowledge that many 'conservative' social issues did well — including (and especially) the eight state 'marriage amendments' on the ballot — even if the Republican candidates faltered." These "marriage measures, of which only Arizona's was defeated, generally prevent recognition of gay marriages by defining marriage as a 'union between a man and a woman' in the state constitutions. More than half of the states now have such constitutional provisions (some of which would also forbid same-sex civil unions), and conservatives need to reconsider whether that's really what we want. There are, in fact, some very good reasons conservatives should oppose this approach." At "least since independence, the question of who may marry and under what conditions has been the province of the state legislatures. And it should have remained that way." Errant "or aggressive judges can be corrected by amendments that simply deny the state courts authority over this issue, reserving the definition and regulation of marriage to the legislatures alone."

Pentagon Reclassifies Homosexuality. The AP (11/16, Baldor) reports, "Pentagon guidelines that classified homosexuality as a mental disorder now put it among a list of conditions or 'circumstances' that range from bed-wetting to fear of flying." The new rules "are related to the military's retirement practices. The change does not affect the 'don't ask, don't tell' policy." The revision "came in response to criticism this year when it was discovered that the guidelines listed homosexuality alongside mental retardation and personality disorders."

Breast-Feeding Mother Files Complaint Against Airlines. USA Today (11/17, Bazar, Hemingway) reports, "A clash between a nursing mother and a flight attendant has sparked a discrimination complaint, an airline investigation and a grass-roots protest." USA continues, "Emily Gillette, her husband, Brad; and their then 22-month-old daughter, River, were removed from an Oct. 13 flight from Burlington, Vt., to New York after a flight attendant asked Gillette to cover up while she was breast-feeding the girl. … Freedom Airlines operated the Delta Airlines flight." USA adds, "Gillette, 27, filed a complaint against both airlines last week with the Vermont Human Rights Commission alleging that the airlines violated a state law that allows women to breast-feed 'in any place of public accommodation.' The airlines have until Nov. 27 to respond, Gillette's attorney, Elizabeth Boepple, says."

Barnett Defends DOJ Approval Of AT&T-BellSouth Deal. The AP (11/17, Apuzzo) reports, "The Justice Department's top antitrust official on Thursday defended the agency's unconditional approval of AT&T's $82 billion buyout of BellSouth Corp. as 'pretty straightforward' despite criticism from Democratic regulators and lawmakers." The AP continues, "The buyout would further reunite parts of the old Ma Bell phone monopoly, broken up by the government in 1984, and create the largest U.S. provider of telephone, wireless and broadband Internet services. … 'We're living a very different world than we were in the 1980s,' Assistant Attorney General Thomas O. Barnett said in an interview during an antitrust conference. 'The mere size of a company in general doesn't tell you whether a merger is going to harm consumer welfare.'" The AP adds, "The Federal Communications Commission, the final regulatory hurdle for the deal to be approved, has delayed a final vote three times. Two Democrats on the FCC, Michael Copps and Jonathan Adelstein, have accused the Justice Department of falling down on the job. .. .Barnett said the agency spent months reviewing documents and interviewing customers and competitors before concluding that the deal probably would save customers money. … Once that conclusion was reached, 'it's a pretty straightforward deal for us,' he said." The AP notes, "If the deal wins final government approval, the merger would give San Antonio-based AT&T Inc. total control over the nation's largest cellular provider, Cingular Wireless, a joint venture of the two phone companies that serves 57.3 million customers. … Consumer rights groups have criticized the deal as putting too much of the telecommunications infrastructure under the control of one company."

DOJ Seizes Documents In Bank Bid-Rigging Probe. Bloomberg (11/17, News) reports, "Law enforcement agents seized documents from three brokers and subpoenaed companies including at least two insurers and General Electric in a criminal investigation of whether banks and financial firms conspired to rig bids for investment deals with local governments." Bloomberg continues, "The investigation by the Justice Department centers on guaranteed investment contracts, which municipalities buy to hold bond money until funds are needed to pay for projects. … F.B.I. agents searched CDR Financial Products, a financial adviser and broker in Beverly Hills, Calif., on Wednesday, said Laura Eimiller, a spokeswoman for the F.B.I. in Los Angeles, without providing further details." Bloomberg adds, "Financial Security Assurance Holdings, a unit of the Brussels-based financial services company Dexia, said Wednesday that it was subpoenaed by the Justice Department. … The FGIC Corporation, a New York-based bond insurer, also received a Justice Department subpoena, Brian Moore, a company spokesman, said yesterday. Mr. Moore said FGIC, a former unit of General Electric, had exited the guaranteed investment contract business in 2003 when G.E. sold the company. The outstanding contracts remained with G.E. … Federal investigators took documents Wednesday from the Investment Management Advisory Group, a broker of guaranteed investment contracts and municipal derivatives adviser based in Pottstown, Pa., said Gene Grabowski, a spokesman for the company. … Yesterday, a third guaranteed investment contract broker, Sound Capital Management, based in Eden Prairie, Minn., said federal investigators seized documents and served a subpoena for more documents."

The Philadelphia Inquirer (11/17, Fazlollah) reports, "Federal agents have seized records from a Montgomery County (PA) investment broker and a California company in an investigation of whether banks and financial firms conspired to rig bids for investment deals with local governments. … The investigation centers on alleged bid-rigging in guaranteed investment contracts, which cities buy to hold bond money until funds are needed to pay for projects." The Inquirer continues, "Federal agents took documents from Investment Management Advisory Group Inc., a Pottstown broker of guaranteed investment contracts, firm spokesman Gene Grabowski said. Besides seizing boxes of documents, FBI agents copied the hard drives of computers at the firm. … FBI spokeswoman Jerri Williams said agents from New York were assisted by the bureau's Philadelphia office. … 'IMAGE received a subpoena from the Antitrust Division of the U.S. Department of Justice, and the company is cooperating fully with the authorities,' the company said in a statement. 'It is our understanding that subpoenas have been issued to numerous other firms and that the investigation is industry-wide. We are confident that our business practices and employees will be fully vindicated as this investigation continues.' … The actions by the Justice Department show that an investigation into how banks compete for the right to reinvest money raised in the $2 trillion market for tax-exempt bonds has expanded beyond the U.S. Internal Revenue Service. The IRS has been looking into whether brokers awarded the work to favored banks, potentially boosting the cost of the investment agreements and depriving the federal government of tax revenue. … Justice Department spokeswoman Kathleen Blomquist said the agency was conducting an 'investigation of anticompetitive practices in the municipal-bond industry.'"

The Los Angeles Times (11/17, Reckard) reports, "The FBI raided financial firms on both coasts, including Beverly Hills-based CDR Financial Products, as part of an investigation into possible bid rigging on investments sold to public agencies, federal authorities and the firms said Thursday." The Times continues, "Federal authorities also seized information from at least one municipal bond insurer in connection with the probe. Another of the companies raided, Investment Management Advisory Group of Pottstown, Pa., said the investigation was industrywide and had resulted in subpoenas to a number of other firms." The Times adds, "CDR Financial and the other companies help cities, counties and public agencies invest money generated by bond sales in guaranteed investment contracts. Such contracts are used to allow the proceeds of bond issues to earn interest until they are spent on public projects. … CDR said it was cooperating with the investigation and remained open for business. … 'The firm believes it has acted appropriately in all of the financings under review,' CDR said in a statement." The Times notes, "FBI agents and criminal investigators from the Internal Revenue Service served a search warrant on CDR about 6 a.m. on Wednesday and remained there all day, said Laura Eimiller, an FBI spokeswoman in Los Angeles. … She said details weren't available because a judge had sealed the search documents. … A U.S. Justice Department spokeswoman in Washington, Cynthia Magnuson, said the agency's antitrust department was investigating the possibility of anti-competitive practices in the municipal bond industry. She wouldn't elaborate."

Two Convicted In Indianapolis Concrete Price-Fixing Case. The Indianapolis (IN) Star (11/17, Corcoran) reports, "A two-year criminal investigation into price-fixing by ready-mix concrete companies in the Indianapolis area ended Thursday when a federal jury convicted two Noblesville men and their company of participating in the scheme." The Star continues, "After hearing 21/2 days of evidence in U.S. District Court, a jury of eight women and four men found cousins Chris A. Beaver, 42, and Ricky J. Beaver, 43, conspired with other ready-mix concrete companies to set prices from July 2000 through May 2004." The Star adds, "Frank J. Vondrak of the U.S. Department of Justice's Antitrust Division would not rule out further charges involving officials of companies serving Marion, Muncie and Bloomington, where trial testimony indicated price-fixing also took place." The Star notes, "Vondrak led a team of lawyers, including Jonathan A. Epstein and Eric L. Schleef, that won Thursday's guilty verdicts after a series of pleas by other participants. Most executives cooperated with the FBI and Justice Department in exchange for lighter sentences or immunity from prosecution. … During the trial, prosecutors repeatedly reminded jurors of guilty pleas made by concrete executives, including four officials of Greenfield-based Irving Materials Inc. That company agreed last year to pay a $29.2 million fine, the largest financial penalty ever in a domestic antitrust case. … 'We are pleased that the jury decided to hold accountable these participants in a price-fixing scheme that deprived consumers in Indianapolis of the benefit of a competitive marketplace,' Antitrust Division leader Thomas O. Barnett said in a statement. … As a result of the trial, the Beavers face maximum prison terms four times longer than those recommended for the ringleaders. The men face fines of up to $600,000 each. No sentencing date has been set."

The AP (11/17) reports, "Two other companies have been fined more than $30 million and several company executives have been sentenced to prison for their role in what prosecutors said was a scheme that lasted from January 2000 to May 2004 and resulted in millions of dollars in illegal profits. … Officials from the other companies testified during this week's trial that Chris Beaver, the operations manager for Beaver Materials, and Ricky Beaver, the commercial sales manager, attended meetings during which the firms agreed on prices and discounts and the timing of price increases." The AP adds, "The Beavers and the family owned company were the only ones whom prosecutors tied to the conspiracy that did not admit to their involvement. … Beaver Materials faces a potential fine of $10 million as a result of the verdict, but defense attorney Jeff Lockwood said he did not believe his clients regretted their decision to fight the allegations. … The scheme came to light last year when Irving Materials Inc. of Greenfield agreed to pay $29.2 million in fines, which prosecutors said was the largest ever assessed in a domestic antitrust investigation."

Former Elpida Memory Official To Plead Guilty In Chip Price-Fixing Probe. The AP (11/17) reports, "A former executive at a computer chip maker is the latest person to agree to plead guilty in a global U.S. Justice Department price-fixing probe, the government said Thursday." The AP continues, "D. James Sogas of Burlingame (CA), ex-vice president of sales for Elpida Memory, agreed to plead guilty to violating the Sherman Act. He agreed to serve a seven-month prison term and pay a $250,000 fine if the plea deal is approved by a federal judge."

AFP (11/17) reports, "Including Sogas, US prosecutors have charged four companies and 17 individuals, and have levied fines totaling more that 731 million dollars in the probe into price fixing of dynamic random access memory (DRAM), a widely used memory component in electronics. … 'The (Justice Department) antitrust division remains steadfast in its commitment to deter illegal cartel activity and to hold accountable those who participate in price fixing conspiracies,' said assistant attorney general for antitrust, Thomas Barnett." AFP adds, "According to the agency, DRAM is the most commonly used semiconductor memory product and is used in variety of computer, telecommunication, and consumer electronic products. .. .The chips are used in personal computers, mobile phones, digital cameras, video recorders, game consoles and digital music players. There were approximately 25 billion dollars in DRAM sales worldwide in 2005."

Bloomberg (11/17, Gullo) reports, "The plea agreement stems from a four-year federal investigation into price fixing in the chip market that has led to claims against four companies and 16 individuals, and fines of $731 million, the U.S. said. Worldwide DRAM sales were $25 billion in 2005, the Justice Department said. … Sogas has agreed to serve a sentence of seven months in prison and pay a $250,000 fine, prosecutors said. He is also cooperating with the federal investigation. Elpida agreed in January to pay $84 million to settle price-fixing charges. … Sogas is the first Elpida Memory executive to agree to a prison sentence in the DRAM investigation, the Justice Department said."

Private Equity Group Purchases Clear Channel For $18.7 Billion. The Financial Times (11/17, Politi) reports, "Two buy-out groups and five Wall Street banks on Thursday combined to buy Clear Channel Communications for $18.7bn, taking the largest US radio station chain private after a short but dramatic auction." The Times continues, "The deal, led by Bain Capital and Thomas H. Lee Partners, marks the latest and biggest effort by cash-rich private equity firms to refashion chunks of the traditional media industry challenged by the digital age." The Times adds, "The two firms will control a large outdoor advertising business and 1,200 radio stations accumulated in 30 years of deals by members of the Mays family, who founded Clear Channel in 1972 and will continue to run the company under its new owners. … JCDecaux, the French outdoor advertising company, said it was interested in buying Clear Channel Outdoor and the buyers 'are aware of our interest'. Analysts have speculated that any buyer of the radio group would sell the outdoor advertising business to help finance the transaction."

The Wall Street Journal (11/17, B1, Mcbride, Berman) reports, "In an age of intense competition from iPods, satellite radio and other glitzy new media, many investors have given up on the traditional radio industry. With an $18.7 billion buyout of radio giant Clear Channel Communications Inc., a group of private-equity investors is betting that the medium will be able to ride out the current storm much as it weathered past threats from television and other rivals." The Journal continues, "A group led by Thomas H. Lee Partners LP and Bain Capital LLC has agreed to acquire Clear Channel for $37.60 a share, plus the assumption of about $8 billion in debt. Thomas Lee and Bain beat out a second group comprising Providence Equity Partners Inc., Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co. and Blackstone Group, which had bid $36.85 a share. Each firm will have about a one-third equity stake, leaving the remaining third divided among a consortium of banks and the Mays family, who will be eligible for an options pool representing 3% to 5% of the new company. Mark Mays, currently chief executive, and Randall Mays, currently president and chief financial officer, will continue in those roles. Founder Lowry Mays may stay on as chairman emeritus." The Journal adds, "Separately, Clear Channel said it was selling its 42 television stations and 448 of its radio stations in smaller and medium-size markets. That would still leave the company a radio giant, with more than 700 stations around the country. … The deal is the latest in a string of private-equity transactions in the industry, underscoring the growing attraction of radio to private equity despite stagnant advertising revenue and other problems. The business's steady cash flow and what some see as an opportunity to increase revenue using new technologies such as digital radio have some investors saying the business has been undervalued by Wall Street."

The Washington Post (11/17, D01, Ahrens) reports, "Clear Channel Communications Inc. has agreed to sell the company to a consortium of private-equity firms and plans to shear off more than one-third of its 1,150 radio stations, dismantling a giant that dominated the industry and became the bogyman of media consolidation for the past half-decade." The Post continues, "Clear Channel is hard to avoid in Washington. It owns eight local radio stations, including popular rocker DC101, top 40 station Hot 99.5 and sports-talk WTEM-AM. It sells ad space atop hundreds of taxis and on the sides of bus stops and provides traffic updates through its Total Traffic Network unit. … The buyers, led by Bain Capital Partners and Thomas H. Lee Partners, agreed to pay $26.7 billion for the company, which includes the assumption of $8 billion in debt." The Post adds, "In a separate transaction also announced yesterday, Clear Channel said it would seek buyers for all of its television stations and 448 of its smaller radio stations, presumably because the private-equity buyers are not interested in owning television or small-market radio. The stations marked for sale are all outside the nation's top 100 markets, which would exclude Washington, the eighth largest. .. .The sell-off will mark the end of the consolidation era for the radio industry and its largest player, Clear Channel, and an acknowledgment by the company that it no longer is interested in smaller radio markets."

Reader's Digest Association Purchased By Ripplewood Holdings. The Wall Street Journal (11/17, B5, Ellison, Berman) reports, "Private-equity firm Ripplewood Holdings LLC, leading a group that agreed to buy Reader's Digest Association Inc. for $1.6 billion, now faces the tough challenge of turning around the long-declining magazine publisher." The Journal continues, "To help do so, Ripplewood plans to integrate its existing media businesses, which include Time Life Books and the Weekly Reader, with Reader's Digest direct-marketing machine. Aside from the pint-sized magazine, Reader's Digest publishes 26 other titles, including faster-growing names such as Every Day with Rachael Ray and Backyard Living." The Journal adds, "The deal comes as private-equity firms are bidding on a growing number of media properties struggling to cope with shifts in consumer habits brought on by the Internet and other new media. Reader's Digest, well known to many older Americans and people overseas, has been losing circulation for many years. … Four years ago, under pressure from investors unhappy with the company's performance, the founding Wallace family agreed to eliminate a dual-share voting structure that had allowed them to retain control of the company. … But there's been no improvement in the performance of the business, based in a sprawling colonial complex in Pleasantville, N.Y. Revenue has been flat for the past three years. And the company, which has taken write-downs of book-fair business Books Are Fun, has posted operating losses for the past two years."

RTL Considers Bid For ITV Group. The Financial Times (11/17, Edgecliffe-Johnson, Terazono) reports, "RTL, Europe's largest broadcaster, is working with private equity backers on a possible £5bn-plus ($9.4bn) offer for ITV, the UK television company that is waiting for NTL, the US-listed cable company, to formalise the bid approach it made last week." The Times continues, "Its plan envisages private equity groups putting up most of the funds needed to acquire ITV, which has a market capitalisation of £4.5bn and almost £1bn in debt. … The structure would allow RTL to acquire a minority stake without calling on Bertelsmann, the German media group that owns 90 per cent of its shares, to fund the deal." The Times adds, "After Bertelsmann bought out its only outside shareholder in May for €4.5bn ($5.8bn), it said its debt load would preclude any large deals until the end of 2007. … RTL would not comment, but the group is understood to be concerned about overpaying, so a steep rise in ITV's share price could yet derail its plans. One media executive cautioned that the plan had just a 50 per cent chance of succeeding. … A formal offer by NTL for ITV could also deter RTL. The chairmen of ITV and NTL have yet to meet, but NTL has already begun lining up financing for the deal, which would greatly increase its debt load, and has approached Michael Jackson, the former Channel 4 chief executive, to run ITV if its offer succeeds."

Johnson & Johnson To Purchase Conor Medsystems For $1.4 Billion. The AP (11/17) reports, "Johnson & Johnson said late Thursday it will buy cardiac stent maker Conor Medsystems Inc. for $33.50 per share in cash, for a total value of about $1.4 billion. The purchase price represents a 21 percent premium to Conor's Thursday closing stock price." The AP continues, "The company said the deal gives J&J's Cordis unit the controlled drug delivery technology currently used on the CoStar Stent System, a paclitaxel-eluting cobalt chromium stent with a bioabsorbable polymer. … The CoStar Stent is currently sold outside the United States, and enrollment in its U.S. pivotal clinical trial has been completed. The stent is used for the treatment of narrowing of the arteries and the company hopes it will be used as a treatment for heart attacks." The AP adds, "Conor Medsystems' CoStar Stent uses reservoir drug-delivery technology that enables site-specific drug delivery as well as the potential for delivery of multiple drugs that may be useful in the treatment of cardiovascular, peripheral vascular and neurovascular diseases. .. The boards of both J&J and Conor have approved the transaction, which is expected to close in the first quarter of 2007, subject to antitrust clearance, Conor stockholder approval and other customary closing conditions."

Antitrust Officials Wary Of Gas Price-Gouging Law. The AP (11/17, Apuzzo) reports, "The head of the Federal Trade Commission predicted Thursday that Congress would pass a gasoline price-gouging law despite her warnings that the country doesn't need one and it might cause fuel shortages." The AP continues, "FTC Chairwoman Deborah Platt Majoras said she has warned Congress publicly and privately about the dangers of such a law. … 'We looked very carefully but didn't see any new legislation needed to protect consumers,' Majoras said at an antitrust conference Thursday. 'Will new legislation be passed? I think we will see a price-gouging statute pass, perhaps at the end of this (incoming) Congress.'" The AP adds, "With gas prices rising to over $3 per gallon this spring, the House passed a bill permitting large fines and jail time for price gougers. The Senate has not acted on it and Sen. Max Baucus, D-Mont., the incoming Finance Committee chairman, said Thursday, 'There's a lot more that has a higher priority.' … Majoras said she understood the public's frustration and concern but said an upcoming FTC report on the price spikes found that consumer demand was up at the time. … Testifying in May before the Senate Commerce Committee, Majoras said retailers might let the gas run out rather than raise prices and risk facing prosecution. She noted the price spikes after Hurricane Katrina last year resulted in more fuel getting to market. … The Justice Department's top antitrust official, Assistant Attorney General Thomas O. Barnett, attended Thursday's conference and said addressing fuel prices was a tricky issue for his agency. … He said that like all cartels, the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries is bad for consumers. But he said any effort to hold OPEC to U.S. competition laws would have to be balanced with national security and diplomatic interests."

Delta Seeks Creditor Support To Dodge US Airways Takeover Bid. The Wall Street Journal (11/17, Perez, Trottman) reports, "Delta Air Lines began trying to rally support from creditors for its push to fend off an $8.76 billion hostile takeover bid by US Airways, with the Atlanta carrier firmly reiterating its determination to emerge from bankruptcy as a standalone company." The Journal continues, "Delta Chief Executive Gerald Grinstein and other executives at the third-largest U.S. airline by traffic held a series of conference calls yesterday with creditors to sift through terms of US Airways' cash-and-stock offer, pressing creditors to back Delta's restructuring plan. The move could give Delta an early advantage in its fight to remain independent, since US Airways hasn't had any face-to-face meetings with Delta's official creditors committee. … US Airways officials were still trying to arrange a meeting with representatives of Delta's official creditors committee. People familiar with the situation said such a meeting could come as early as next week, with Delta officials expected to attend." The Journal notes, "The Atlanta airline said the executives were reviewing the unsolicited proposal, which seeks to combine US Airways, based in Tempe, Ariz., with its much bigger rival under the Delta name and become the biggest US airline in terms of passenger traffic."

Experts Differ On Merger's Potential Consumer Impact. The Christian Science Monitor (11/17, Marks) reports, "Whenever a big airline deal is proposed, the first question that arises usually is: What will it mean for the flying public? … In the case of US Airways' announcement this week that it hopes to acquire bankrupt Delta Air Lines for $8 billion, the simple answer is: higher prices. … That's because the merger would cut capacity by about 10 percent - in other words, passengers would have 10 percent fewer seats to choose from when they fly, which usually drives up prices. That would be good for the overall industry's bottom line. .. .But the dynamics behind this proposed merger, and the still precarious state of the nation's recovering aviation industry in the post-9/11 world, make the ramifications for the public far less clear. Add to that, it's far from a done deal: It still needs approval from the bankruptcy courts and the Justice Department. As a result, analysts have starkly different assessments of 'just what this will mean.'" The Monitor notes, "One camp thinks it's the best thing to happen to the industry bottom line since jet fuel prices dropped below $70 a barrel. That's because it will cut capacity. … But a different school of thought says that with planes already flying 80-to-90 percent full, overcapacity in the industry is no longer a major issue. After all, the traditional, so-called legacy carriers are making money even with oil at $60 a barrel."

USA Today (11/17, Reed, Hansen) reports, "Travelers in at least two dozen Eastern and Southeastern cities would see their air travel options significantly reduced by a merger between US Airways and Delta Air Lines." USA continues, "According to a USA TODAY analysis of airline data from Back Aviation Solutions, a merged carrier would have 50% or more of the scheduled capacity in 111 markets in the USA. That's up from 55 markets for US Airways and 31 markets for Delta. Both carriers are strong in the East and South, so not surprisingly, many of the communities that would see the biggest loss of choice are there, too." USA adds, "Delta management has been resistant to any takeover bid, and says it prefers to emerge from bankruptcy reorganization next year as an independent carrier. Delta CEO Gerald Grinstein had previously rejected two private approaches from his counterpart at US Airways, Doug Parker. … The proposed deal would require approval from the bankruptcy court, federal antitrust officials and US Airways shareholders."

US Airways' CEO No Stranger To Bold Moves. The AP (11/17, Weber) reports, "When JetBlue announced in April it was launching flights to Charlotte, N.C., a major hub city for US Airways, JetBlue's CEO belittled the service passengers in that city had been getting as 'substandard.' … US Airways' chief executive, Doug Parker, shot back in a letter to his own employees: 'US Airways is going to be here long after JetBlue.'" The AP continues, "Analysts, industry experts and those familiar with Parker's reputation said Thursday the 45-year-old's hostile bid to acquire a bigger rival in Delta Air Lines was not surprising, given bold statements like that one. … 'I think anybody has to be feisty to do what he's doing,' said Boston University School of Management Professor Allen Michel, referring to the unsolicited offer for Delta launched Wednesday by US Airways. The cash and stock bid to buy Delta once it emerges from bankruptcy is currently valued at $8.8 billion." The AP adds, "Parker's also been described as genial and approachable. Observers say those qualities could help him and his Tempe, Ariz.-based airline win over Delta employees. … Parker, who has held management positions at Northwest Airlines and American Airlines, led America West when it bought US Airways last year and adopted the US Airways name. While he's still integrating the two carriers, he says he's ready to tackle an even bigger challenge in acquiring Delta. This time, the company would keep the Delta name, becoming the nation's largest carrier in terms of revenue. … Delta's chief executive, Gerald Grinstein, said in a memo to employees late Wednesday that the Atlanta-based airline is committed to its plan to emerge from bankruptcy as a standalone carrier. … He also said 'the history of mergers in the airline industry is almost always one of failure, with over-promise of synergies and under-delivery of results.' … Parker clearly has a different view, that consolidation is the wave of the future in the airline industry. He also knows that the bankruptcy process gives him an opportunity to pitch an alternative plan to Delta's creditors. Whether his bid for Delta works or not, analysts tend to agree with Parker that major carriers need to combine to reduce capacity in the industry."

NYTimes Warns About "Dampened Competition" If Airline Merger Goes Through. The New York Times (11/17, 1.16M) editorializes, "US Airways' $8 billion offer for Delta Air Lines could kick off a wave of consolidation in the airline industry. The question for regulators is whether the result is a leaner, meaner industry with lower costs or just a case of less competition driving prices higher. Without allowing a free-for-all to break out, there is clearly some room for combining operations in this changing industry." But "the fact that the two airlines offer competing shuttle service between Boston, New York and Washington raises a big concern: that all these savings could come about as a result of dampened competition and thus at the expense of consumers. … Domestic carriers should take care when it comes to raising fares. There are plenty of foreign carriers that would love to gain access to the United States domestic market. If the locals get lazy and expensive, they could compel Congress to open the door to outside competition. It wouldn't be a bad idea to re-examine the idea now, before the merger wave has crested."

Grupo Mexico To Fight Antitrust Ruling Against Railway Merger. The AP (11/17) reports, "Mexican mining and railroad company Grupo Mexico said Thursday it will fight the federal antitrust commission's decision to uphold a previous ruling that blocked the company's plans to merge two railways. … The company 'will take all legal means at its disposal' to fight the ruling, Grupo Mexico said in a filing with the Mexican stock exchange." The AP continues, "In November 2005, Grupo Mexico said it would merge its Ferromex unit with Ferrosur, controlled by multibillionaire Carlos Slim. The antitrust commission rejected the proposed merger in June, and Grupo Mexico appealed. … The commission rejected the appeal on Wednesday, arguing that a merger would have led to excessive concentration in the railroad industry to the detriment of consumers and competitors." The AP adds, 'Grupo Mexico has argued it must expand in order to compete with U.S.-based railroad Kansas City Southern. .. .Kansas City Southern last year gained full control of local railway TFM, which runs through the heart of Mexico's industrial region to the border town of Nuevo Laredo from the Pacific port of Lazaro Cardenas."

Energy Interests Split On Drilling Legislation In Lame Duck Session. The Wall Street Journal (11/17, Harwood, 2.04M) reports in its "Washington Wire" that energy interests are "split on lame-duck drilling legislation. Industry, agriculture and labor groups seek House passage of Senate's offshore drilling bill, which would send measure to Bush's desk. 'We've got a bird in the hand,' says Jack Gerard of American Chemistry Council." Some companies "hold out for more ambitious House bill, which would allow states such as Virginia to opt out of anti-drilling moratoria. Robert Slaughter of National Petrochemical and Refiners Association says 'it will be difficult' to get Democratic majorities to revisit the issue later."

Oil Prices Plunge To Lowest Level In A Year. ABC World News (11/16, story 8, 0:10, Gibson, 8.78M) reported "the price of crude oil fell sharply" yesterday today. It "plunged by $2.50 a barrel, closing at the lowest price in a year." The New York Times (11/17, Mouawad, 1.16M) says "oil traders expressed doubt that OPEC members would carry out on their recent deal to trim production." Crude "for December delivery lost 4.25 percent, or $2.50 a barrel, to settle at $56.26. The drop, the steepest in 15 months, came as oil and natural gas inventories increased as a result of milder weather in the United States and Europe, reducing demand." The Times adds, "The uncertainty surrounding OPEC policies underscores the cartel's difficulties in coping with a slowing market after three years of rising prices and surging demand. Analysts view the group as too divided to be effective: at best, they expect OPEC members to fulfill only half the cuts pledged in Qatar."

WSJournal Urges House To Pass Senate Offshore Drilling Bill. In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (11/17, A20, 2.04M) writes that if the lame-duck Congress "wants an easy victory for the U.S. economy it'll whip through the offshore drilling bill that has passed the Senate and awaits action in conference." The legislation "doesn't go nearly as far as we or many in the House would like, but it's the best opportunity for new U.S. energy exploration in years." Short supplies and high prices for natural gas "are punishing American industry, causing plant closures and job flight overseas. It is one of the larger economic messes in recent history, yet the political class barely mentions it -- perhaps because the politicians have done more than anyone to cause it." The Journal writes, "[W]ith coastal, anti-drilling Democrats set to run Congress next year, now is the time for the House to swallow its pride, pass the Senate version without amendment to avoid a conference, and send it to President Bush."

FTC Head Predicts Congress Will Pass Gasoline Price Gouging Bill. The AP (11/16, Apuzzo) reports, "The head of the Federal Trade Commission predicted Thursday that Congress would pass a gasoline price-gouging law despite her warnings that the country doesn't need one and it might cause fuel shortages. FTC Chairwoman Deborah Platt Majoras said she has warned Congress publicly and privately about the dangers of such a law." In the spring, "the House passed a bill permitting large fines and jail time for price gougers. The Senate has not acted on it and Sen. Max Baucus, D-Mont., the incoming Finance Committee chairman, said Thursday, 'There's a lot more that has a higher priority.'" In testimony before a Senate committee in May, "Majoras said retailers might let the gas run out rather than raise prices and risk facing prosecution."

California Board Prepares Effort To Combat Global Warming. The Wall Street Journal (11/17, Fialka, 2.04M) reports California's Air Resources Board is "a semi-independent agency that has been given the job of drawing up the nation's first regulatory program intended to reduce greenhouse-gas emissions by all sectors of the economy." To accomplish this, Dr. Robert Sawyer, the chairman, "and his agency, which is known outside California as CARB, will likely face fierce lobbying by industries and consumer groups, and difficult political questions that haven't yet been answered in the U.S." But California regulations "have shaped national legislation in the past, and CARB's efforts will be closely watched by other states and by the new Democratic Congress in Washington, where emissions reduction is likely to get increased traction." The change "will be most dramatic in the Senate, where Barbara Boxer, a California Democrat, will succeed James Inhofe, an Oklahoma Republican, as chairman of the Committee on Environment and Public Works." Boxer, "who believes 'global warming could reshape the world as we know it,' says she will introduce federal legislation that is similar to California's."

Ethanol Boosters May Shoot Down Pheasant Hunting Boom. The Wall Street Journal (11/17, A1, Hallinan) reports from Vivian, SD, "For nearly 100 years, LeRoy 'Frenchy' Authier's family has ranched and farmed along the banks of a slender stream known as Medicine Creek. … They grew wheat and raised cattle. But farms got bigger and prices got lower and after a while, the money didn't add up the way it used to. So nine years ago Mr. Authier's 46-year-old son, Mike, and his wife, Katherine, sold off the last of the cattle and turned to a new crop: pheasants." The Journal continues, "Today, they have four separate lodges on their land, including a converted barn and granary, that can accommodate up to 35 guests a day. Called the Medicine Creek Pheasant Ranch, about 30 miles south of the state capital of Pierre, it draws hunters from across the country. … Thanks to a federal program that pays farmers to idle millions of acres, the once-decimated pheasant is making a comeback. Many states in the nation's midsection are reporting their biggest populations of the game bird in nearly a half century. Hunters are also turning out in force, willing to pay people like the Authiers thousands of dollars a week to shoot the birds. … One result is an unexpected boom that is raising land values, propping up farms and generating new businesses in many parts of the Great Plains. In a good year the Authiers' pheasant operation will gross six times what the farm did, allowing them to raise their children in the house where Frenchy was born." The Journal notes, "The pheasant phenomenon has created an unusual alliance of farmers, hunters and environmentalists bent on preserving the program that pays farmers to leave some lands idle. For them, the biggest threat to the bird's well-being today isn't coyotes. It's corn, which is used to make ethanol -- the other big growth industry on the Plains. High oil prices have created intense interest in ethanol, an alternative fuel usually mixed with gasoline. As Congress prepares to write next year's farm bill, some want to see a portion of idled cropland planted with corn for ethanol production."

Michigan Land To Be Taken Into Tribal Trust. Indian Country Today (11/13, Toensing) reports from Bradley, MI, "The Match-E-Be-Nash-She-Wish Band of Pottawatomi's planned casino and entertainment center took a great leap forward recently when the federal government announced it would take land into trust for the project early next year." ICT continues, "The Interior Department will take 146 acres in Allegan County into trust for the tribe, which is known as the Gun Lake Tribe, on Jan. 5, 2007, according to an Oct. 27 Justice Department filing in the U.S. District Court in Washington, D.C., and with Michigan Gambling Opposition (MichGO), an anti-Indian casino group. … 'This is another very significant step forward for our tribe. We applaud the actions of the federal government in their efforts to provide relief to the tribe and the local communities that are eager for the thousands of jobs and economic growth the casino will provide,' Chairman D.K. Sprague said. … The tribe expects to begin construction next spring, Sprague said." ICT adds, "MichGO has until Jan. 5 to file an injunction against Interior, a legal step the group will take, spokesman John Helmholdt said. … 'MichGO will be filing the preliminary motion for injunction and we're going to continue to cooperate and work with the court in a timely manner and leave it up to the court to decide,' Helmholdt said. … The 300-member Gun Lake Tribe was federally acknowledged in 1999, but its effort to take land into trust have been snarled in court and at Interior since then. … Interior granted final approval to the tribe's land into trust application in May 2005. MichGO immediately challenged Interior in a lawsuit that is pending in the Washington federal court." ICT notes, "Last January, the tribe and the Justice Department filed for a summary judgment of MichGO's lawsuit, but the court has not acted since then. Around the same time, a federal appeals court dismissed an identical lawsuit that sought to delay the Pokagon Band of Potawatomi from developing Four Winds Casino Resort in southwestern Michigan. The dismissal set a precedent for MichGo's action against Gun Lake."

Track Coach Pleads Not Guilty In BALCO Probe. The AP (11/17, Kravets) reports, "Elite track coach Trevor Graham pleaded not guilty Thursday to accusations he hindered a continuing government steroids probe targeting high-profile athletes." The AP continues, "Graham, who has trained Justin Gatlin, Marion Jones and Tim Montgomery, is charged with three counts of making false statements to federal agents in an indictment issued Nov. 1 by the grand jury investigating performance-enhancing drugs in professional sports. … Graham was freed on US$25,000 bond after appearing before U.S. Magistrate Edwin Chen." The AP adds, "Graham operates Raleigh, North Carolina-based Sprint Capitol USA, a team of about 10 athletes that includes Gatlin, the 100-meter co-world record holder who tested positive for testosterone and other steroids in April."

The Washington Post (11/17) reports, "Graham, who faces three counts of making false statements about his relationship with an admitted steroid dealer, appeared in front of U.S. Magistrate Edwin Chen in San Francisco. … He began the massive steroids probe now known as BALCO (Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative), which has resulted in four criminal convictions but combined sentences of less than a year in prison."

Bloomberg (11/16) reports Graham "obtained illegal performance-enhancing drugs from an unidentified source and lied about it to U.S. Internal Revenue Service agents who interviewed him in June 2004, according to the U.S. Attorney's office in San Francisco. Graham also lied about his contacts with the supplier, the statement said. … Graham, who is based in North Carolina, wasn't charged with distributing steroids."

Cable TV Coverage. ESPN (11/16, 7:00 p.m.) aired, "Track coach Trevor Graham pleaded not guilty today to accusations he hindered a probe targeting slugger Barry Bonds and other high-profile athletes. Graham…is charged with making false statements to federal agents. Those charges came in an indictment issued by a grand jury investigating performance-enhancing drugs in professional sports."

CNN (11/16, 4:00 p.m.) aired, "Track coach Trevor Graham has pleaded not guilty to accusations that he hindered a government probe into steroids. Graham is out on bond on three counts of making false statements to federal agents."

Local TV Coverage. KNTV-TV, San Francisco-Oakland-San Jose (11/16, 6:00 p.m.) aired, "The man who sparked the BALCO story and investigation pleaded not guilty to lying about his role. A grand jury indicted Trevor Graham…on three charges of making false statements. They interviewed him in 2000 under immunity agreements but it did not cover lying."

KTVU-TV, San Francisco-Oakland-San Jose (11/16, 6:00 p.m.) aired, "Track coach Trevor Graham pleaded not guilty this morning in connection with the BALCO steroids scandal. Graham is charged with three counts of making false statements to federal agents. A federal grand jury indicted Graham two weeks ago."

Anderson Sent To Prison A Third Time. There are more than 300 media references to trainer Greg Anderson being ordered to return to prison for refusing to testify about alleged steroid use by Barry Bonds. Many media outlets combined their stories about Anderson's and Graham's court appearances. The Washington Post (11/17) reports a federal appeals court in San Francisco "ruled yesterday that Barry Bonds's personal trainer must return to prison for refusing to testify before a grand jury investigating performance-enhancing drugs in professional sports. Greg Anderson, 40, already has served two other brief prison stints for refusing to testify whether his boyhood friend lied when he said he never knowingly used steroids. Both times, Anderson, held in contempt of court, was released on procedural grounds. Anderson could serve more than a year behind bars unless he agrees to tell the grand jury what he knows about Bonds's alleged steroids use."

The Los Angeles Times (11/17) reports Anderson's attorney "argued that Anderson shouldn't testify because prosecutors are relying on information that they gained in an illegally obtained recording of Anderson discussing steroids in 2004. Prosecutors counter that their questions to Anderson are based on a search they conducted of Anderson's home, along with other athletes' secret testimony."

The AP (11/17) reports Anderson "has already been behind bars twice after being held in contempt of court for his refusal to testify to a grand jury investigating Bonds on allegations of perjury and tax evasion. Both times, the prison stints were cut short because of legal technicalities."

Cable TV Coverage. ESPN (11/16, 5:00 p.m.) aired, "Greg Anderson must report to the federal correctional institution in Dublin, California, in two days, and he could serve more than a year behind bars unless he agrees to testify against the Giants slugger. The grand jury is investigating whether Bonds lied when he said he never knowingly used steroids."

Local TV Coverage. KABC-TV, Los Angeles (11/16, 6:00 p.m.) aired, "Barry Bonds's trainer Greg Anderson was released from prison a month ago and within two weeks refused to testify against his friend before a grand jury for a third time, so for the third time Anderson has been ordered back to jail for contempt. This time he could sit in jail for a year, unless he talks."

KNSD-TV, San Diego (11/16, 4:00 p.m.) aired, "Baseball's Barry Bonds's trainer is heading back to prison for refusing to testify before a grand jury. An appeals court in San Francisco today ruled Greg Anderson [report to] a federal facility within two days. He could serve more than a year behind bars unless he agrees to tell the grand jury what he knows about Bonds's alleged steroid use."

KNBC-TV, Los Angeles (11/16, 5:00 p.m.) aired, "An appeals court in San Francisco ruled today that Greg Anderson must report to a federal facility within than two days. He could serve more than a year behind bars unless he agrees to tell the grand jury about what he knows about Bonds's alleged steroid use."

KPIX-TV, San Francisco-Oakland-San Jose (11/16, 6:00 p.m.) aired, "A federal appeals court ruled today that Barry Bonds's personal trainer Greg Anderson must go back to prison for refusing to testify before a grand jury investigating performance-enhancing drugs in professional sports. The friend of Bonds has been to prison twice this year and is ordered to return by November 20. This time, he could serve as much as a year."

Man Admits Selling Fentanyl-Laced Heroin Linked To 2 Deaths In Detroit. The Detroit News (11/16) reports a Detroit man "faces more than 24 years in prison after he admitted…to distributing heroin laced with the painkiller fentanyl that killed two people. U.S. District Judge Lawrence P. Zatkoff will sentence James Edgar Coleman, 36, on Feb. 6 on two counts of distributing a controlled substance causing death." Coleman "said he did not know the heroin contained fentanyl."

The Detroit Free Press (11/16, Schaefer) reports, "As part of a plea deal, Coleman would be sentenced to 24 1/3 years to nearly 30 ½ years. Coleman's lawyer, Warren Harris, said his client was sorry and took the deal because he could have gotten life in prison on other charges the government issued."

The AP (11/16) reports Coleman "entered the plea to two counts of delivery of a controlled substance resulting in death."

Judge In California Tentatively Rejects Medical Marijuana Challenge. The San Diego Union-Tribune (11/16, Mcdonald) reports a Superior Court judge "rejected an argument Thursday from San Diego County that the state medical marijuana laws are illegal because they conflict with federal drug prohibitions. In a tentative ruling, Judge William R. Nevitt Jr., said California laws permitting chronically ill patients to grow and smoke marijuana are voluntary, and as such do not automatically conflict with federals laws banning pot. … It is unclear whether Nevitt will issue a formal ruling from the bench or take the case under submission."

The North County Times (11/16) reports the county "argued that the California law should be 'pre-empted' by federal law, which says all marijuana use is illegal, under the U.S. Constitution's 'Supremacy Clause,' which says federal laws should be 'supreme' over state laws. Nevitt, however, said in his tentative ruling that the county's argument ignored the corollary to the Supremacy Clause that held in matters where states traditionally legislate, state law is considered pre-eminent."

The AP (11/16) reports San Diego County "sued the state of California in February after the Board of Supervisors refused to follow state rules requiring them to issue identification cards to medical marijuana users."

In a separate story, the AP reports, (11/17) attorneys for San Diego County "argued Thursday before a state court judge that the federal ban on marijuana use precludes states from exempting people who use the drug for medical purposes. … Nevitt did not indicate when a final ruling would be issued but set a Dec. 1 deadline for additional briefs on issues related to the case. In his tentative ruling, Nevitt agreed with attorneys for the state, who argued that California is entitled to pass its own drug laws and legislate programs that allow marijuana use for medical purposes."

On its Web site, KGTV-TV, San Diego (11/17) reports after hearing oral arguments…Nevitt declined to issue a final decision in the lawsuit brought by San Diego, San Bernardino and Merced counties. … The suit was filed against the local chapter of the National Organization for the Reform of Marijuana Laws, or NORML, after the San Diego County Board of Supervisors refused to implement part of the state law requiring officials to issue identification cards to medical marijuana users to protect them from prosecution. The American Civil Liberties Union, Americans for Safe Access and Drug Policy Alliance joined San Diego NORML in fighting the suit."

In Tennessee, Man Pleads Guilty In Marijuana, Money Laundering Conspiracy. The Knoxville (TN) News Sentinel (11/17, Satterfield) reports, Assistant U.S. Attorney Hugh Ward on Thursday "laid bare in U.S. District Court the details of Arizona drug supplier Phillip Arthur Apodaca's role in the marijuana-peddling conspiracy case involving Market Square businessman Scott West and his brother." Apodaca "pleaded guilty to charges of conspiring to push more than a ton of marijuana and plotting to launder at least $2.5 million in drug money. … Apodaca already faces a boost in his basic penalty range because the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, which toppled the West conspiracy, found guns in the supplier's possession when he was nabbed, Ward said."

ATF Joins Search For Suspects In Detroit Shootings. The AP (11/17, Vample) reports, "Police arrested a man suspected in a series of shootings Thursday that left two people dead and three others wounded within a span of 10 minutes." The AP continues, "The shootings took place shortly after 6 a.m. in a three- to four-block area on the city's west side, Detroit police spokesman James Tate said. … Killed were Arthur James Smith, 49, and Othelia Fry, 58, both of Detroit, said Yvette Walker, a Detroit police spokeswoman. The wounded men - Elton Ash, 51, Dennis Anderson, 49, and James L. Brown, 50 - were treated at Henry Ford Hospital and released, hospital spokeswoman Synthia Bryant said." The AP adds, "Police arrested the suspect Thursday afternoon at a house about a half-mile from where the shootings occurred, The Detroit News reported on its Web site. … Investigators received a tip from a woman who told them the suspect told her he had shot five people in the morning. The woman led police to the man, the newspaper said. … The U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives was offering a $10,000 reward for information leading to the arrest and conviction of those responsible for the shootings. … 'The magnitude of the violence, coupled with a gunman - or gunmen - at large precipitated our offer of assistance to the Detroit Police Department and our involvement in the manhunt,' said Valerie J. Goddard, the agent in charge of the ATF's Detroit office."

DHS IG Warns House Panel Of Risks In Virtual Border Fence Contract. In an article appearing on more than 50 news websites, the AP (11/16) reported an audit from DHS IG Richard L. Skinner says the department's plans for a "virtual fence" along the Southwestern border "could cost 15 times the initial $2 billion estimate," with early estimates ranging "from $8 billion to $30 billion." DHS spokesman Russ Knocke said he was not sure where Skinner's "numbers are coming from." He added that "the agency was open to listening to Skinner's ideas on how to strengthen oversight of the program." Skinner told the House Homeland Security Committee's management subcommittee Wednesday "that the type of contract awarded to Boeing for the border program creates additional risks that, 'unless properly managed, threaten achievement of cost, schedule, performance, and, ultimately, mission objectives.'"

IRS Filing Shows Minutemen Outspent Donations. The Washington Times (11/17, Seper, 88K) reports the Minuteman Civil Defense Corps, "under fire for a lack of financial accountability, spent nearly $450,000 last year for volunteers to patrol the U.S.-Mexico border -- about $31,000 more than it collected in donations and registration fees -- according to a report released yesterday." The organization's "first Internal Revenue Service Form 990 filing as a 501(c)4 tax-exempt charitable trust showed nearly $285,000 in MCDC contributions, or roughly 63 percent, were used to pay for program management and operating expenses, such as travel expenditures, salaries, educational materials and office expenses. Another $145,000, about 32 percent, went for MCDC's fundraising programs." The reports says "about $20,000, or 5 percent, was spent on field supplies, meals, fuel and background checks for the claimed 8,500 Minuteman volunteers, who last year staffed observation posts at selected points along the Mexican border from California to Texas in April and October." While the IRS papers "document MCDC collections and expenditures through Dec. 31, a reported donation total of $418,493 is significantly less than the $1.6 million MCDC President Chris Simcox told The Washington Times in July that the group had collected in donations since its April 2005 creation. That figure was said to include $1 million in direct MCDC contributions and $600,000 toward the construction of a $55 million border fence."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush's Agenda Said To Contradict Calls For Bipartisanship. McClatchy (11/17, Thomma) reports, "President Bush made nice with the Democrats for the television cameras after they won control of Congress, complete with pictures filled with handshakes, smiles and vows of working together. He even tossed Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld over the side, making many people think that maybe he was going to move more toward the center and reach out for bipartisan openings." However, "the agenda he's sent to Congress since then is full of Republican proposals that have no chance of winning bipartisan approval, enrage Democrats, rally his conservative base and appear to be intended to paint Democrats as obstructionist." Bush "has resubmitted several judicial nominations that had been blocked even before last week's elections. He's asked again that the Senate confirm John Bolton as ambassador to the United Nations. And he's urged approval of warrantless eavesdropping on suspected terrorists without any accommodation to Democrats' demands that a court sign off on the spying." These proposals "could be simply his opening bid in what would be a tough round of negotiations with the Democrats. Or they could be a political gambit designed to frame the Democrats early on as obstructionists while rallying a conservative base dispirited by last week's election losses. Either way, they contradict the initial post-election image that indicated that Bush was ready to reach out to Democrats."

Keroack Appointment "Latest Provocative Personnel Move" By Bush. The Washington Post (11/17, Lee, 690K) reports, "The Bush administration has appointed a new chief of family-planning programs at the Department of Health and Human Services who worked at a Christian pregnancy-counseling organization that regards the distribution of contraceptives as 'demeaning to women.'" Eric Keroack is "medical director for A Woman's Concern, a nonprofit group based in Dorchester, Mass." He "will become deputy assistant secretary for population affairs in the next two weeks, department spokeswoman Christina Pearson said yesterday." Keroack "will advise Secretary Mike Leavitt on matters such as reproductive health and adolescent pregnancy. He will oversee $283 million in annual family-planning grants that, according to HHS, are 'designed to provide access to contraceptive supplies and information to all who want and need them with priority given to low-income persons.'" The appointment "does not require Senate confirmation." It "was the latest provocative personnel move by the White House since Democrats won control of Congress in this month's midterm elections." The Los

NYTimes, WPost Chide Bush Over Judicial Nominations. In an editorial titled "Still Waiting For Bipartisanship," the New York Times (11/17, 1.16M) writes, "The voters sent a clear message last week that they do not want the far right of the Republican Party calling the shots in Washington. But President Bush has ignored the message, resubmitting a group of archconservative, underqualified judicial nominees that Senate Democrats have already said are unacceptable. With the Democrats about to take control of the Senate, it is highly unlikely that these men will be confirmed. But the renominations suggest that when it comes to filling judgeships, Mr. Bush is still not looking for either excellence or common ground. … Beyond their ideology, these nominees embody values that the American people rejected in the midterm elections."

The Washington Post (11/17, 690K) editorializes, "Given his pledges of bipartisanship…Bush's decision to resubmit a crop of his most controversial judicial nominations strikes a discordant note. … The real test of Mr. Bush's commitment to a more bipartisan approach to nominations will come in January, when he confronts the new Congress and its Democratic-led Senate Judiciary Committee. At that point, he should decline to renominate four of the current group of nominees. Democrats have valid objections on the merits to William J. Haynes II, William G. Myers III, Terrence W. Boyle Jr. and Michael B. Wallace -- all nominees to federal appeals courts." Peter D. Keisler, "Bush's highly qualified nominee to the US Court of Appeals for the DC Circuit…certainly warrants confirmation. Yet like a string of qualified nominees to the same court before him, he is caught up in a dispute over how many seats the court should have."

Some Think Rove's Days Are Numbered In Weeks, Not Months. The White House Bulletin / US News (11/16) reported, "The rumors that chief White House political architect Karl Rove will leave sometime next year are being bolstered with new insider reports that his partisan style is a hurdle to President Bush's new push for bipartisanship. 'Karl represents the old style and he's got to go if the Democrats are going to believe Bush's talk of getting along,' said a key Bush advisor. Other elements are also at play: The election of Sen. Trent Lott to the number two GOP leadership position in the Senate is also a threat to the White House and Rove, who worked against him when he battled to save his majority leader's job after his insensitive remarks about Sen. Strom Thurmond. And insiders report that Bush counsel Harriet Miers isn't a fan, believing that Rove didn't do enough to help her failed Supreme Court nomination among conservatives. In fact, one top West Wing advisor said that the unexpected ouster of Rove aide Susan Ralston over ethics questions was orchestrated by Miers as a signal to Rove to leave. The advisor said that Rove is aware of the situation and that a departure might come in 'weeks, not months.' A Rove ally, however, noted that he has a record of out-witting his critics."

Democratic Congress Expected To Approve Minimum Wage Increase. The CBS Evening News (11/16, story 4, 2:35, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "With the Democrats in charge of the new Congress, Senator Edward Kennedy will chair the committee that deals with the Federal minimum wage. It's now $5.15 an hour, and Kennedy said again today that raising it is at the top of his agenda." CBS (Bowers) added, "Illinois is one of 23 states with a higher minimum wage than the $5.15 level set by the Federal Government nearly a decade ago. This month, voters in six more states overwhelmingly approved getting a raise to minimum wage workers and adding a cost of living adjustment. It's an issue that's gaining traction with Americans. Incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi promises to make it a priority, putting pressure on President Bush to go along." Rose Elsenbrey, Economic Policy Institute: "I think that we will see a minimum wage increase within the next six or eight months."

The AP (11/17, Freking) reports President Bush "signaled readiness last week to consider some Democratic priorities such as a minimum-wage increase, overhauling immigration policy and finding compromise on renewing the No Child Left Behind education law."

Kennedy Aims To Extend Universal Coverage To Children. The Washington Times (11/17, Fagan, 88K) reports, "The soon-to-be chairman of the Senate health panel said yesterday his ultimate goal is to have the government provide health care coverage for all Americans." Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D) "said he knows it will take awhile to gain support for the idea, so he will focus in the meantime on extending coverage to different groups, starting with covering more children under the existing Children's Health Insurance Program (CHIP) -- something he thinks there is 'a lot of sentiment for.'" But Kennedy, "who yesterday laid out his agenda for the Health Education Labor and Workforce Committee, said universal health care is the goal."

Bush Administration Said To Be Redefining "Hunger." ABC World News (11/16, story 6, 2:35, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "In Washington, it's hard to believe. But the government has eliminated hunger. How did they do it? In a key government report, the word hunger is no longer being used to describe people without enough food. 35 million Americans fit into that category last year. The government called them hungry then. But no more." ABC (Stark) added,

"Only in Washington could there be a debate about the meaning of the word hunger." Those who lack food now "have 'very low food security.'" Deborah Leff, Public welfare Foundation: "When they hear 'very low food security,' if sounds like bureaucratic jargon. It doesn't sound like people who can't get enough to eat." Stark: "Some say that may be the point. Just last year, the government used the word 'hunger' to describe, for example, those who run out of food and have no money to buy more, or families where parents skip meals so their children can eat. They were labeled as having 'food insecurity with hunger.' Now, they have 'very low food security.' 'Hunger' is out. The Bush Administration defends the change, saying it's based on recommendations from the national academies, which questioned whether the report truly measures hunger or just access to food."

WPost Mocks USDA's Avoidance Of Term "Hunger." The Washington Post (11/17, 690K) editorializes, "The agriculture Department has taken what you might call the Scarlett O'Hara approach to Americans without enough to eat: It will never call them hungry again. Rumbling stomachs? Malnourishment? That's not hunger, the department says. It's experiencing 'very low food security.' Maybe there's some scientific basis for this Orwellian recasting. … At least the USDA doesn't have jurisdiction over national monuments. Otherwise, just imagine it going after the inscription on the Statue of Liberty next: 'Give me your energy-deficient, your financially challenged, your space-impaired masses yearning to breathe free.'"

Democrats Snub Pelosi, Select Hoyer As Majority Leader. On the day in which she made history by coming the first woman speaker of the House, Nancy Pelosi is having to deal with very negative media coverage. The AP reports Democrats yesterday elected her "by acclamation," then "quickly snubbed her, selecting Steny Hoyer of Maryland as majority leader against her wishes." Pelosi had endorsed Rep. John Murtha, but "the secret-ballot vote for Hoyer was 149-86." Pelosi's own election is being largely overshadowed by Murtha's defeat. A number of reports and analyses pieces refer to Democrats rebuffing or stunning the Speaker-elect, and suggest the election fiasco raises questions about Pelosi's leadership. CNN's The Situation Room (11/16, Bash) said that "even before she takes the gavel, Pelosi is facing questions about whether she made a major strategic blunder." Democratic strategist Paul Begala, also on CNN's The Situation Room (11/16, Blitzer), said "It's a bigger defeat for Nancy Pelosi than for Jack Murtha." Pelosi "takes it on the chin here."

The CBS Evening News (11/16, story 2, 1:15, Couric, 7.66M) said Pelosi's "moment of triumph was followed by her first big political setback." Also on the CBS Evening News (11/16, story 3, 1:45, 7.66M), Bob Schiefer said the Murtha-Hoyer debate "has made the gap" between liberal and conservative Democrats in the caucus "even wider" and "it has raised real questions about her judgment." On ABC World News (11/16, story 5, 2:50, Gibson, 8.78M) George Stephanopoulos was asked to consider what Murtha's loss says "about her ability to lead the Democrats in the House." Stephanopoulos said "a lot of her opponents are saying they hope she learned a lesson, not to put personal loyalty above the interests of her caucus."

NBC Nightly News (11/16, story 4, 1:35, Reid, 9.87M) called it "a stunning defeat," and showed Pelosi saying, "We've had our debates and disagreements in that room and now that is over. As I said to my colleagues, as we say in church, let there be peace on earth and let it begin with us."

The Washington Post (11/17, Weisman, Romano, 690K) says the vote exposes "a deep political divide even before the party takes control." The vote "was viewed by many in the party as a repudiation of Pelosi's strong-arm tactics. … Pelosi's aggressive, last-minute campaign for Murtha in the face of overwhelming support for Hoyer left many Democrats worried that she has become too reliant on a tight inner circle, too reluctant to listen to the broader Democratic caucus and mistakenly convinced that she can dictate the direction the caucus must take."

The Los Angeles Times (11/17, Hook, Simon, 850K) headlines its front-page report "Pelosi's Early Setback Has Her Party On Alert," and says Democrats "gave Pelosi a brusque lesson in the limits of her power." It was "a battle that many felt Pelosi made unnecessarily bitter." Hoyer "didn't merely defeat Murtha, Pelosi's strong preference, but trounced him." The Times adds, "some Democrats were left wondering why Pelosi had injected herself into a bitter leadership battle with her last-minute support of Murtha over Hoyer, who had long been on track to claim the No. 2 job." The Los Angeles Times (11/17, Simon, 850K) also runs an analysis piece this morning titled "Party Gets A Rocky Start," in which it quotes "a Democratic lawmaker who spoke on condition that he not be named for fear of retribution from the leadership." The lawmaker said, "These aren't the headlines we wanted to generate." McClatchy (11/17, Talev) also quotes "one moderate Democratic congressman, who spoke on condition of anonymity for fear of retribution," saying "Pelosi's backing of Murtha made her look petty and shook some members' faith in her leadership. 'She owes Murtha a lot; she owes the caucus more,' he said. 'A good leader knows when she has to tell a member no, even when it's your friend. She'll either get it and lead differently,' the congressman said, 'or she won't lead long.'"

The New York Times (11/17, Hulse, 1.16M) says Hoyer's win strains "the unity of the new majority party," and is "an indication that rank-and-file members would be willing to break from Ms. Pelosi." Some Democrats "portrayed her decision to inject herself into the race as a miscalculation that elevated the battle into an unnecessary early test of her power and ended up giving more influence to Mr. Hoyer. But they said they did not expect hard feelings to linger."

Dana Milbank writes in the Washington Post (11/17, 690K) that Pelosi "experienced her first smackdown" yesterday. Pelosi "had only herself to blame for this briefest of honeymoons." Yesterday "should have been a coronation for the first woman to be speaker. Instead, her party had plunged into fratricide, and cable news was running nonstop clips of Murtha talking with FBI agents posing as sheiks in the Abscam sting."

The Wall Street Journal (11/17, Rogers, Lueck, 2.04M) reports the "Democratic fight…showed the political dangers of…Pelosi's risk-taking leadership style as the incoming speaker," while USA Today (11/17, Stone, Nichols, 2.27M) says "the next speaker of the House lost her first test Thursday even before she takes office. The decision by House Democrats to choose…Hoyer to be majority leader over…Murtha…dampened what until now had been a jubilant time for their party."

CQ (11/17, Ferrechio) runs a similar story under the headline "In Rebuff To Pelosi, Democrats Elect Hoyer As Majority Leader," while the Washington Times (11/17, Hurt, 88K) says "yesterday's vote showed that nearly two-thirds of the new Democratic majority in the House was willing to defy Mrs. Pelosi's demand that they vote for Mr. Murtha. Since gaining 29 seats in the Nov. 7 election, House Democrats have privately expressed deep concern over Mr. Murtha and say Mrs. Pelosi blundered by backing him so forcefully."

The Financial Times (11/17, Yeager) reports, "Throughout the mid-term election campaign, Mrs Pelosi pledged that the first act of a Democratic-controlled Congress would be a tough package of rules and ethics reform, following a series of mostly Republican scandals. But she raised eyebrows this week with her endorsement of Mr Murtha, who has been called "ethically challenged" by government watchdogs." Murtha "has faced allegations that he abused his position as a member of the defence appropriations sub-committee by favouring a lobbying company of a former long-term staffer and clients of Robert 'Kit' Murtha, his brother."

Hoyer, together with a number of Democratic lawmakers, granted interviews to several cable shows last night, arguing their caucus is united and the leadership election will have no long-term consequences. But the New York Times (11/17, Hulse, 1.16M) notes "not everyone was willing to put aside the fight so quickly. Some supporters of Mr. Murtha, a longtime member of the Appropriations Committee whose candidacy was dogged by questions about his ethics record, were disgruntled and said they were trying to identify lawmakers who had broken pledges to support him. 'We won't trust them on issues like this the next time,' said Representative James P. Moran, a Murtha ally from Virginia who said Mr. Murtha had been betrayed." Moran was more conciliatory on PBS' NewsHour (11/16, Warner), where he said, "This is behind us. It's time to move forward, and Steny certainly worked hard enough to be deserving of majority leader, and I congratulate him. … The caucus has spoken."

And the Baltimore Sun (11/17, Davis, 257K) reports California Rep. Maxine Waters, "a Hoyer supporter, said Pelosi's campaign -- in which she and her lieutenants urged lawmakers to abandon commitments to Hoyer or risk losing their chances at coveted committee posts -- had raised serious questions within the party. 'What most people didn't understand was the why's of it all,' Waters said." But "she added -- in what could portend difficult days ahead as Pelosi attempts to impose order on her caucus -- that lawmakers had mostly ignored Pelosi's 11th-hour effort to sway them in Murtha's favor." Waters said on MSNBC's Hardball (11/16, Matthews), "Steny has demonstrated his leadership. He's paid his dues. Steny knows the name of every member in Congress, all of the new members. He pays attention. He's been there every Thursday morning to run those whip meetings. He took his licking and he kept on ticking. He lost but played the game of being a team member. And he's a members' leader."

Hoyer said on CNN's The Situation Room (11/16, Blitzer), "The caucus spoke with a strong voice hat they thought the leadership that I'm providing, and the team of Nancy Pelosi and Steny Hoyer together, creating the kind of unity we had in our caucus, is one they wanted to keep, now that we have won the majority." Hoyer said on MSNBC's Hardball (11/16, Matthews) that he and Pelosi "have known each other 40 years. We had this temporary disagreement, obviously, but we will get over that quickly. Why? Because we're going to move fast, and when you're moving fast, you are thinking about going forward, not what happened yesterday." On Fox News' The Big Story (11/16, Gibson), Hoyer said, "Nancy is a very loyal person. Jack Murtha is a close friend of hers, had worked hard for her election as whip and then as leader. And I think she felt that she owed that response to him. I understood that. But that's the past. We have been given a responsibility by the American people and we need to meet it together." Profiles in this morning's newspapers describe Hoyer as a moderate pragmatist. The Washington Post (11/17, Murray, 690K), in a story titled "Political Pragmatism Carried Hoyer To The Top," says Hoyer is "a practical moderate and Nancy Pelosi is a liberal idealist, and for more than 40 years they have competed like siblings, all the way to the pinnacle of politics." The New York Times (11/17, Zernike, 1.16M) runs a similar profile under the headline "Steny H. Hoyer, A Cultivator Of Loyalties." The Times says, "WASHINGTON, Nov. 16 — If you placed an order for a congressman, chances are you would get Steny Hoyer. There is the immovable silver hair and the gleaming smile, the assiduous courting of colleagues, supporters and lobbyists, even the requisite life-changing encounter with John F. Kennedy."

Rep. Charles Rangel said on Fox News' The Big Story (11/16, Gibson), "I was scared to death that this thing was going to explode right on the Democratic Party. … If you could have seen the emotion of the Democratic caucus as both of them -- Pelosi and Hoyer -- hugged each other, it just brought us together with a sense of unity that -- we were fearful, but it was really exciting." On MSNBC's Tucker (11/16, Carlson), Rangel made similar comments, saying, "I was frightened as heck that this was going to be a big obstacle to unity, but you would have to be there to see how these two professionals handled Steny Hoyer's victory. He could not have been more cordial, friendly and dedicated to the success of Nancy Pelosi as the first woman speaker. Murtha was terrific."

Rep. Barney Frank, asked on PBS' NewsHour (11/16, Warner) "how serious a defeat" the Hoyer victory is for Pelosi, said, "Not at all. In the first place, it was not her first power play. Her first power play was a very successful one. I know only controversy makes news, but we had a potential controversy between Rahm Emanuel…and Jim Clyburn, our caucus chairman. She worked out a deal whereby Jim became the whip, the number three, an African-American very important in an elected leadership position, only the second time in history that's happened, and Rahm became caucus chair. We had this fight. But the key point is this: Nancy Pelosi and Steny Hoyer have worked together as number-one and number-two on the Democratic side for four years."

Rep. Dennis Kucinich said on Fox News' Your World (11/16, Cavuto), "A lot of us like Jack Murtha a lot. We appreciate the work he did in helping us to create a majority by making Iraq the issue. But we're united. And that's something to keep in mind."

Rep. Chaka Fattah said on MSNBC's Hardball (11/16, Matthews), "I love Jack Murtha and I think the country loves him for his courage and standing up against this war. He got a lot of votes in the Democratic caucus today, but it didn't add up to a win for him. But I think those who know Jack Murtha know that that's one moment in time we're going to be united. Steny Hoyer deserves this victory. He got the lion's share of the votes today. And we're going be a united caucus."

Rep. Ellen Tauscher said on MSNBC (11/16, O'Donnell), "I don't think it was a feud. We were trying to sort out how to put the best team front and center for us to go into the majority. And we went with the team that brought us into the majority."

Rep. Steve Israel said on MSNBC's Hardball (11/16, Matthews), "I supported Steny Hoyer. This wasn't about the war in Iraq. This was about a leadership election. This is about two class acts who were competing for one position."

Blue Dog Coalition leader Rep. Allen Boyd said on MSNBC's Hardball (11/16, Matthews), "Most of our members supported Steny Hoyer."

More Commentary. In an editorial headlined "Speaker Pelosi Tempts Disaster," the New York Times (11/17, 1.16M) says "Pelosi has managed to severely scar her leadership even before taking up the gavel as the new speaker of the House. First, she played politics with the leadership of the House Intelligence Committee to settle an old score and a new debt. And then she put herself in a lose-lose position by trying to force a badly tarnished ally…on the incoming Democratic Congress as majority leader. … The new majority -- led by a presumably wiser speaker -- must realize by now that intramural vendetta is hardly a substitute for productive government."

E.J. Dionne, in the Washington Post (11/17, 690K), writes "Democrats might usefully take a break from their inane round of back-stabbing and score-settling to focus, for a few moments, on why voters gave them their congressional majorities. A lot of Americans are hurting in the pocketbook, and if Democrats don't use the next two years to help them, the party will squander the trust it has temporarily earned."

GOP Rep. Ray LaHood said on MSNBC's Tucker (11/6, Carlson), "I think Pelosi's in the self-destruct mode and has been in that mode all week. And she's not off to a very great start for somebody who's talking about bringing her whole caucus together. It looks like she's parted ways with many of them. … It shows a pretty ineffective speaker-elect."

Ex-Rep. J.C. Watts, a Republican, said on CNN's The Situation Room (11/16, Blitzer), "I think this is a small stumble, because I think the Democrats understand that if they allow this to become a problem in terms of governing, it sets them back tremendously over the next couple of years. So I think, hopefully, my advice to them would be they'll have these petty fights behind closed doors, but, hey, get over this. The election is over. Put a good face on it and move forward."

Federal Workers Union Hails Hoyer Selection. The Washington Post's (11/17, D4, Barr) "Federal Diary" column reports, "Federal employee groups yesterday welcomed the election of Rep. Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.) as the next House majority leader. Hoyer has championed federal pay raises and benefits for more than two decades. 'We have never before had such a good friend so high in the congressional leadership," said Margaret Baptiste, president of the National Active and Retired Federal Employees Association."

LATimes Endorses Harman For Intel Committee Chairmanship. The Los Angeles Times (11/17, 850K) editorializes that Pelosi's "embarrassing experience" of endorsing Rep. John P. Murtha, should make her "reconsider another ill-advised promotion: Her apparent intention to bestow the chairmanship of the House Intelligence Committee not on the panel's ranking Democrat, Rep. Jane

Harman but on Rep. Alcee L. Hastings." A "litany of explanations have been adduced to explain why Pelosi would bypass Harman, an expert on intelligence matters who has won the respect of both parties while criticizing some of the Bush administration's excesses in the war on terror," but "none of them is persuasive," and Harman "has earned this chairmanship." Pelosi "should think twice before indulging in a witch hunt of colleagues who can work well with Republicans," and Harman fits the position "far more than Hastings."

Gates To Begin Capitol Hill Visits Today. The AP (11/16, Flaherty) reports Defense Secretary-designate Robert Gates "is making his first round of visits on Capitol Hill" since his nomination. The "one-on-one meetings Friday with lawmakers are in anticipation of Gates' confirmation hearing next month. The Senate Armed Services Committee plans to hold the hearing the week of Dec. 4."

RAND Analyst Says Gates Will Have Opportunities At DOD. In a WashingtonPost.com (11/17) essay, RAND Corporation senior analyst Gregory Treverton writes that, if confirmed, Gates "will not have much time in office but he will have opportunity." He "comes to the job without much baggage, either of ideology or policy. He didn't campaign for the job -- indeed, he turned down the position of director of national intelligence when it was offered -- so he has some independence. And he comes to office when desperation might make for a serious debate about policy toward Iraq." Treverton lists Iraq, military transformation, and intelligence as areas Gates can impact during his tenure.

Bipartisan Senate Bill Seeks To Improve Drug Safety. The AP (11/17, Bridges) reports, "A bipartisan bill represents the best shot in years to improve the safety of drugs the Food and Drug Administration regulates, but needs bolstering to heal the ailing regulatory agency, witnesses told lawmakers Thursday." The bill, "introduced in August by Sens. Mike Enzi, R-Wyo., and Ted Kennedy, D-Mass., comes on the heels of a string of high-profile drug recalls and safety warnings. Among them was the 2004 withdrawal of the popular painkiller Vioxx after long-term use was linked to an increased risk of heart attack and stroke." USA Today (11/17, 2.27M) says "representatives from the pharmaceutical industry and consumer and patient groups agreed Thursday that a bipartisan bill working its way through the Senate would improve drug safety and public confidence."

New OPM Groups To Focus On Federal Workforce Issues. The Washington Post's (11/17, D4, Barr) "Federal Diary" column reports, "In an effort to take a more strategic approach to federal workforce management, an interagency group has reorganized with an eye to how best to help Uncle Sam recruit and train a new generation of public servants." The "Chief Human Capital Officers Council, was created in 2002 to advise agencies on how to improve federal personnel systems." The Post adds that "Projections show that 40 percent of the federal workforce will retire by 2015, casting agencies into a war for talent with corporations, consulting firms and other employers."

Possibility Of Replacing Cheney As Vice President Floated. In his USA Today column (11/17), Al Neuharth says that for the 2008 election, "Dick Cheney unequivocally has taken himself out of the running. So he's toast. It's hard to think of a good reason he should remain in office and logical to assume that some Republicans are pushing him to leave. It could be on 'doctor's orders.' He's 65 with serious heart problems." President Bush "then could name a vice presidential successor who they hope might be nominated and win in '08. But the appointment would need approval of both houses of Congress. With control shifting to the Democrats in January, time may be of the essence." Names that are "likely on the short might-be list (alphabetically): Bill Frist, 54, Senate majority leader from Tennessee; Rudy Giuliani, 62, former mayor of New York City; John McCain, 70, U.S. senator from Arizona; Condoleezza Rice, 52, secretary of State." If Cheney "goes, Bush could make political history by naming the first woman and first black as veep."

Bush Urged To Resist Entitlement Compromise That Includes Tax Hikes. In his Wall Street Journal column (11/17), Daniel Henninger discusses the impact of the Reagan tax cuts in the US and in Eastern Europe, adding, "Last week former Clinton Treasury Secretary Robert Rubin exhorted the Democrats to raise taxes 'to solve the nation's fiscal problems.' The Rubin Solution may not be easy. Even a Democratic Congress might realize that raising taxes today is swimming against the global tides. In reversing the Clinton tax increases, passed in another age 13 years ago, and spreading tax cuts to the financial sector, George Bush has driven the roots of the Reagan tax philosophy deeper. If he resists a grand compromise on entitlements that raises taxes, it may prove to be his most enduring legacy."

Healthcare, Energy, Economic Justice Suggested As Democratic Agenda Items. In his Washington Post column (11/17, A17), David Ignatius says, "What are the issues where the Democrats should plant their flag and try to create a new majority? Two are no-brainers that should have broad bipartisan support next year: reviving the Clinton administration's push for national health-care policies that can save costs and improve care, and getting serious about alternative energy policies that can reduce demand for foreign oil. Sen. Hillary Clinton has already staked out these issues, which will enhance her stature as a 2008 presidential candidate." A "third big Democratic idea was advanced this week by Jim Webb, the senator-elect from Virginia, who promises to be one of the most interesting voices in the new Congress. He argued in the Wall Street Journal that the Democrats should focus on economic justice."

LATimes Says Big Three's Days Of Federal Help Are Over. The Los Angeles Times (11/17, 850K) editorializes "Very little, if anything, is expected to come of the meeting," between President Bush and the heads of General Motors, Ford and DaimlerChrysler's Chrysler Group, after "months of lobbying for some face time." It was "a reflection not only of the newfound weakness of the industry but of a change in global circumstances." Although the US auto industry is "an important part of the nation's economy," the days of "massive federal bailouts for the likes of Chrysler are over."

Stocks Soar To New Record After Positive Inflation News. The CBS Evening News (11/16, story 5, 0:15, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "There's one piece of good news tonight about prices: Cheaper gasoline has us talking about deflation instead of inflation for a second straight month. Consumer prices dropped by a half percent in October. So far this year, inflation is running 2.4%. That's a full point lower than last year." ABC World News (11/16, story 9, 0:10, Gibson, 8.78M) says "the Dow gained 54 points to close at 12,305. And that's its third-consecutive record." The Wall Street Journal (11/17, McKay, 2.04M) notes "the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index rose 0.2%, or 3.19 points, to 1399.76, shy of its first close above 1400 since November 2000. The broad-based index is up 12% this year. The Nasdaq Composite Index rose 0.3%, or 6.31 points, to 2449.06, up 11% year to date."

The Washington Post (11/17, Schneider, Henderson, 690K) runs a similar report titled Inflation Drops Again As Gasoline Prices Fall," in which is says "inflation continued to moderate in October as falling oil prices, a slack housing market and a decline in clothing costs reinforced the sense of a gradually slowing economy." Labor Department "statistics released yesterday indicated that overall prices declined 0.5 percent in October on a seasonally adjusted basis, following a similar decline in the previous month. Excluding volatile fuel and food costs, prices rose 0.1 percent, the smallest increase since December and a sign that core inflation is declining."

The Wall Street Journal (11/17, Gerena-Morales, 2.04M) headlines its story "Inflationary Signs Weaken Broadly," and quotes Nariman Behravesh, chief economist at consulting firm Global Insight, saying the inflation report "is unmitigated good news. … It will provide great comfort to the Fed because they've been saying that inflation is going to come down -- and it has. People who were worried about [high] core inflation can breathe a little easier." In fact, the Financial Times (11/17, Callan, Guha) titles its story "Inflation Slowdown Raises Rate Cut Hope." The New York Times (11/17, Porter, Peters, 1.16M) and Christian Science Monitor (11/17, Scherer, 59K), among other newspapers, also report on the inflation numbers.

KBR Shares Soar On NYSE Debut. The Wall Street Journal (11/17, Civils, 2.04M) writes that Halliburton "has shed a big part of its business, for better or worse. KBR, the engineering and construction unit with a huge presence in Iraq, was successfully offered to the public Thursday after a slight delay. Halliburton's stock, which has rallied in anticipation of the spinoff, has done well since the Iraq war began, rising from around $10 to an all-time high of $42 earlier this year. Shares closed Thursday at $32.51, down $1.04 on the New York Stock Exchange." The Washington Post (11/17, D3, Witte, 690K) says analysts said Halliburton's "main reason for making the move was that KBR had become a drain on the company's share price. While KBR takes in huge revenues through its government contracting and engineering work, its profit margins are considerably thinner than those of the rest of Halliburton."

KBR Could Still Face Difficulties With UK's MoD. The Financial Times (11/17, Gangahar) says KBR shares "soared as much as 25 per cent on their debut." KBR "ignored calls from the UK's Ministry of Defence to postpone its float," which the ministry requested "to give it time to determine the financial viability of KBR." But the Houston Chronicle (11/17, Clanton, 530K) says KBR's decision to ignore the UK request "might still come back to bite it." KBR CEO William Utt will meet with a top MoD official Monday "to discuss the impact of the move on a strategically important naval dockyard, which is majority-owned by KBR." The UK "has threatened to reject the lucrative contract if both sides cannot come to terms."

Several House Races Remain Too Close To Call. USA Today (11/17, Stone, 2.27M) reports, "Recounts, runoffs and Saturday's Ohio State-Michigan football game stand in the way of deciding House races that remain too close to call 10 days after the election. Nearly a dozen races were unsettled at the start of the week." Four races "have been called since Tuesday, all but one in favor of the incumbent. Connecticut Republican Rep. Rob Simmons lost to Democrat Joe Courtney by 91 of nearly 250,000 votes cast." Republicans "lead in all five races in which absentee and provisional ballots are still being counted." One of the

"closest contests is being waged in North Carolina, where GOP Rep. Robin Hayes leads Democrat Larry Kissell by about 450 votes. Poll workers are hand-tallying nearly 1,500 provisional ballots." In Ohio, Rep. Deborah Pryce, "who has said she'll step down from her GOP leadership position, leads Democrat Mary Jo Kilroy by 3,536 votes. Election officials won't count provisional ballots until Sunday, so workers can watch the Ohio State-Michigan game Saturday." Freshman Republican Rep. Jean Schmidt "leads Democrat Victoria Wulsin by about 2,800 votes. Provisional and absentee ballots could be counted by Tuesday." The "most contentious standoff is in Florida in the district that Republican Katherine Harris — a central figure in the disputed 2000 presidential election recount — gave up for her failed run for senator. Just 401 votes separate the leader, Republican Vern Buchanan, from Democrat Christine Jennings." A recount is "underway, but that's not likely to explain why more than 18,000 voters in heavily Democratic Sarasota County left the House race blank on their electronic touch-screen ballots." Two other races "will be decided in runoffs next month. In Louisiana, state Rep. Karen Carter is challenging fellow Democrat Rep. William Jefferson, who is under investigation for alleged bribery." In Texas, GOP Rep. Henry Bonilla "faces Democratic former congressman Ciro Rodriguez."

Democrat Won't Seek Recount In Wyoming House Race. The AP (11/17, Moen) reports Democratic challenger Gary Trauner "said Thursday he would not seek a recount in his narrow loss to Republican Rep. Barbara Cubin in Wyoming's closest House race in 36 years." Trauner said in a statement, "It is time to put this election to rest and look to the future." The AP adds Cubin "beat Trauner by 1,012 votes out of 193,369 cast. The State Canvassing Board certified the election results Wednesday."

Democrats Hopeful For Continued Success In 2008. The Wall Street Journal (11/17, Harwood, 2.04M) reports in its "Washington Wire" that, "Democrats see improved electoral map as 2008 field expands. House Democratic campaign chief Emanuel touts gains among suburbanites and higher-income voters -- Democrats won among those earning $50,000 to $100,000. Republican consultant Steve Lombardo, citing Democratic advances among Catholics, says 'only another election or two' can prove staying power of such trends." Sen. Dodd of Connecticut, "who may join Democratic nomination race, calls for 'New Age of Idealism.' His annual Williamsburg retreat for supporters attracts greater interest given his 2008 aspirations and ascension to Senate Banking chairmanship. Democrats hold most congressional seats in states with 303 electoral votes, strategist Mark Gersh says."

McCain Says GOP Needs To Return To "Common Sense Conservatism." The AP (11/17, Sidoti) reports Sen. John McCain "called on the Republican Party to return to its common-sense conservatism — and implicitly cast himself as the one who can lead the party's rebirth." In the "first of two speeches that could set the tone for a potential presidential campaign," McCain said, "We lost our principles and our majority. And there is no way to recover our majority without recovering our principles first." The AP adds that on the "same day he launched a presidential exploratory committee, McCain said voters felt that Republicans valued their incumbency over their beliefs on such conservative standards as limited and efficient government — and he urged a return to those tenets." McCain "spoke before members of the Federalist Society, the organization of more than 25,000 conservatives and libertarians including high-profile members of the Bush administration, the federal judiciary and Congress. Later Thursday, he was delivering a broader speech about the future of the Republican Party to another conservative pillar, GOPAC." McCain is "taking advantage of the postelection period to outline a vision for the party much like Ronald Reagan did after the Republican defeat in the 1976 presidential election." As expected, McCain "also filed paperwork with the Federal Election Commission that will allow him to raise money and travel the country while weighing a bid." Despite all "the action, McCain says he will wait until after the Christmas holiday to decide whether to make a second bid for the White House."

The New York Times (11/17, Nagourney, 1.16M) reports McCain "said Thursday that Republicans had lost the midterm elections because 'we abandoned our principles' on fiscal policy and government restraint, inviting a backlash from Americans over what they saw as widespread hypocrisy." McCain, "in back-to-back speeches delivered on the day he formally created his presidential exploratory committee — portrayed the election result as deserved punishment of Republicans for their performance in office, rather than an affirmation of the Democratic Party. Speaking to two conservative audiences still reeling from the Republicans' losses of the House and Senate, he said Republicans could recover from the election but only if they took lessons from the results." McCain said, "Hypocrisy, my friends, is the most obvious of political sins — and the people will punish it." The Times adds the speeches "were what aides described as the start of a new phase in Mr. McCain's likely try for the presidency, though he will make a formal decision on whether to run next year. The addresses, amounting to a sharp repudiation of his own party as well as an unambiguous embrace of conservative ideology, come as Republicans debate what lessons should be drawn from the defeat."

The Washington Post (11/17, A7, Balz, 690K) reports McCain "took the first formal steps toward a 2008 presidential campaign yesterday and used a pair of speeches before Republican audiences to argue that his brand of conservative, reform-minded politics and hawkish foreign policy can restore the GOP to power." McCain "cited Reagan frequently as the guidepost for the future of the party. In contrast, he never mentioned Bush by name, although he was implicitly critical of the administration's conduct of the war in Iraq. By choosing two conservative audiences for his first major post-election speeches, McCain demonstrated his desire to mend relations with the right, which helped deny him the nomination in 2000." McCain's "moves yesterday were the latest evidence suggesting that the 2008 presidential campaign will accelerate to warp speed earlier than in any other period in recent history." McCain advisers "likened yesterday's speeches -- to the GOPAC political action committee and the Federalist Society -- to an address Reagan delivered in 1977 after the Democrats won the White House and GOP fortunes appeared to ebb."

The Washington Times (11/17, Dinan, 88K) reports the story under the headline, "McCain Says GOP Needs To Recover 'Lost' Principles." The Times reports McCain "said a majority of voters are still conservative and added the Republican Party must return to basic principles of limited government in order to recapture their support." He also said "last week's elections, in which Republicans lost control of the House and Senate, were not an endorsement of Democratic ideas, nor of an isolationist approach to foreign policy." At the Federalist Society, McCain "drew a standing ovation at the beginning and at the end of his remarks."

CNN's The Situation Room (11/16, Crowley) reported, "This is the day that John McCain filed papers for an exploratory presidential committee, but the fact is that the words he's going to speak today to these two conservative groups shows he's doing a lot more than exploring."

Discussing the 2008 Republican presidential contest on MSNBC's Tucker (11/16, Carlson), GOP strategist Roger Stone said Sen. John McCain is "pretty strong. I think he's the frontrunner. Rudy Giuliani, who I have enormous respect for, would be a terrific vice presidential candidate, but at the end of the day how he will wear in the primaries remains to be seen. John McCain is fundamentally a conservative in a conservative party. And the Republican Party tasted defeat last week, they didn't like the taste. John McCain's the only candidate they have on the horizon who is competitive in places like Pennsylvania and New Jersey and Ohio, and therefore he's our strongest candidate."

Asked on MSNBC's Hardball (11/16, Matthews) if he is "a McCain man," Rep. John Shadegg said, "I think he's the star-quality candidate we need."

Edwards Still Undecided On '08 Run. Ex-Sen. John Edwards, asked on CNN's The Situation Room (11/16, Blitzer) if he wants to be president, said, "Maybe, a resounding maybe. I haven't decided for sure, but I'm seriously thinking about it. … I'll decide in the next few months. And it will be dependent in part on how Elizabeth is doing. But right now, she's doing great. And whether I think it's an important thing for the people that I would want to represent for me to run for the White House."

Ford Not Ruling Out Challenge To Alexander In 2008. Asked on CNN's The Situation Room (11/16, Blitzer) about the fact that Sen. Lamar Alexander is up for reelection in 2008, Rep. Harold Ford Jr. said, "I read that somewhere. The next two years will be interesting." Blitzer: "You're certainly not ruling that out?" Ford: "No, not at all."

RNC Says No Offer Was Made To Steele. The Washington Times (11/17, Hallow, 88K) reports the Republican National Committee "this week said it never offered Maryland Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele 'a specific role' at the committee after his unsuccessful campaign for the U.S. Senate." Many conservatives "were surprised this week when, after reports that some leading Republicans favored Mr. Steele to succeed Ken Mehlman as chairman of the RNC, the White House leaked word to news agencies that President Bush would back Florida Sen. Mel Martinez for the top post at the committee." Steele "told The Times on Wednesday that neither White House adviser Karl Rove nor Mr. Mehlman 'offered me formally' any job." Steele said, "I got calls from various state party chairmen and national committee members to take the chairman's post on Thursday and Friday of last week. I told them, 'This is clearly a White House decision. We'll just have to wait to see what the White House decides.' This isn't something I actively pursued. It grew up out of the grass roots." Steele added that "all this is moot now. The president has made his decision, and I am a team player."

DeLay's Replacement Seeks Investigation Of Missing Computer Files. The New York Times/AP (11/17) reports the "newest member of Congress, who is temporarily filling former Majority Leader Tom DeLay's Texas seat, wants an investigation into the destruction of computer files in her office by staffers she inherited from DeLay." Rep. Shelley Sekula-Gibbs, R-Texas, "said the staffers resigned en masse and walked out Tuesday, a day after she was sworn in to fill DeLay's seat for the next seven weeks. A Capitol Hill newspaper, Roll Call, reported the staffers did not like the way she was treating them." Sekula-Gibbs "said in a statement Thursday that seven employees in her Washington office and the district office in Stafford, Texas, outside Houston, 'deleted records and files without my knowledge or permission' on the same day she was sworn in." Sekula-Gibbs "said the walkouts were 'suspicious' in that the seven took the time to delete files before leaving without notice." The AP adds David James, "former deputy chief of staff for DeLay, released a statement Thursday saying that the computers in the office were 'scrubbed and reconfigured' according to House rules on transition between members and that work performed for the congresswoman during the brief time he worked there was preserved."

The Washington Post (11/17, A4, Babington, 690K) reports, "Just when it seemed things could get no stranger regarding the House seat once held by Texas Republican Tom DeLay, his successor called for an investigation into missing computer records last night, and an aide accused her of 'disrespect and unprofessionalism.'" Rep. Sekula-Gibbs "said that former DeLay employees apparently deleted the office's computer files shortly before they walked out, en masse, on Tuesday." Sekula-Gibbs, "a dermatologist, arrived for Congress's lame-duck session with ambitions for funding a fence along the Mexican border, making a number of tax cuts permanent and achieving other goals that may or may not be possible in the handful of appropriations bills on Congress's plate."

GOP Alienation Of Latinos Seen As Key To 2006 Losses. In a Los Angeles Times op-ed (11/17), Tamar Jacoby of the Manhattan Institute says, "Republicans are asking what they did wrong in the 2006 midterms. This is a question with many answers. But few missteps were more foolish — and few will be harder to correct — than those made with Latino voters. The appointment this week of Cuban-born Sen. Mel Martinez of Florida to chair the Republican National Committee is a good way to make a new start. But the damage done in the last year goes deeper than symbolism, and it will take more than one appointment to undo it." Republican hard-liners "in the House refused to enact the president's immigration reform. They passed a bill making felons of illegal immigrants, not because it was good law but merely to make a political point." The results "were hardly surprising. Last week, Latinos voted 70% to 29% in favor of Democrats."

Moore Makes Pledge To Conservatives. In a Los Angeles Times op-ed (11/17), Michael Moore offers "A Liberal's Pledge to Disheartened Conservatives." The pledge includes offers to "always respect" conservatives who vote Republican, including "never, ever, call[ing] you 'unpatriotic' simply because you disagree with us. In fact, we encourage you to dissent and disagree with us." The liberals will "let you marry whomever you want," and will "soon bring our sons and daughters home from Iraq," and bring "your sons and daughters home too."

O'Connor Recounts Receiving Package Containing Poison. The New York Times (11/17, Greenhouse, 1.16M) reports, "A discussion of recent threats to judges' safety, at a bar association conference in suburban Dallas last week, became startlingly specific when Sandra Day O'Connor, the retired Supreme Court justice, recounted that each justice had received in the mail 'a wonderful package of home-baked cookies' that contained 'enough poison to kill the entire membership of the court.'" Justice O'Connor's remarks "were reported on Thursday in The Star-Telegram in Fort Worth."

Shadegg Is Matthews' "Favorite Candidate." On his MSNBC Hardball (11/16) show, Chris Matthews introduced Rep. John Shadegg as "a real Barry Goldwater principled conservative" and told him, "you're my one favorite candidate on the Republican side." Asked if he can win his race for minority whip today, Shadegg said, "I believe I can. I'm certainly hopeful. I'm not going to give you a count and tell you that we've got it locked up; we don't."

Conservative Think Tank Promoter Profiled. The New York Times (11/17, Deparle, 1.16M) profiles Lawrence W. Reed, "one of those people with so much passion for an unusual line of work that he invented a new occupation, and it has helped shape the conservative movement from here to the Himalayas." Reed "runs a conservative think tank school. Twice a year, ideological allies from across the globe travel to his program at the Mackinac Center for Public Policy in Midland, Mich., to study the tricks of the idea-peddling trade. Policy institutes have been central to a national organizing strategy that has long won the right a reputation for savvy, and state-level versions are growing in number and clout." Pushing "causes like lower taxes, less spending and school choice plans, they have offered conservatives a base of influence independent of electoral politics. Indeed, after the Republican losses in the midterm elections, many conservatives said this carefully tended world — of research organizations, single-interest groups, foundations and publications — was vital to the movement's revival."

Milton Friedman Dead At 94. The Wall Street Journal (11/17, Ip, Whitehouse, 2.04M) reports, "A half century ago, Milton Friedman's advocacy of free markets over government intervention and his prescription for inflation-fighting by central banks were treated as fringe notions by many economists. By the time the Nobel Prize-winning economist died yesterday at the age of 94, his views had helped to reshape modern capitalism." Friedman "provided the intellectual foundations for the anti-inflation, tax-cutting and antigovernment policies of President Ronald Reagan and British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher and an era of more-disciplined central banking. His ideas helped to end the military draft in the 1970s, gave birth to staple conservative causes such as school vouchers and created the groundwork for new economic views about the Great Depression, unemployment, inflation and exchange rates." The New York Times (11/17, Noble, 1.16M) calls Friedman "the grandmaster of free-market economic theory in the postwar era and a prime force in the movement of nations toward less government and greater reliance on individual responsibility." The Los Angeles Times (11/17, Peterson, 850K), Washington Post (11/17, A1, Sulliva, Losada, 690K) and USA Today (11/17, Kirchhoff, 2.27M) run similar reports.

In his Washington Post column (11/17, D1), Steven Pearlstein writes, "Friedman's abiding distrust of government action also blinded him to its successes. But it would be wrong to confuse his libertarian instincts with lack of human sympathy. He was an early proponent of the negative income tax, now known as the earned income tax credit -- which supplements the wages of millions of low-income workers. And while he opposed rent control, public education and Social Security, he promoted government vouchers to help people buy housing, education and medical care."

The Wall Street Journal (11/17, 2.04M), in an editorial, calls Friedman "arguably the greatest economist of the 20th century," and notes "this newspaper had the privilege of publishing Milton Friedman's articles on numerous occasions over the years. We've also disagreed with him from time to time, notably on exchange rates and drug legalization. … On the death of Ronald Reagan, whom he advised, Mr. Friedman wrote on these pages that 'few people in human history have contributed more to the achievement of human freedom.' The same can and long will be said of Milton Friedman." The Wall Street Journal (11/17, 2.04M) also runs an op-ed by Friedman, titled "Why Money Matters."

In Singapore, Bush Promotes Trade, Issues Warning To North Korea. In Singapore, the first leg of his Asian trip, President Bush promoted free trade and addressed the situation with North Korea. Bush's trip generated no network TV coverage last night. Press accounts this morning tend to have a negative tone, emphasizing what they see as Bush's weakened political position. Also, with Bush traveling to Vietnam, several reports also see an analogy between the Vietnam and Iraq wars – one that may be overshadowing Bush's message. The New York Times (11/17, Sanger, 1.16M) runs a report titled "On To Vietnam, Bush Hears Echoes Of 1968 In Iraq 2006," in which it says that "until now, when asked what he had learned from Vietnam, Mr. Bush has almost reflexively reached for the same line: That he does not micromanage his generals, the way Mr. Johnson did. It is a response drawn from conservative orthodoxy about what went wrong in Vietnam, underlying an argument that had the generals been allowed to fight their way, the United States might have won." But "he may feel compelled to say more after he lands in Hanoi. Mr. Bush will find himself inside government halls adorned with paintings of Ho Chi Minh."

Likewise, the Washington Times (11/17, Curl, 88K) headlines its analysis of Bush's trip "Comparisons With Vietnam Shadow Bush Trip," reporting "the specter of the Vietnam War 30 years ago and comparisons to the US-led war in Iraq have followed him to the Pacific Rim." The Los Angeles Times (11/17, Gerstenzang, 850K) also says Bush "was shadowed by an issue that was politically difficult for him when he first ran for president, just as it was for [President] Clinton: the question of military service during the Vietnam War. And there was new attention to an issue that is politically painful for him in 2006: whether the Iraq war is turning into a new generation's equivalent of the torturous Vietnam conflict."

USA Today (11/17, Jackson, 2.27M) reports "Bush pressed familiar points in Asia on Thursday on trade and anti-terrorism policies, but Democrats are making it clear the political environment has changed back home." Bush told an audience in Singapore that "the United States wants to expand trade in Asia and work to restrict the spread of nuclear weapons, particularly from North Korea." But "in Washington, Democrats preparing to take charge of Congress next year challenged Bush over his approaches to free trade and North Korea, as well as the war in Iraq. 'The next few months will be a time of great transition here in Congress and hopefully in American foreign policy,' Rep. Tom Lantos, D-Calif., said." Lantos "will be the next chairman of the House International Relations Committee." He "called for sending an American envoy directly to North Korea to negotiate a halt to its nuclear weapons program."

The Wall Street Journal (11/17, Dreazen, 2.04M) says Bush's "Asia swing" is being "overshadowed by political troubles at home and diplomatic disputes abroad." In Singapore, "Bush fired back at newly empowered Democrats challenging his free-trade push." He "urged Asian countries to work with the US to rejuvenate a long-stalled round of global trade talks and endorsed the idea of a free-trade agreement with all 21 Pacific Rim members -- even as he felt compelled to rally support anew in his own government for such efforts. 'We hear voices calling for us to retreat from the world and close our doors to its opportunities, he told an audience at the National University of Singapore in his first major speech of the trip. " 'These are the old temptations of isolationism and protectionism, and 'America must reject them.'"

The Washington Post (11/17, A15, Fletcher, 690K) reports Bush yesterday "warned North Korea that the United States would consider it a 'grave threat' and would hold North Korea responsible if it transfers nuclear bomb technology to another country or to a terrorist organization." During a speech at the National University of Singapore, he urged Pyongyang to take "concrete steps" to end its nuclear program, and he called on other Asian countries to send the same message. Meanwhile, in comments to reporters in Hanoi, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "said there was deep skepticism among the group's members that North Korea actually intended to abandon its nuclear weapons." Asked if she would favor delaying talks until she was certain North Korea would take steps to show its commitment, Rice said: "I don't think it makes sense for us to have talks unless we think that it's going to be fruitful." The AP (11/17, Hunt) called Bush's plea an attempt to "exert his authority on the world stage" after being "hurt by election losses back home."

The New York Times (11/17, Sanger, Cooper, 1.16M) reports Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, "speaking with reporters in Hanoi, said that the coming resumption of long-running six-way talks with North Korea over its nuclear program would be pointless without shows of good faith from both sides." The Times adds, "Together, the statements by Mr. Bush and Ms. Rice suggest how much the issue of North Korea's newly acquired nuclear-power status is likely to dominate the APEC meeting, which usually focuses on trade issues."

The Financial Times (11/17, Kazmin, Daniel), meanwhile, says "Vietnam's communist rulers will on Friday suppress their irritation at the US rejection of a trade bill and roll out a red carpet for…Bush. They are keen to deepen a relationship crucial to their country's future prosperity." But "the second US presidential visit since the end of the Vietnam war has spawned little of the public enthusiasm generated by Bill Clinton's ground-breaking trip six years ago."

Seoul Backs UN Resolution Condemning Pyongyang. The Financial Times (11/17, Fifield) reports South Korea Thursday "said it would vote in favor of a United Nations resolution condemning North Korea for its human rights record, an about-face from its traditional practice of avoiding antagonizing its neighbor." The Times says the "shift comes as Ban Ki-moon, the former foreign minister, prepares to take over the running of the UN, a move that has contributed to Seoul's realization that it cannot stay silent about what it sees as one of the world's worst human rights situations." Song Min-soon, the incoming foreign minister, said Pyongyang's "nuclear test and missile launches contributed to the change in position."

US Panel Seeks Broader Sanctions Against China. AFP (11/17, Parameswaran) reports that a "Congress-appointed panel sought broader sanctions against Chinese firms proliferating unconventional weapons and wanted Beijing to inspect ships plying to or from nuclear-armed North Korea's ports." The United States-China Economic and Security Review Commission "said in its annual report that current sanctions against Chinese companies that proliferate equipment and technology related to weapons of mass destruction should be 'broadened and harmonized for increased effectiveness.'"

White House Surprised By Vietnam Trade Bill "Stumble." The Wall Street Journal (11/17, Harwood, 2.04M) reports in its "Washington Wire" that its "Vietnam trade stumble catches White House by surprise. Red-faced Trade Representative Schwab, in Hanoi, is forced to parse congressional procedures after trade pact wins majority but falls short of two-thirds required under special parliamentary rules. 'Getting this through Congress was a huge deal' for Vietnam, an administration official says amid Bush's Asia trip." Textile lobbyist Augustine Tantillo "says misfire underscores spread of 'cold feet' among lawmakers about free trade. North Carolina Republican Rep. Robin Hayes, whose dead-heat re-election race remains undecided, chides party leaders for bringing up the measure so soon after the election."

More Commentary On US-Vietnam Ties. Author Aimee Phan writes in USA Today (11/17, 2.27M), "For many Vietnamese-Americans, a trial last week in Vietnam was their worst nightmare realized. Three Vietnamese-Americans were convicted on terrorism charges last Friday. Along with four Vietnamese nationals, they were found guilty of plotting to use radio equipment to call for a public insurgency against the Communist regime. The defendants were accused of having ties with the Government of Free Vietnam, which Hanoi regards as a terrorist organization. According to its website, the California-based pro-democracy group claims to advocate peaceful protest against the current regime." The case "gives the Bush administration an opportunity to leverage trade relations with Vietnam in exchange for improved human rights policies."

The Washington Post (11/17, 690K) editorializes, "The Vietnam deal…demonstrates the perversity of congressional obstructionism on trade. US negotiators have helped to secure access to Vietnam's markets as a condition for its joining the World Trade Organization. The negotiation is complete, and Vietnam will join the WTO irrespective of what Congress says." But "Congress does have the power to shoot itself in the foot: If it refuses to ratify the deal, other WTO members will enjoy the market access that Vietnam has promised while the United States is denied it. An attempt to pass enabling legislation failed in the House this week, and a second attempt was pushed into December." The Post goes on to criticize "a minority in Congress who represent vulnerable textile regions and a majority that is supportive but lethargic."

Putin Discusses Goals For APEC Summit. Russian President Vladimir Putin writes in the Washington Times (11/17, 88K) about Russia's role in Asia, noting that during this week's APEC summit in Hanoi "we are going to discuss a plan of action…towards building a system of free and open trade and investment in the region." At the same time, Putin noted that "one of its key goals" is "countering international terrorism," along with measures to "completely eradicate the social roots of terrorism -- poverty, hunger and chronic unemployment." As a major supplier of energy to world markets, he said Russia is also "open to cooperation," but remains "convinced that the terms should be beneficial for all partners." In conclusion, Putin said he would "like to emphasize that we are optimistic about APEC's future" and that Russia "intends to take a vigorous part in addressing future challenges together with other members."

Hoagland Urges White House To Reinforce Relations With Russia. Washington Post (11/17, A25, 690K) columnist Jim Hoagland writes, "For George W. Bush, meeting Vladimir Putin is no longer an uplifting opportunity to look into the Russian leader's eyes and glimpse a kindred soul. Their encounters have become exercises in damage limitation or unavoidable bits of scheduling during international conferences." Although he says it "is easy to understand why Bush has dropped his earlier enthusiasm for Putin," Hoagland notes that Washington and Moscow "have two looming opportunities to put political and trade relations on a sounder footing and make their relationship less vulnerable to personal ups and downs." At this month's NATO summit in Latvia, he says Bush "may be tempted to go back on a tentative compromise that Washington has struck with its European and Canadian allies concerning future alliance membership for Georgia and Ukraine." And the second is Congress' approval of a bilateral agreement reached with Russia on its application to join the World Trade Organization. Although Bush's "clearing vision of Putin's flaws and the American leader's candor with his peers are welcome developments," Hoagland cautions that they "make it even more important for the United States and Russia to seize opportunities that reinforce a relationship that cannot for long be dominated by personal ties."

Senate Backs Nuclear Deal With India. The New York Times (11/17, A10, Shanker, 1.16M) reports the Senate "gave overwhelming approval late Thursday to President Bush's deal for nuclear cooperation with India, a vote expressing that a goal of nurturing India as an ally outweighed concerns over the risks of spreading nuclear skills and bomb-making materials." The agreement "calls for the [US] to end a long moratorium on sales of nuclear fuel and reactor components. For its part, India would divide its reactor facilities into civilian and military nuclear programs, with civilian facilities open to international inspections." However, "Critics have been unwavering in arguing that the pact would rally nations like North Korea and Iran to press ahead with nuclear weapons programs despite international complaints and threats. Opponents of the measure also warned that the deal would allow India to build more bombs with its limited stockpile of radioactive material, and could spur a regional nuclear arms race with Pakistan and China." The AP (11/17, Klug) notes the vote was 85 to 12.

The Financial Times (11/17, Johnson, Bokhari, Luce) says the approval "came despite concerns that the deal would encourage India to expand its nuclear weapons arsenal and spur a regional arms race with nuclear rivals Pakistan and China. Washington is especially concerned that China's President Hu Jintao will give the green light to an ambitious expansion of Beijing's controversial nuclear co-operation with Pakistan during his visit to Islamabad next week." The Times also notes that the "delicacy of south Asia's nuclear balance was underscored on Thursday as Pakistan test-fired a nuclear capable medium-range missile, a day after peace talks with New Delhi." The Los Angeles Times (11/17, Chu, 850K) also reports "there are already signs that Beijing may retaliate," and notes : On Hu's expected announcement in Pakistan."

The Wall Street Journal (11/17, A8, Solomon, 2.04M) reports, "Despite the deal's easy passage through the Senate, congressional officials said a number of roadblocks still need to be cleared before the US can begin shipping nuclear fuels to the subcontinent." The House "passed a different version of the pact, and the two chambers need to try and reconcile the versions before they adjourn in December. And Washington still needs the Nuclear Suppliers Group, an international body that regulates the trade in nuclear fuels, to provide New Delhi with clearance. After that, the Bush administration and the International Atomic Energy Association still must reach an agreement with New Delhi over the inspection regime that's required in order for the transfer of nuclear fuels."

Meanwhile, the Washington Post (11/17, A14, Linzer, 690K) says advocates of the plan "see it as a way to cement ties with a rapidly modernizing, friendly democracy whose economic and military strength could one day rival China's." For its part, the Post notes that "although the effort has garnered little attention outside Washington, it has the potential to radically alter US foreign policy for decades. Bush administration officials say they believe it will accelerate India's rise as a regional counterweight to China and provide the United States with a new foothold in Asia." Undersecretary of State Burns welcomed the bipartisan support late yesterday and called the agreement "one of the most important foreign policy initiatives of the last several years."

European Nations To Present New Mideast Peace Initiative. The Financial Times (11/17, Burnett) reports Spain, France and Italy "plan to present a new Middle East peace initiative to their European partners at an EU summit in December," Spanish Prime Minister José Luis Rodríguez Zapatero said Thursday. Spain "hopes to gain the backing of Germany and Britain for the initiative, calling for an immediate ceasefire, the formation of an internationally recognized Palestinian unity government and a peace conference. French President Jacques Chirac said France would "act jointly" with Spain, Italy and other European countries to "try to initiate indispensable moral and political reforms in the Middle East."

Blair Says New Initiative Could Come "Within Weeks." In an interview with the Washington Post (11/17, A15, Sullivan, Jordan, 690K), British Prime Minister Tony Blair Thursday "offered hope for progress" on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, saying that "sensible Arab and Muslim countries" now see "strategic reasons" for finding a solution and that new initiatives could come "within weeks." Blair said "this is an opportunity for us if we are prepared to seize it now," citing leaders of Saudi Arabia, Egypt and Jordan as among those who "want to make progress" on an issue he called the "crux" of problems in the Middle East. Blair declined to provide specifics but said British officials were holding private talks with Middle Eastern governments as well as the Bush administration about measures "to move this forward." The Post notes that Blair is also planning a trip in the next few weeks to the Middle East, which he said was facing a "critical moment."

Olmert Says No Large Scale Gaza Offensive Planned. The New York Times (11/17, A12, Fisher, 1.16M) reports, "Despite calls from some Israelis for an invasion of Gaza after" a rocket attack killed a woman Wednesday, Prime Minister Ehud Olmert "signaled that he would respond with restraint." He told reporters on his flight home from the United States that "while Israel would continue targeted attacks, a large-scale assault would not necessarily solve the problem of the crude homemade Qassam rockets fired by Palestinian militants into Israel nearly every day." The Times notes that "this is a delicate time in negotiations among Palestinian leaders who are trying to form a unity government of professionals and technocrats," and Olmert's remarks "seemed to indicate that a new Israeli offensive would not add to the already-deep difficulties of striking a deal."

Palestinian Factions Build Up Arms As Tension Rises. In a front page article, the Washington Times (11/17, A1, Mitnick, 88K) reports that "an arms race by rival Palestinian militants has nearly doubled the price of guns in anticipation that fighting in the Gaza Strip between Hamas and Fatah militias will spread to the West Bank." The Times notes that "since Hamas took over the Palestinian Authority in March, tension between Hamas- and Fatah-affiliated militias has frequently exploded into street warfare," and "as the vacuum of lawlessness that has existed in the Palestinian territories for years grows even wider, rival security outfits as well as gunmen from mafia-like clans are moving to fill the gap."

US Hospital Ship Improved Public Opinion In Muslim Countries. The Washington Times (11/17, Bawa, 88K) reports that "public opinion polls conducted in two of the more populous Muslim countries showed that humanitarian aid from a US Navy hospital ship had healed more than health problems." The polls by the Washington group Terror Free Tomorrow showed that "when people were made aware of the mission, it left a positive perception of the United States." Responding to the polls' findings, undersecretary of state for public diplomacy, Karen Hughes, said humanitarian efforts "undermine ideological support for terror." Noting "a misunderstanding about America," Hughes noted, "People don't realize that the United States is the No. 1 donor of medicine and food to the Palestinian people."

Blair Urges US Take Lead On Climate Change. In an interview with the Washington Post (11/17, A15, Sullivan, Jordan, 690K), British Prime Minister Tony Blair Thursday "made an impassioned plea for the United States to lead the world on climate change, an issue that Blair has championed despite reluctance from the Bush White House." Blair said there is now "a big opportunity for the administration and for America on climate change," and urged the White House to "come up with a sensible plan and framework."

Rice Welcomes Agreement On Darfur Peacekeepers. The New York Times (11/17, Cooper, 1.16M) reports Secretary of State Rice said that "by agreeing in principle to allow a joint United Nations-African Union peacekeeping force into the war-stricken Darfur region," Sudanese President Omar Hassan al-Bashir "has a chance to rehabilitate its image in the rest of the world." Speaking to reporters in Hanoi, Rice "hailed the deal" struck in Addis Ababa by UN Secretary-General Kofi Annan and Bashir, saying, "I think it certainly is a real opportunity to resolve what is an extremely difficult problem, and to get back on a road where innocent people can be protected and the Sudanese government has a chance to make right with the international system."

Separately, the New York Times (11/17, A3, Worth, 1.16M) reports Sudan Thursday "agreed in principle" to allow a joint United Nations-African Union peacekeeping force into Darfur, "reversing its longstanding refusal to let United Nations troops in." The agreement "raised hopes for a more effective peacekeeping effort in Darfur." However, the Times cautions that it is "not clear how soon the new force can enter Darfur," because "two major issues must still be worked out before the agreement becomes final: the number of troops, and how the commander will be selected." The AP (11/17, Neuhaus) quotes Annan as saying a meeting "should take place in the next couple of weeks to resolve outstanding issues by the end of the year."

Sudan Shuts Out Outside World From Darfur. The Christian Science Monitor (11/17, Houreld, 59K) reports, "As outgoing UN chief Kofi Annan began a major push to stem the escalating crisis during high-level meetings in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, Thursday, the Sudanese government told top UN humanitarian official Jan Egeland that all his proposed destinations on a three-day trip to Darfur are too insecure to visit this weekend." Last week, the Norwegian Refugee Council "announced it was being forced out of Darfur after its permit to operate had been indefinitely suspended for the fifth time, making working conditions 'impossible.' Other foreign aid workers say they have been denied permission to reenter the country after leaving to attend a family emergency or to seek medical treatment." Even the African Union "monitoring force of nearly 7,000 soldiers is also frequently stymied in its investigative attempts. During the one-day talks in Ethiopia with UN, EU, and Arab League officials Thursday, Mr Annan pushed for a 'hybrid' force of AU and UN peacekeepers to be allowed into Darfur. But early indications were that Sudan would reject this."

Burmese Military Wipes Out Minority Villages To Build Security Gate. The Washington Post (11/17, A1, Faiola, 690K) reports, "According to estimates by relief groups, Burmese forces have burned down more than 200 civilian villages here in Karen state, destroyed crops and placed land mines along key jungle passages to prevent refugees from returning to their home villages." At least "20,000 civilians have been displaced over the past eight to 10 months," and "dozens of people have died," as "a consequence of Burma's largest military offensive against its own people in more than a decade, according to aid groups and Western diplomats." Observers say they are "attempting to build a broad security cordon around their new capital near the inland city of Pyinmana," and the Burmese have "already begun moving government offices there from Rangoon, the old capital, and are finishing work on a sprawling military bunker."

Royal Becomes French Socialists' Presidential Nominee. The AP (11/17, Charlton) reports, "Segolene Royal got a running start Thursday to her campaign to become France's first female president, decisively beating two rivals to wrap up the nomination for the main opposition Socialist Party in a single round of voting." The victory "spared" Royal a "second round against her two rivals from the party's old guard — Former Prime Minister Laurent Fabius and former Finance Minister Dominique Strauss-Kahn." In the final tally, Royal "had collected 60.62 percent of votes, while Strauss-Kahn won 20.83 percent and Fabius gained 18.54 percent," with "about 82 percent of the 219,000 party members eligible to vote cast ballots. Strauss-Kahn and Fabius both conceded their defeat.

The New York Times (11/17, Sciolino, 1.16M) also reports, "With most of the vote in," Royal, 53, "a regional president and former minister, won 60.6 percent of the vote of the party's nearly 219,000 members in an unusual primary." The victory "helped validate" Royal's standing as "the only candidate capable of beating the right's frontrunner, Nicolas Sarkozy, the Interior Minister who is seeking his UMP party's nomination for the 2007 presidential election." An Ipsos opinion poll released on Thursday found Royal and Sarkozy "statistically tied if they were to face off in a second round of voting, after other candidates had been eliminated." Her opponents "agree that her looks help," and "in poll after poll, her telegenic smile and elegant profile have appealed to a French public yearning for a new style of leadership."

The Wall Street Journal (11/17, Gauthier-Villars, 2.04M) reports that Stephane Le Foll, chief of staff for the Socialist Party's head secretary, "declined to give a percentage" by which Royal "was expected to win, but said some 75,300 votes had been counted out of a total 180,000 ballots cast." Her nomination "highlights France's deep desire for change after nearly twelve years of economic stagnation and sagging morale under the rule of current President Jacques Chirac." The ruling UMP party "is expected to choose its candidate early next year."

The Washington Post (11/17, A15, Anderson, 690K) reports, "Riding a wave of popular disgust with France's political status quo," Royal on Thursday "used an Internet-fueled, personality-driven campaign to capture the Socialist Party's nomination for president and boost her bid to become France's first female head of state." Le Monde newspaper "estimated that she captured about 61 percent of the vote in turning back challenges from Strauss-Kahn and Laurent Fabius, "who both garnered about 19 percent, Le Monde projected." Political analysts and opinion surveys suggest that Royal "will face a tough challenge uniting the left for the first round of the general election so that it does not splinter its vote and hand a victory to the hard right."

Immigration Increases In Ireland. The Washington Times (11/17, Healy, 88K) reports that after several centuries "that has seen Irish men and women emigrating around the world, taking their culture and legends with them, a decade of rapid economic growth has made the land of shamrocks a primary destination for hordes of immigrants, mainly from Eastern Europe." The Times notes, "Foreign nationals now account for 10 percent of the population, twice as many as just two years ago, forcing the government for the first time to begin drafting a formal immigration policy to deal with the influx. 'Over "80 percent of the new immigrants are under age 44, and almost half come from states that joined the European Union in 2004. Large numbers are employed in the retail, agriculture and construction sectors, helping to fuel one of the fastest-growing economies in Europe."

China's Thirst For Energy Seen As Undercutting Sanctions Against Myanmar. The New York Times (11/17, Perlez, 1.16M) reports that in the waters off Myanmar, "an Asian energy rush is on. Huge pockets of natural gas have been found. China and India are jostling to sign deals. Plans are afoot to spend billions on new ports and pipelines." Yet in towns onshore, "not a light is to be seen. ... People receive two hours of electricity a day from a military government that is among the world's most repressive. But attempts at outside pressure to prod the government to address its people's needs and curb abuses have faltered, in large part because China's thirst for resources has undermined nearly a decade of American economic sanctions." Critics say " On topic on President Bush's agenda for the APEC summit "will be how to keep up the pressure." But "[h]e is not likely to find cooperation, not from rivals like China and Russia, or even countries like Singapore and Indonesia, which trade freely with Myanmar." The "energy rush is the latest demonstration of how the hunt for oil and gas, and China's economic leverage, are reshaping international politics, often in ways that run counter to American preferences."

Friedman Urges China To Adopt Environmental Policies. Columnist Thomas Friedman writes in the New York Times (11/17, 1.16M) that regarding China's environment, "the same kind of bruising effort it took for Deng Xiaoping to move China from communism to capitalism will be required to move China from its polluting model of capitalism to a sustainable one." Moving China "to a new sustainable model will take more than ordinary leadership," and "a giant leader who by sheer force of will moves the whole system against all the entrenched habits and interests." It will take a "green Deng Xiaoping," otherwise, "every day here will feel like midnight at noon."

Congress Urged Not To Close Door On Free Trade In Andes. Columnist Mary Anastasia O'Grady writes in the Wall Street Journal (11/17, 2.04M), "Sometimes it seems that our elected representatives in Washington are not all that bright. Either that or they don't always act with the best interests of the American people in mind." Take the opposition in Congress "to the pending free trade agreements between the US and Peru and Colombia. The Bush administration has already signed the FTA with Peru and is expected to sign the Colombia FTA by the end of next week. But to be implemented, both pacts need to be ratified by the US Congress. Right now, with the Democratic leadership opposed and some Republicans unwilling to back the president, that looks doubtful." O'Grady concludes, "Colombia is not the only place where a Big Labor oligarchy has been known to call the shots for the rest of us. The Democratic-led Congress taking over in January is likely to experience a similar tyranny. That means that the only hope now for a step forward in US-Latin American trade relations lies with Republicans, who would be wise to pass these FTAs before they leave the majority in December."

NYTimes Says Kosovo "Limbos" Too Unstable. New York Times (11/17, 1.16M) editorializes, "For the past seven years, the tiny Balkan region of Kosovo has been in limbo," but "limbos are unstable." Belgrade will "always object to Kosovo's independence," and the "best chance of moderating its reaction is the promise of eventual membership in the European Union and a clear warning that Europe will be watching how it treats its new neighbor." The Kosovars "should be clear that donors and everyone else will be watching just as closely to see how they treat their own Kosovar Serbs."

Jurors Begin Weighing Perjury Case Against Man Who Knew Two Sept. 11 Hijackers (NYT)

By Ray Rivera

The New York Times, November 17, 2006

Lawyers gave closing arguments yesterday in the latest phase of a drawn-out legal battle involving a Jordanian immigrant accused of trying to mislead a grand jury investigating the Sept. 11 attacks.

Prosecutors say the immigrant, Osama Awadallah, who is on trial for the second time in Federal District Court in Manhattan, lied repeatedly when he told a grand jury in October 2001 that he did not know Khalid al-Midhar, who took part in the attacks, and when he denied writing Mr. Midhar's name in a school notebook.

"Mr. Awadallah didn't tell the truth over and over and over," said Karl Metzner, an assistant United States attorney. Mr. Awadallah's lawyer, Jesse Berman, countered by saying that his client never meant to give the grand jury wrong information, and did so only after enduring 20 days of incarceration that left him confused, frightened and paranoid.

The case began when perjury charges were filed against Mr. Awadallah five years ago. The charges were thrown out by one judge and reinstated by an appeals court. Mr. Awadallah's first trial, in the spring, ended in a hung jury.

Mr. Berman said that before his grand jury testimony, his client was a model of cooperation. He readily told investigators that he knew another of the hijackers, Nawaf al-Hazmi, and consented to searches of his apartment, car and computer, even supplying the password: Islam.

"He went above and beyond the call," Mr. Berman said. "Is this someone that's trying to mislead a grand jury?"

The jury, made up of nine women and three men, deliberated for about an hour late yesterday before breaking for the evening. They will resume deliberations this morning.

Mr. Awadallah, 26, is charged with two counts of perjury and faces a maximum of 10 years in prison and then deportation if convicted.

The five-day trial was held in the same dark-paneled courtroom where, in May, a jury became hopelessly deadlocked over Mr. Awadallah's fate, with all but one juror favoring conviction.

Mr. Awadallah, who has been free on bail in San Diego, sat quietly throughout yesterday's proceedings. Behind him in the sparsely filled gallery sat his older brother, Jamal, a San Diego businessman, and their father, Ismail, a retired halal butcher who had arrived the night before from Jordan.

As in the earlier trial, prosecutors did their best to close the distance between ground zero, which sits just blocks from the courthouse, and the five years since the attacks.

"He didn't just lie to a grand jury," Mr. Metzner said. "He lied just a month after the attacks, when so much was still unknown."

Mr. Awadallah has never been accused of plotting with the terrorists or having advance knowledge of the attacks. But Mr. Metzner told jurors that Mr. Awadallah's lies to the grand jury, coming in the days after the attacks with fear of more attacks permeating the air, could have sent investigators meandering down wrong and time-consuming paths.

The government's interest in Mr. Awadallah began after investigators discovered a scrap of paper with the name "Osama" and Mr. Awadallah's former telephone number in the glove compartment of a car that Mr. Hazmi had left at Dulles International Airport, near Washington.

At the time, Mr. Awadallah was a 21-year-old college student in San Diego, where Mr. Hazmi and Mr. Midhar had lived until about a year before they boarded American Airlines Flight 77, which crashed into the Pentagon.

Under questioning by the F.B.I., Mr. Awadallah said he knew Mr. Hazmi, who worked at the same gas station and worshiped at the same mosque. He also said he remembered an acquaintance of Mr. Hazmi and described him physically but said he had never learned his name. When shown a picture of Khalid al-Midhar, Mr. Awadallah claimed not to recognize him.

After two days of interviews, Mr. Awadallah was detained as a material witness on Sept. 21, 2001, and was held in isolation at several jails.

In his first grand jury appearance nearly three weeks later, Mr. Awadallah again denied knowing anyone named Khalid. But after a long day of testimony, prosecutors showed him an essay booklet given to them by Mr. Awadallah's teacher of English as a

Second Language. In it, written just four days after the terrorist attacks, was the passage: “One of the quietest people I have met is Nawaf. Another one, his name is Khalid.”

Mr. Awadallah at first said the booklet appeared altered, because he would not have spelled “Khalid” that way. Mr. Berman said that his client realized his mistake shortly after testifying and alerted his lawyers to it, but that prosecutors chose not to call the grand jurors back into the room.

When Mr. Awadallah appeared again before the grand jury five days later, he acknowledged that the handwriting was his and that he now remembered meeting Mr. Midhar.

During the trial, Mr. Berman showed a chart of bruises on Mr. Awadallah’s upper arms and the back of his neck, which he said his client had sustained at the hands of guards. The government has denied any mistreatment.

By the time Mr. Awadallah appeared before the grand jury, he was disoriented, exhausted and “freaked out,” which is why he initially believed that the booklet had been doctored, Mr. Berman said.

His comments underscored the notion that, though Judge Shira Scheindlin of Federal District Court warned jurors otherwise, the government was on trial for its treatment of Mr. Awadallah.

In 2002, Judge Scheindlin threw out the perjury charges against Mr. Awadallah, calling them the fruit of an illegal detention and saying that the government used duress and coercion to get him to agree to interviews.

The charges were reinstated more than a year later after a federal appeals court overturned Judge Scheindlin’s ruling.

Jury Weighs Fate Of Man Accused Of Lying About Sept. 11 Hijacker (FINDLAW/AP)

By David B. Caruso, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 17, 2006

(AP) - NEW YORK-For the second time, a jury is considering whether a foreign college student involuntarily sucked into the Sept. 11 terror probe tried to distance himself from the case by lying to a grand jury about how well he knew one of the hijackers.

Osama Awadallah was arrested in San Diego 10 days after the 2001 terror attacks when a slip of paper with his phone number on it was found in a hijacker's car. He spent the next 20 days jailed as a material witness while authorities tried to figure out what he knew.

Agents finally concluded that Awadallah was no terrorist and had only known hijackers Nawaf al-Hazmi and Khalid al-Mihdhar briefly, but he was charged with perjury over a contentious grand jury session in which he claimed he didn't remember al-Mihdhar's name.

The first trial on the perjury charge ended in a hung jury last spring.

In his closing argument at the retrial on Thursday, defense attorney Jesse Berman said Awadallah, who was 20 when he was arrested, was simply exhausted, confused and frightened during his grand jury testimony and didn't intend to mislead anyone.

"He was sincerely trying to be helpful," Berman said.

He accused FBI agents and prosecutors of deliberately provoking and upsetting Awadallah, who was handcuffed to his chair. In the weeks leading up to his testimony, Awadallah was kept in solitary confinement and was subjected to strip searches. He also claimed to have been beaten by his jailers.

"All the importance of the 9/11 investigation doesn't justify treating this man like a dog," Berman said.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Karl Metzner told jurors there was no evidence Awadallah was confused, forgetful or disoriented by mistreatment.

"He didn't make a mistake. He lied deliberately," Metzner said.

The smoking gun, he said, was an examination booklet that Awadallah had filled out for an English class a few days before his arrest.

In it, he had written, "One of the quietest people I have met is Nawaf. Another one, his name is Khalid." Metzner said that proved that Awadallah knew the hijackers better than he had let on.

"He decided he was only going to tell the grand jury as much as he thought he had to, and no more," Metzner said.

DOJ_NMG_0095518

Jurors began their deliberations Thursday evening. They went home for the night without having reached a verdict and were to continue their work Friday.

Awadallah, who was born in Venezuela and raised in Jordan, could face up to five years in prison if convicted, although U.S. District Judge Shira Scheindlin said during the case that she would be unlikely to sentence him to significant jail time. He also could be deported.

The trial focused on a strained exchange between Awadallah and his interrogators during his grand jury testimony of Oct. 10, 2001.

During the session, Awadallah acknowledged repeatedly that he knew al-Hazmi. The two had attended the same mosque and worked at the same gas station in San Diego.

He also described a second man who was often in al-Hazmi's company but said he couldn't remember his name. Asked if he knew anyone named Khalid, Awadallah said no.

A skeptical prosecutor then confronted Awadallah with the examination booklet.

Caught off guard, Awadallah initially claimed someone else had doctored the document. Five days later, he appeared before the grand jury a second time and acknowledged that the sentence was his. He said his earlier testimony had been confused.

Pentagon Wants War-crimes Compound At Guantanamo (MH)

By Carol Rosenberg

The Miami Herald, November 17, 2006

The Pentagon plans a Military Commissions compound at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, costing up to $125 million, a major undertaking meant to accommodate up to 1,200 people at the Navy base for the first U.S. war crimes trials since World War II, The Miami Herald learned Thursday.

If funded by Congress, it would be the largest single construction expenditure at Guantánamo since the Bush administration set up the offshore detention and interrogation center in January 2002.

No Defense Department official would speak about the project with his or her name attached.

But one Pentagon insider with knowledge of the plan said officials envision the fast-track construction of a major compound at an abandoned airfield that in the 1990s housed a tent camp for Cuban rafters. Years before it had been a dirigible hangar for U.S. military blimps.

Some of the details are specified in a "pre-solicitation notice," which has been posted on the Web for potential government contractors.

The proposed complex would have housing, dining and work space for anyone involved in the trials. The project seeks to have two courtrooms completed by July, and an option to build two more before 2008, said the Pentagon official, who requested he not be identified because he wasn't authorized to speak for the department.

The official did not know whether the Pentagon would seek authorization and funding from the so-called lame-duck Congress controlled by the Republicans, or wait until the Democrats take control of Congress in January.

"They're going to have to go to Congress," the official said, adding that the Navy posted the notice for would-be contractors Nov. 3, ahead of the general elections, ``really to give folks out there interested in that kind of work a heads up that something is coming."

Bill Sutey, military advisor on the staff of Florida Democratic Sen. Bill Nelson, a member of the Senate Armed Services Committee, said, ``As a matter of law, it would require an appropriation. It's not even authorized yet."

"To anybody it would beg questions about, What are we doing here? Why are we doing it this way? What is the requirement? Why is it going to cost that much? These are routine oversight questions and we will do this," Sutey said.

The U.S. Supreme Court in June shut down the administration's first effort to stage the commissions, declaring the formula unconstitutional.

Now, armed with a new Military Commissions Act approved by Congress, administration officials are rewriting rules for the trials. They could resume in early 2007 with suspected terrorists being charged, according to the chief prosecutor, Air Force Col. Morris Davis.

The Pentagon proposal estimates the cost of the project to be from $75 million to $125 million. It would include a courthouse with two courtrooms, a communications and closed-circuit center, a motorpool facility for up to 100 cars, housing for 800-1,200 personnel and a dining facility for up to 800 people.

To put the project in perspective, the annual operating costs at the detention center some miles away are about $100 million, according to Rear Adm. Harry Harris, the center's commander.

Once the Pentagon makes a formal request, the first opportunity to fund the new complex would be to include in supplemental spending packages being prepared by Congress for votes after a Thanksgiving recess.

The Navy would administer the building contract for what the pre-solicitation notice calls a ``Legal Compound at U.S. Guantánamo Bay, Cuba."

It lists the site as McCalla Field, an area overlooking the bay itself -- a considerable distance from the bluff overlooking the Caribbean where the 430 or so "enemy combatants" are housed and interrogated in a facility called Camp Delta and ringed by barbed-wire.

A Camp Delta spokesman, Navy Cmdr. Robert Durand, said by e-mail Thursday that the Office of the Secretary of Defense is responsible for any Military Commissions activity, but he believed ``a supplemental budget appropriation request is going out soon."

Navy Lt. Cmdr. Chito Peppler, a Pentagon spokesman for Guantánamo, said he had no information to release on the proposed court complex.

Other spokesmen at Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld's Public Affairs division did not respond to inquiries about the proposed project.

Earlier efforts to stage the trials focused on alleged al Qaeda conspirators, among them Yemeni captive Salim Ahmed Hamdan, whose defense attorney, a Navy officer, challenged the formula in the civilian courts.

Since then, the CIA has sent to Guantánamo 14 suspected al Qaeda ringleaders -- among them alleged 9/11 mastermind Khalid Sheik Mohammed. Their presence at Guantánamo has heightened international interest in any prospective future war crimes trials.

Mohammed and the 13 other men had been interrogated and held in secret for three or more years, out of reach of the International Red Cross, and never charged with any crimes.

Report: Gitmo Detainees Denied Witnesses (AP-Y)

By Ben Fox, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 17, 2006

The U.S. military called no witnesses, withheld evidence from detainees and usually reached a decision within a day as it determined that hundreds of men detained at Guantanamo Bay were "enemy combatants," according to a new report.

The analysis of transcripts and records by two lawyers for Guantanamo detainees, aided by more than two dozen law students, found that hearings that determined whether a prisoner should remain in custody gave the accused little opportunity to contest allegations against him.

"These were not hearings. These were shams," said Mark Denbeaux, an attorney and Seton Hall University law professor who along with his son, Joshua, is the author of the report. They provided an advance copy of the report to The Associated Press late Thursday and planned to release it Friday on the Internet.

Their report, based on an analysis of records of military hearings of 393 detainees, comes as the U.S. government seeks to severely restrict detainee access to civilian courts, arguing that the Combatant Status Review Tribunals should be their main legal recourse.

Navy Cmdr. Jeffrey Gordon, a Pentagon spokesman, dismissed the findings as "recycled allegations," and noted the tribunals gave each detainee an opportunity to contest their designation as an enemy combatant.

"It is not a criminal trial and is not intended to determine guilt or innocence," Gordon said. "Rather, it is an administrative process ... to confirm the status of enemy combatants detained at Guantanamo as part of the Global War on Terrorism."

The military held Combatant Status Review Tribunals for 558 detainees at the U.S. Naval Base at Guantanamo Bay in southeast Cuba between July 2004 and January 2005 and found all but 38 were enemy combatants. Handcuffed detainees appeared before a panel of three officers with no defense attorney, only a military "personal representative."

According to the report, the representatives said nothing in the hearings 14 percent of the time and made no "substantive" comments in 30 percent. In some cases, the representative even appeared to advocate the government's position, the report said.

The report is based on transcripts of tribunals that the government first released earlier this year in response to a Freedom of Information Act lawsuit filed by The Associated Press as well additional records provided by lawyers for 102 Guantanamo detainees.

Twenty-one first-year law students at Seton Hall University in Newark, N.J., analyzed the documents to create a database analyzed by eight second- and third-year students.

Among their findings:

• The government did not produce any witnesses in any hearing.

• The military denied all detainee requests to inspect the classified evidence against them.

• The military refused all requests for defense witnesses who were not detained at Guantanamo.

• In 74 percent of the cases, the government denied requests to call witnesses who were detained at the prison.

• In 91 percent of the hearings, the detainees did not present any evidence.

• In three cases, the panel found that the detainee was "no longer an enemy combatant," but the military convened new tribunals that later found them to be enemy combatants.

"No American would ever consider this to be hearing," Denbeaux said. "This is a show trial."

The U.S. military now holds about 430 men at Guantanamo on suspicion of links to al-Qaida or the Taliban and holds Administrative Review Boards for them once a year to determine whether they should still be held, released or transferred to another country.

The Military Commissions Act, which President Bush signed on Oct. 17, strips all non-U.S. citizens held under suspicion of being an enemy combatant of their right to challenge their detention in civilian courts with petitions of habeas corpus.

Friend Of 9/11 Hijackers Convicted As An Accessory To Murder (WP)

KARLSRUHE, Germany, Nov. 16 -- A Moroccan man was convicted of being an accessory to murder in the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon, as a German appeals court ruled Thursday that evidence showed he knew that the plotters planned to hijack and crash planes.

The Federal Court of Justice found that a Hamburg court decided wrongly last year to acquit Mounir Motassadeq of direct involvement in the attacks, even as it convicted him of membership in a terrorist organization and sentenced him to seven years in prison.

Motassadeq, 32, was a close friend of hijackers Mohamed Atta, Marwan al-Shehhi and Ziad Samir Jarrah when they lived and studied in Hamburg. He has acknowledged training at an al-Qaeda camp in Afghanistan but has insisted he knew nothing of their plans.

"The defendant is guilty not only of membership in a terrorist organization, but also as an accessory to murder of the 246 passengers and crew members of the crashed aircraft," the federal court said.

It ordered the Hamburg court to reconsider his sentence. Motassadeq, who was not present for the ruling, now could face a maximum of 15 years in prison.

That could end a five-year saga that started with his arrest in Hamburg in November 2001 and has featured two trials -- although defense lawyers held out hope of taking his case to Germany's highest court.

Motassadeq, who already has spent a total of about three years in prison, has been free pending appeals since February, although he has had to hand in his passport to authorities and report regularly to police. An Associated Press reporter saw him leaving his Hamburg home in a car on Thursday.

No date was set for sentencing, and federal prosecutors said a Hamburg court later Thursday rejected their plea to return him to prison immediately. Prosecutors said they would appeal that decision.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Man With Nuclear Data, Cash Arrested At Detroit Airport (USAT)

By Donna Leinwand

USA Today, November 17, 2006

Federal agents continue to investigate a Dallas man arrested at a Detroit airport Tuesday after arriving on a flight from Amsterdam with nearly $79,000 in cash and a laptop computer that, according to court papers, contained information about nuclear materials and cyanide.

Sisayehiticha Dinssa will appear for a detention hearing before U.S. Magistrate Judge R. Steven Whalen at 1 p.m. Monday. He is charged with illegally concealing more than $10,000 in his luggage and with smuggling bulk cash into the USA. If convicted, Dinssa could be sentenced to five years in prison on each charge.

Agents said Thursday they had no evidence to suggest Dinssa was involved in a terrorism plot, Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) spokesman Greg Palmore said. "The initial findings definitely are making us want to find out more about this," Palmore added. "We need to get clear about what this guy was up to."

Dinssa, a naturalized U.S. citizen originally from Ethiopia, arrived at Detroit Metro Airport's McNamara Terminal on Tuesday on a Northwest Airlines flight from Amsterdam, according to a sworn statement by ICE Special Agent Zachary Keen.

Dinssa, described in court papers as unemployed, told agents he had spent the previous months in Nairobi and had tried to start a taxi business, Palmore said. Dinssa was traveling through Amsterdam and Detroit on his way to Phoenix, Palmore said. "He wasn't very forthcoming."

Dinssa had been flagged by Customs and Border Protection inspectors for further screening after agents received information from authorities abroad that Dinssa had been "acting very strangely," Palmore said.

Inspectors found $78,883 on Dinssa and in his luggage — $60,000 more than Dinssa reported carrying when questioned by Customs agents, Keen wrote. A drug-sniffing dog smelled narcotics on the money, Keen added. No drugs were found, Palmore said.

Inspectors examined Dinssa's computer after they noticed he did not have a power cord for it, which they considered unusual, Keen wrote. Inspectors found downloaded files about cyanide and nuclear materials, Keen wrote.

"When questioned about the materials on his laptop, Dinssa stated that he was interested in learning about cyanide and nuclear materials," Keen wrote.

"There are a lot of missing pieces to the puzzle," Palmore said.

Dinssa's court-appointed public defender, Leroy Soles, could not be reached for comment at his office Thursday.

Airport Arrest Turns Up Nuclear Info (AP)

The AP, November 16, 2006

A man was arrested at Detroit Metropolitan Airport after officials say they found him carrying nearly $79,000 in cash and a laptop computer containing information about nuclear materials and cyanide.

Sisayehiticha Dinssa, an unemployed U.S. citizen, was arrested Tuesday after a dog caught the scent of narcotics on cash he was carrying, according to an affidavit filed in court.

When agents asked him if he had any cash to declare, he said he had $18,000, authorities said. But when agents checked his luggage, they found an additional amount of about $60,900. When they scrolled through his laptop, they said they found the mysterious files.

At a court hearing Wednesday, Dinssa was ordered held in custody until at least until Monday at the request of prosecutors.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Leonid Feller argued Dinssa was a potential risk to the community and federal agents want to get a warrant to search his computer more thoroughly, The Detroit News reported Thursday. U.S. Magistrate Donald Scheer approved Feller's request to detain him.

Dinssa, who is from Dallas, arrived in Detroit from Nigeria by way of Amsterdam and was headed for Phoenix, Feller said. He is charged with concealing more than $10,000 in his luggage, which carries a maximum penalty of five years in prison, the Detroit Free Press reported.

A message seeking comment was left Thursday with his lawyer, Leroy Soles.

Man Stopped At Port Of Entry With Large Cash Sums And Laptop With Nuclear Information (ABC)

By Pierre Thomas And Jason Ryan

ABC News, November 17, 2006

A U.S. citizen of Ethiopian descent was arrested as he came into the U.S. on a flight from Amsterdam on Tuesday.

Sisayehiticha Dinssa was arrested by Immigration and Customs Enforcement agents after he was flagged for secondary inspection on entry to the U.S. at the Detroit Airport and was found to be carrying more than $78,000 in cash. Customs officials became suspicious of Dinssa when a narcotics dog signaled the scent of drugs on the money in his possession.

Customs officers also discovered that Dinssa was in possession of a laptop computer for which he had no power source. During an initial look at the computer, "Inspectors discovered some files that had been downloaded with information about cyanide and nuclear materials," an affidavit from an ICE agent filed in the U.S. District Court in Detroit noted.

According to two senior U.S. government officials briefed on the matter, the files appear to be beyond what someone would normally download from the Internet. According to U.S. officials, Dinssa may have been researching the materials extensively.

Dinssa had claimed he was only carrying $18,000. It is undetermined if this is an alleged smuggling case or potentially something more sinister.

According to federal law enforcement sources, U.S. intelligence agencies and counterterrorism officials have been tasked to run down any leads on Dinssa in their databases. According to the court records, when questioned about the information on his laptop, Dinssa said that he was "interested in learning about cyanide and nuclear materials."

FBI agents and investigators from the U.S. Attorney's Office are expected to obtain a search warrant and examine the hard drive of the computer to determine the nature of the computer files. The Justice Department has asked that Dinssa be held in custody until he makes an appearance Monday in federal court for a detention hearing.

Calls by ABC News to a lawyer representing Dinssa have not been returned.

Muslim Detained By CIA Granted U.S. Visa (WT)

By Shaun Waterman

The Washington Times, November 17, 2006

A German Muslim whose detention and torture by the CIA prompted an apology from Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will be granted a visa to come to the United States, although he might still be refused entry.

"Khaled el-Masri was found inadmissible to the United States on the basis of ... terrorist activities, and issued a visa on the basis of a waiver from the Department of Homeland Security," a State Department official told United Press International.

The official declined to comment further, saying that the details of visa decisions were confidential.

Department of Homeland Security spokesman Russ Knocke also declined to comment on the case.

Under U.S. law, a visa does not give a foreigner the right to enter the United States -- something that is granted at the port of entry by inspectors working for the Department of Homeland Security.

"He could still be turned away" if he was on the U.S. watch list of known or suspected terrorists, said one official.

Mr. el-Masri, a German citizen of Egyptian origin, said in a lawsuit last year that he was stopped at the Macedonian border in December 2003 while on vacation, and handed over to U.S. officials, who beat and drugged him, and took him to a secret prison in Afghanistan, where he was detained without charge and subjected to "coercive interrogation" for five months.

His case has become a lightning rod for European criticism of the United States over secret CIA prisons and other practices, including secret imprisonment of terror suspects without trial.

Mr. el-Masri has always denied any link to terrorism, and German Chancellor Angela Merkel said last year that Miss Rice had apologized for what she called "a mistake."

The American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU), which is representing Mr. el-Masri in his lawsuit, welcomed the news that he would be granted a visa.

"You would hope that after wrongfully detaining this man, torturing him, and then dumping him in Albania, they would have decency to let him come into the country to meet his lawyers," said ACLU attorney Anne Beeson.

But when Mr. el-Masri sought to enter the United States last December under the visa waiver available for German visitors, he was denied entry.

His lawyers said that he was met by homeland security officials and taken to an interview room for what is called secondary immigration screening.

After explaining the purpose of his trip, Mr. el-Masri "quite rightly refused to cooperate with authorities ... until his U.S. lawyer was present," ACLU lawyer Steven Watt told UPI.

He was told he was inadmissible under the visa waiver program, but could apply for a visa.

Two federal officials confirmed at the time that Mr. el-Masri's name was on the secret U.S. watch list of known or suspected terrorists, the Terrorist Screening Database.

One of them told UPI that there was a high-level dispute last year between the State Department and another agency, which had originally "nominated" Mr. el-Masri to the list.

"State wanted him taken off," said the official, adding that the dispute had risen to what he called "a high level" within the agencies involved.

Group Will Sort Terrorism Alerts For Local Governments (WP)

By Karen DeYoung

The Washington Post, November 17, 2006

A new plan to improve information-sharing about terrorism, signed by President Bush this week and delivered to Congress yesterday, establishes a Washington-based "threat assessment group" that includes federal, state and local officials. It also aims to reduce more than 100 restrictive and confusing categories of "sensitive" federal information to a half-dozen or fewer so local-level officials can better understand what they are told.

State and local governments and law enforcement officials have long complained of a lack of coordination among the federal agencies that send terrorism-related alerts, analysis and instructions. The new plan allows state and local officials to participate in deciding what players outside the federal government need to know and designates an online channel to distribute the information.

The 165-page plan complies with part of the intelligence reorganization mandated by Congress in 2004. Designed to avoid a repeat of failures that preceded the September 2001 al-Qaeda attacks, the legislation created the Office of the Director of National Intelligence and the National Counterterrorism Center to facilitate coordination within the federal intelligence community. The legislation also ordered creation of new systems to ensure that terrorism information was adequately shared among federal, state and local entities, resulting in the plan released yesterday.

The newly released plan "restructures the way we handle intelligence and other information so that state and local customers get products that they can use," said Thomas E. McNamara, whose office, under Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte, wrote it with input from across the government. A career diplomat with extensive national security and counterterrorism experience, McNamara was appointed by Bush early this year to fulfill the legislation's vague instruction to establish an "information sharing environment."

The intelligence community has long acknowledged that cooperation throughout government is crucial to catching potential terrorists in this country and preventing another attack. But a level of "cultural inertia" still exists at the federal level, McNamara said.

"A lot of people think that information-sharing . . . means that security and control of the information being shared will be diminished, and if security diminishes, that's a negative," McNamara said. "I'm trying to convince them that if this is done right, security will be at least as good and possibly better."

McNamara expects the new Interagency Threat Assessment Coordination Group, based at the National Counterterrorism Center and headed by the Department of Homeland Security, to be operating by year's end. It will include officials from Justice, Defense, Transportation and Energy, and from state government and local law enforcement.

Operating 24 hours a day, seven days a week, the group will receive real-time intelligence information and determine what needs to be distributed around the country. That is designed to avoid confusion that has resulted in the past when one agency, for example, distributed a nationwide threat assessment that contradicted another agency.

The plan sets a 120-day deadline for coming up with a streamlined list of "sensitive but unclassified" security classifications used by the federal government. Federal agencies have independently established more than 100 such categories of restricted information, many of them overlapping and most of them confusing to police and sheriffs departments that are expected to comply with them. McNamara said he was aiming for "six or fewer" categories.

Army Urged On Chemical Weapon Disposal (AP)

AP, November 16, 2006

Technologies used to destroy chemical weapons in Europe and Japan are faster than one in the U.S. and should be considered, the National Research Council said Thursday.

In a study requested by the Army, the council said the foreign systems are as safe and sometimes more environmentally friendly that those in use here.

Destruction of chemical weapons recovered from burial sites has been under way since the early 1990s. An international convention calls for them to be destroyed by next April.

"If the U.S. Department of Defense decides to expedite the destruction of the large amounts of chemical weapons still buried in many parts of the country, using one of these technologies will be essential," said Richard Ayen, chairman of the committee that prepared the report. He is retired director of technology at Waste Management Inc. of Houston.

The study suggested three technologies for use:

_The Controlled Detonation Chamber, developed by DeMil International Inc. of Alabama and used in Europe. It places explosives around the munitions and then detonates them in a tightly sealed chamber.

_The Detonation of Ammunition in a Vacuum-Integrated Chamber technology, developed by Kobe Steel in Japan. It works in a similar way.

_A system developed by Swedish company Dynasafe. It detonates munitions in a kiln heated to temperatures between 720 degrees and 1,080 degrees Fahrenheit.

The council is an arm of the National Academy of Sciences, an independent organization chartered by Congress to advise the government on scientific issues.

U.S. Citizenship Of Former Graduate Student Born In West Bank Revoked (AP)

FAYETTEVILLE, Arkansas: A former University of Arkansas graduate student from the Middle East lost his U.S. citizenship Thursday and was sentenced to 15 months in federal prison.

Arwah Jaber, who was born in the West Bank, was previously acquitted of an aiding-terrorism charge but convicted of lesser offenses, including obtaining his citizenship fraudulently. He also was sentenced to three years supervised probation upon completion of his prison term.

DOJ_NMG_0095525

Jaber was arrested at the Northwest Regional Airport on June 14, 2005, as he prepared to leave on a trip to the Middle East. Prosecutors said he planned to join Palestinian Islamic Jihad, labeled by U.S. authorities as a terrorist organization.

Jaber obtained a doctoral degree in chemistry from the university while he awaited trial.

He was acquitted June 20 of attempting to provide material support to a terrorist organization. But the jury convicted Jaber of five lesser charges: obtaining his naturalization unlawfully, making false statements on passport and immigration applications, and two counts of making false statements on credit card applications.

Jaber said at his trial that he did not cite his Palestinian name, Orwah Houshia, in immigration papers — though he applied for credit cards using that name — because he had used Arwah Jaber on all his immigration papers up until then.

VaxGen Wins Extension On Anthrax Vaccine (WP)

By Renae Merle

The Washington Post, November 17, 2006

VaxGen Inc., a California biotechnology firm, said yesterday that the government had given it more time to conduct human testing of its anthrax vaccine, postponing a decision on whether the program should be canceled.

The Food and Drug Administration threw the effort into doubt earlier this month after calling a halt to testing in response to questions about the drug's reliability. The decision put the company in potential violation of its contract with the Department of Health and Human Services, which required testing to begin Nov. 13.

VaxGen said HHS has decided to extend the company's deadline for resolving the issue until Dec. 18. At stake is a contract potentially worth $1 billion.

Meeting that deadline will be difficult. The company has yet to hold a formal telephone or in-person meeting with the FDA.

Those meetings should occur no later than the middle of December, said Lance Ignon, VaxGen's vice president of corporate affairs. "HHS, it appears, has provided the necessary time for us to meet with FDA to try to discuss our data and try to find a pathway forward," he said.

VaxGen's anthrax vaccine effort, already years behind schedule, is the largest component of the Bush administration's Project BioShield, a $5.6 billion effort to counter bioterrorism threats. The firm has run into several technical problems, including a previous failed human test, and has struggled to fund its research. The contract calls for the company to be paid after it delivers the vaccine -- which is supposed to be enough for 25 million people, roughly the population in the New York and Washington metropolitan areas combined.

The latest problem centers on the vaccine's stability or the rate at which it would deteriorate while stockpiled. VaxGen has said it was encouraged by the improvements it made to the vaccine's stability, but that FDA still had concerns.

Convoy Of Civilians Hijacked In Iraq (AP)

By Bassem Mroue

AP, November 17, 2006

The Pentagon said a convoy of civilians traveling near Nasiriyah was hijacked on Thursday, while earlier in the day the Shiite-led Interior Ministry issued an arrest warrant for the top leader of the country's Sunni minority. The move was certain to inflame already raging sectarian violence.

Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman said preliminary reports suggested there could be as many as 14 people captured and that the convoy included about 19 vehicles.

An official familiar with the incident said preliminary reports being checked by the military indicated that the attack occurred at a checkpoint near Nasiriyah and that four Americans were believed to have been taken captive.

The official, who requested anonymity because of the security situation in Iraq, said it appears that some of the convoy drivers had been released, and were being interviewed by the military. He said initial reports suggest that the attack occurred at a checkpoint in a location where normally there is no blockade.

DOJ_NMG_0095526

The convoy was being operated by the Crescent Security Group. The company works mostly in Iraq, and its operations are based in Kuwait.

Interior Minister Jawad al-Bolani, a Shiite, announced Thursday on state television that Harith al-Dhari was wanted for inciting terrorism and violence among the Iraqi people.

Al-Dhari, head of the influential Sunni Association of Muslim Scholars, is an extreme hard-liner who recently mocked a government offer of reconciliation in return for abandoning the insurgency. But the move against him threatens to drive many moderate Sunnis out of the political system.

Already, moderate Sunnis have been threatening for weeks to leave the government and take up arms. If that happens, it would likely lead to a full-fledged civil war and make it much harder for U.S. troops to withdraw from Iraq.

The warrant was issued on a day when at least 49 Iraqis died violently and the U.S. military announced the deaths of four more American soldiers. Sunnis and Shiites could not agree on whether all hostages had been released from a mass abduction in Baghdad two days earlier, and one man said he'd been beaten by the kidnappers.

Mohammed Bashar al-Faidi, spokesman for the Sunni association, condemned the warrant for al-Dhari's arrest.

"This government should resign before the Iraqi people force it to resign," al-Faidi told Al-Jazeera television from Jordan. "The association calls on its people to be calm."

Al-Faidi accused the interior minister "of supporting terrorism by covering for (Shiite) militias that are killing the Iraqi people."

Earlier this year, the Sunni association blamed the Interior Ministry for the killing of a nephew and cousin of al-Dhari. Their bodies were found in a bullet-riddled vehicle in Baghdad.

Al-Dhari regularly travels between Iraq and the Persian Gulf states, as well as Syria, Jordan and Egypt. He was believed to be in Jordan when the arrest warrant was issued Thursday night.

Al-Dhari, who is about 65, is an outspoken critic of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's Shiite-dominated government and the U.S. occupation. On Tuesday, President Jalal Talabani, a Kurd, called him a hard-liner with "nothing to do but incite sectarian and ethnic sedition."

There is precedent for an arrest warrant leading to violence in Iraq.

In April 2004, a U.S. warrant against radical anti-American Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr prompted a two-week uprising by his Mahdi Army militia. Hundreds were killed.

Al-Maliki, despite heavy pressure from the United States, has done nothing to wipe out the Mahdi Army. Its benefactor, al-Sadr, is a key backer of the prime minister.

The Mahdi Army was believed responsible for kidnapping scores of people from a Higher Education Ministry office building in Baghdad on Tuesday. The aftermath of that mass abduction has turned into a propaganda war.

On Thursday, the Sunni higher education minister called the Interior Ministry "a farce" for not preventing the crime and claimed more than half the 150 victims were still in the hands of Shiite abductors.

But National Security Adviser Mouwafak al-Rubaie, a Shiite, said everyone had been freed and accused Arab satellite broadcasters and Western media of hostile reporting to incite sectarian hatred in Iraq.

Within hours, however, Brig. Gen. Abdul-Karim Khalaf, spokesman for the Interior Ministry, was amending that account, saying all the Higher Education Ministry employees were free but that others taken from the building were still hostages. He gave no numbers.

A Sunni who said he was among those abducted and released claimed his arm was broken by the kidnappers. He said he saw them kill at least three hostages after taking them to empty houses in Baghdad's Sadr City Shiite slum, a stronghold of the Mahdi Army.

The man, who goes by the name Abu Kadhim, or father of Kadhim, would not allow use of his full name for fear of further trouble with the Mahdi Army, which he blamed for his torture and 2 1/2 days in captivity. He disputed Khalaf's claim that police had freed the kidnap victims.

"Thursday, they just opened the doors and dragged us into trucks. Then they dumped us on Canal Street," Abu Kadhim said. That street runs along the Army Canal just west of Sadr City.

"I was lucky," he said. "They only beat me with a wooden club. Others were handcuffed and hanged from the ceiling by their wrists. They were beaten with iron bars. Others, building guards, had cotton shoved in their mouths and tape wound around their heads. They suffocated. One was shot in the back. The managers in the building and people with higher degrees, masters and doctorates, were in a different room. I could hear them screaming like women. Then it was quiet. I think they died."

Abu Kadhim's story could not be independently confirmed. He was interviewed by telephone.

In Thursday's deadliest attack in the capital, gunmen fired on a bakery, killing nine people, police said. Such attacks are usually carried out by Sunni militants since most bakeries in the capital are run by Shiites.

The U.S. military announced that three Task Force Lightning soldiers assigned to 3rd Brigade Combat Team, 1st Cavalry Division, were killed Wednesday in Diyala province northeast of Baghdad, one by small arms fire and two by a roadside bomb. A soldier from the Army's Multinational Corps-Iraq was killed Tuesday by small arms fire during an operation in Baghdad.

The deaths raised the number of American war dead to 2,862. So far this month in Iraq, 44 American service members have been killed or died.

Another Day Of Heavy Violence In Iraq (LAT)

By Louise Roug

The Los Angeles Times, November 17, 2006

BAGHDAD — Five more American soldiers have been killed in Iraq, the U.S. military said, and gunmen, rockets and roadside bombs killed at least 17 Iraqis and wounded 25 others Thursday.

For Iraqis in the capital, the violence began at 7 a.m., when a roadside bomb killed a policeman and injured three others in an eastern part of town. Twenty minutes later, armed men sprayed a bakery with gunfire, killing nine people and injuring two in central Baghdad.

A second bomb went off near a municipal court building on the eastern side of the city less than two hours later, killing one person and injuring eight others.

A third bomb injured four just before noon in the city center. Ten minutes later, a fourth bomb went off near a garbage collection point east of the Tigris River, killing one and injuring three others.

Later in the afternoon, explosives hidden in a motorcycle went off near a gas station in central Baghdad, killing one and injuring another. Four other bombs killed four people in separate attacks.

South of the capital, meanwhile, British forces were barraged by rockets and mortar fire; no one was killed in the attacks.

This morning, the U.S. military said a soldier was shot to death Thursday in the volatile Diyala province north of the capital. The other four Americans were killed in previous days.

In two separate attacks Wednesday in Diyala, one U.S. soldier was fatally shot and two others were killed by a roadside bomb. One more soldier was shot and killed in Baghdad on Tuesday, according to military statements.

At least 2,864 U.S. troops have died in Iraq since the 2003 American-led invasion, according to icasualties.org.+

The American military also announced the killing of nine suspected insurgents in Yousifiya, south of the capital. U.S.-led forces saw the suspected rebels hiding in nearby woods and called in air support. Several of the men killed in the aerial assault were wearing suicide vests, according to the U.S. military.

About 1,000 Iraqi soldiers searched villages south of the northern city of Kirkuk, where Iraqi and American troops have been targeted in the past.

Violence In Iraq Called Increasingly Complex (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, November 17, 2006

Attacks in Iraq reached a high of approximately 180 a day last month, reflecting an increasingly complicated conflict that includes sectarian clashes of Sunni and Shiite militias on top of continuing strikes by insurgents, criminal gangs and al-Qaeda terrorists, according to the directors of the CIA and the Defense Intelligence Agency.

"No single narrative is sufficient to explain all the violence we see in Iraq today," Gen. Michael V. Hayden, the CIA director, told the Senate Armed Services Committee on Wednesday.

Attempting to describe the enemy, Lt. Gen. Michael D. Maples, the DIA director, listed "Iraqi nationalists, ex-Baathists, former military, angry Sunni, Jihadists, foreign fighters and al-Qaeda," who create an "overlapping, complex and multi-polar Sunni insurgent and terrorist environment." He added that "Shia militias and Shia militants, some Kurdish pesh merga, and extensive criminal activity further contribute to violence, instability and insecurity."

In unusually harsh terms, the two intelligence directors spelled out how quickly the violence in Iraq has escalated this year, from about 70 attacks a day in January to about 100 a day in May and then to last month's figure. "Violence in Iraq continues to increase in scope, complexity, and lethality" despite operations by the Iraqi government and the U.S.-led coalition, Maples said. He described "an atmosphere of fear and hardening sectarianism which is empowering militias and vigilante groups, hastening middle-class exodus, and shaking confidence in government and security forces."

"The longer this goes on, the less controlled the violence is, the more the violence devolves down to the neighborhood level," Hayden added. "The center disappears, and normal people acting not irrationally end up acting like extremists."

Although the Bush administration continues to emphasize the role of al-Qaeda in Iraq, Maples described the current situation as "mostly an intra-Arab struggle to determine how power and authority will be distributed," with or without the U.S. presence. Al-Qaeda and foreign terrorist numbers were put at roughly 1,300, while Hayden, pressed by senators, estimated the number of insurgents in the "low tens of thousands." Maples estimated the number of Iraqi insurgents, including militias, at 20,000 to 30,000, and said there are many more who supply support.

Asked about the brazen kidnapping in Baghdad on Tuesday of some 100 employees in the Sunni-led Ministry of Education by an apparent Shiite group in commando uniforms using Interior Ministry vehicles, Hayden said the CIA station chief in Iraq said it showed that the battlefield "is descending into smaller and smaller groups fighting over smaller and smaller issues over smaller and smaller pieces of territory."

Hayden said he believes that the turning point in the fighting came in February with the bombing of the Askariya mosque in Samarra. The destruction of the revered Shiite site by Sunni-based al-Qaeda terrorists unleashed what Hayden described as "historic forces" that have created "the satanic level of violence" of today.

"Sectarian violence now presents the greatest immediate threat to Iraq's stability and future," he said.

Underlying the sectarian fighting are not only deep-rooted religious differences, but also the more recent political history of Shiite suffering under the iron rule of Saddam Hussein and his Sunni- and Baathist Party-dominated government.

The Shiites, who make up more than half of Iraq's population, now want to make certain they control the new Iraqi government and to assure themselves that the Hussein group never regains power. "This fear of a return to Baathism is almost palpable among Shia elites," Hayden said.

As a result, the Shiites have maintained control of the Interior Ministry and the police. "Militias often operate under protection or approval of Iraqi police [when they] attack suspected Sunni insurgents and Sunni civilians," Hayden said. In addition, "radical Shia militias and splinter groups stoke the violence."

At the same time, Hayden said, there are fissures within the Shiite groups, and their "power struggles . . . make it difficult for Shia leaders to take actions that might ease Sunni fears." Adding to the problem is Iran, which is supporting even competing Shiite factions. "Iranian involvement with the Shia militias of all stripes . . . has been quite a new development," Hayden said.

Iraq's Government Issues Warrant For Sunni Cleric (LAT)

By Louise Roug And Borzou Daragahi

The Los Angeles Times, November 17, 2006

Baghdad, Iraq — Iraq's Shiite-led government issued an arrest warrant Thursday for the country's leading Sunni Arab cleric, accusing him of colluding with insurgents, a potentially explosive charge that could exacerbate tensions between the country's warring sectarian groups and further divide a fragile national government.

The move against Harith Dhari, the head of the Muslim Scholars Association, comes two days after an audacious daytime kidnapping in Baghdad ruptured the government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, setting Sunni politicians against Shiites.

DOJ_NMG_0095529

In an appearance on state-run TV late Thursday evening, Interior Minister Jawad Bolani, a Shiite, announced that Dhari was wanted for inciting violence. "The government's policy is that anyone who tries to spread division and strife among the Iraq people will be chased by our security agencies," Bolani said.

Dhari has been a vocal, sometimes sarcastic, critic of the government, questioning the legitimacy of Saddam Hussein's criminal trials, and ridiculing the government's reconciliation efforts.

"The political process that the security of Iraq is depending on is a failing process so that is why the security is failing and deteriorating," he said on al Arabiya television on Nov. 11.

The warrant against Dhari virtually is certain to rekindle threats of a boycott of the government by Sunni Arab politicians. Sunnis have warned that such a walkout would have dire consequences, further entrenching an already brutal cycle of civil war and pushing more ordinary Sunnis toward the insurgency. It would also be a lethal blow to a coalition government that U.S. policymakers had hoped would pacify Iraq's often hostile sects and ethnic groups.

U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad spent months persuading mainstream parties representing the once-dominant Sunni Arab minority to join the Shiite-led government. But in recent months Shiite militiamen using the cover of the official security apparatus have waged a nightly subterranean war against Sunnis, whose bodies show up in drainage ditches with gunshot wounds, burn marks and other signs of torture every morning.

On Thursday, some Sunnis sounded like they already had passed their breaking point with the government.

"(The move) represents the bankruptcy of the sectarian government following one scandal after the other," association spokesman Mohammed Bashar Faidi told Al-Jazeera television. "The decisions of this government are worthless because it only rules the Green Zone."

Faidi charged Bolani with "supporting terrorism by covering for militias that are killing the Iraqi people," and told another regional channel that Dhari was in Jordan when the arrest warrant was issued.

Although a ranking cleric, Dhari does not have the stature of Shiite Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani. But among Sunnis, he has emerged as a vocal representative of Sunni defiance and anger, and has become a leader of the fractious community.

Earlier in the week, Iraq's Kurdish President Jalal Talabani described Dhari as a hard-liner with "nothing to do but incite sectarian and ethnic sedition."

Violence and crime on the streets of Baghdad Thursday did not help matters. At least 17 people were killed by bombs and gunmen in the capital. In addition, gunmen dressed as police commandos kidnapped 15 people from a tea shop in a mixed neighborhood in central Baghdad, according to authorities.

Earlier in the week, a similar mass kidnapping of academics from a Sunni-led education ministry office intensified a mounting political crisis. Witnesses said that gunmen dressed in government-issued uniforms carted away as many as 150 people. Sunni politicians charge that as many as 80 are still missing -- a claim denied by al-Maliki and the Interior Ministry, which said everyone had been released unharmed.

Al-Maliki has promised to disarm and disband the Shiite militias wreaking havoc on the street. But Sunnis say the government has not done enough, particularly in failing to pursue leads provided by those who had been released in this week's kidnapping.

"The government hasn't moved a finger to investigate," said Salim Abdullah Jabouri, a spokesman for Iraq's main Sunni Arab party, which is part of the ruling government coalition. "The government is either weak or in collusion with the kidnappers or has lost control of the militias."

Sunnis say the lack of concessions they've obtained for their followers has built up sentiment for a government pullout.

Sunnis have been frustrated in their attempts to reduce the influence of Shiite militias, win guarantees that Iraq won't be partitioned and reverse laws that discriminate against former members of Saddam's Baath Party, which was dominated by Sunnis.

They've also demanded a release of the many Sunnis held in prisons on vague charges of colluding with the insurgency. They angrily accuse the Shiite-dominated government of using the legal and security apparatus for sectarian ends.

The Sunni bloc "has never done anything good for us," said Sheik Mehdi Sumaydai, a prominent Sunni cleric who does not favor pulling out of the government but says he is under increasing pressure from his followers to adopt more radical anti-government views.

"We are receiving a big pressure from our followers, who are calling and contacting us every day to withdraw from the process," said Nourdin Hiyali, a Sunni lawmaker. "But the leaders have a different way of thinking, as this will drive the country into very bad civil war."

If Sunni political parties abandoned the government, it could unravel months of effort by U.S. diplomats and push ordinary Sunnis closer to the camp of the insurgent groups, lawmakers warn.

"When the people we represent see us leaving the political process, they will join the resistance," said Sheik Hareth Obeidi, a Sunni member of parliament. "And this will be a disaster for Iraq."

Iyad Samarai, the No. 2 person in the main Sunni political party, said no decisions had been made about bolting. "Some of the people say, 'Well, we don't have to anything to lose and we don't want to stay with the government,'" he said. "Others say, 'We should try to improve the situation.' Both views exist."

Al-Maliki will convene the Cabinet next week to resolve the deepening political divisions and the threatened Sunni walkout, a member of his coalition said Thursday.

Redha Jawad Taqi, head of the main Shiite party's political section, agreed this week's abductions had worsened the political crisis, but said al-Maliki had summoned political leaders to try and solve it.

"We need more discussions between Shias and Sunnis, Sunnis and Kurds," Taqi said. "Because if the ship sinks, we all sink."

Interior Ministry Issues Warrant For Sunni Leader (WT/AP)

By Bassem Mroue

The Washington Times, November 17, 2006

BAGHDAD -- The Shi'ite-led Interior Ministry issued an arrest warrant yesterday for the top leader of the country's Sunni minority -- a move certain to inflame already raging sectarian violence in Iraq.

Interior Minister Jawad al-Bolani, a Shi'ite, said Harith al-Dhari was wanted for inciting terrorism and violence among the Iraqi people. His message was carried on Al Iraqiya state television.

Mr. al-Dhari, head of the influential Sunni Association of Muslim Scholars, is an extreme hard-liner who recently mocked a government offer of reconciliation in return for abandoning the insurgency. But the move against him threatens to drive many moderate Sunnis out of the political system.

Shiite-Led Iraqi Ministry Seeks Arrest Of Top Sunni Cleric (WP)

By Sudarsan Raghavan

The Washington Post, November 17, 2006

BAGHDAD, Nov. 16 -- The Iraqi government on Thursday ordered the arrest of the country's most influential Sunni cleric for allegedly inciting violence and supporting terrorism, a move by the Shiite-led administration that could inflame the sectarian tensions already disfiguring the capital and other parts of Iraq.

Interior Minister Jawad al-Bolani declared on state television late Thursday that an arrest warrant had been issued for Harith al-Dhari, leader of the Association of Muslim Scholars, one of the most outspoken defenders of Iraq's minority Sunni Arabs after the U.S.-led invasion.

"We have proof that he is involved in terrorism," said Brig. Abdul Karim Khalaf, an Interior Ministry spokesman, without elaborating. "Wherever he is -- inside the country or outside the country -- the Iraqi courts will bring him to justice."

In recent weeks, Dhari had angered Shiite leaders by declaring on al-Arabiya television that the trial of ousted president Saddam Hussein was illegitimate, mocking efforts at national reconciliation and expressing support for al-Qaeda. He also said Shiite militias belonging to political parties had infiltrated "the majority of the security apparatuses at the Interior Ministry."

Dhari, a vocal critic of the Shiite-led government and its American backers, travels frequently outside Iraq and could not be reached for comment Thursday. He was believed to be in neighboring Jordan.

"The warrant that was issued is evidence that this government has lost its balance and that it is announcing its bankruptcy," Mohamad Bashar al-Faidy, a spokesman for the Association of Muslim Scholars, which represents Iraq's Sunni clergy, told al-Jazeera television Thursday night. He added that Dhari was not surprised by the warrant because he has been targeted before by the government.

The move came as cracks emerged within Iraq's six-month-old unity government over the numbers of government employees taken in a mass kidnapping on Tuesday and whether some were tortured and killed. It also occurred on a day when the U.S. military announced that four soldiers were killed, bringing the total number of American deaths in the country to at least 45 this month.

Much of the day's other violence was directed at Shiite Muslims. Gunmen erected fake checkpoints in a Sunni neighborhood and seized Shiite passengers off minibuses, and nine Iraqis were gunned down in a bakery, a business typically run by Shiites.

In southern Iraq, a convoy of civilians traveling near Nasiriyah was hijacked Thursday, the Associated Press reported. Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman said preliminary reports suggested there could be as many as 14 people captured, and ABC News reported that four of those captured were believed to be Americans.

While Sunni Arabs revere Dhari, Shiite political leaders describe him as a hard-liner who is deepening sectarian divisions with his caustic rhetoric and vocal support for the Sunni insurgency.

Alaa Maki, a prominent Sunni political leader, said late Thursday that the arrest warrant suggested that the government was "ignorant politically" or had an agenda. "It's a politically weak decision coming from a weak government," said Maki, a senior official in the Iraqi Islamic Party, a leading Sunni Arab group. "It comes at a time when we need to calm down the situation, when we need to minimize tensions."

"Sheik Dhari is not calling for sectarianism and violence, and he's not calling for terrorism. The government has made a wrong judgment in this case," Adnan al-Dulaimi, a leader of the Iraqi Accordance Front, another Sunni coalition, told al-Jazeera on Thursday night. "We consider Dhari one of the best symbols of the Sunni leaders."

In explaining the arrest warrant, Bolani, the interior minister, said that "the government's policy is that anyone who tries to spread division and strife among the Iraqi people will be chased by our security agencies. . . . We have to prove for everyone that the government is national and it is going forward with major steps to achieve security and to achieve its political program."

In November 2004, U.S. troops raided the homes of Dhari and another senior official of the scholars association, triggering clashes in Baghdad near the association's headquarters and a mosque widely known for its militancy. Less than a year later, in June 2005, U.S. and Iraqi troops again raided Dhari's home.

A prominent Sunni member of Iraq's parliament, Saleh al-Mutlak, said he planned to ask parliament to shut down until the government revokes the warrant.

Several Sunni leaders called the order to arrest Dhari an attempt to deflect attention from the government, which is under enormous pressure to find the kidnappers of scores of Iraqis from a Higher Education Ministry building on Tuesday, one of the biggest mass abductions since the U.S.-led invasion. In the bold daylight raid, about 80 gunmen, dressed in police commando uniforms and driving police vehicles, abducted as many as 150 men.

On Thursday, Abed Thiyab, the minister of higher education, who is Sunni, said that some of the captives had been tortured and killed and that as many as 80 remained in the hands of their captors.

But Iraq's national security adviser issued a statement saying that only 50 Iraqis had been kidnapped and that all had been released. The Interior Ministry also declared all the captives were free, and the office of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki dismissed suggestions that any were tortured.

Military May Ask $127B For Wars (USAT)

By Richard Wolf

USA Today, November 17, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Bush administration is preparing its largest spending request yet for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, a proposal that could make the conflict the most expensive since World War II.

The Pentagon is considering $127 billion to $160 billion in requests from the armed services for the 2007 fiscal year, which began last month, several lawmakers and congressional staff members said. That's on top of $70 billion already approved for 2007.

Since 2001, Congress has approved $502 billion for the war on terror, roughly two-thirds for Iraq. The latest request, due to reach the incoming Democratic-controlled Congress next spring, would make the war on terror more expensive than the Vietnam War.

Sen. Kent Conrad, D-N.D., who will chair the Senate Budget Committee next year, said the amount under consideration is "$127 billion and rising." He said the cost "is going to increasingly become an issue" because it could prevent Congress from addressing domestic priorities, such as expanding Medicare prescription drug coverage.

Rep. Jim Cooper, D-Tenn., who put the expected request at $160 billion, said such a sizable increase still "won't solve the problem" in Iraq.

Bill Hoagland, a senior budget adviser to Senate Republicans, said: "At a minimum, they were looking at $130 (billion). If it goes higher than that, I'm not surprised."

The new request being considered for the war on terror would be about one-fourth what the government spends annually on Social Security — and 10 times what it spends on its space program.

The White House called the figures premature. “They don't reflect a decision by the administration,” said budget office spokeswoman Christin Baker. “It is much too early in the process to make that determination.”

Before the Iraq war began in 2003, the Bush administration estimated its cost at $50 billion to $60 billion, though White House economic adviser Lawrence Lindsey had suggested in 2002 that it could cost as much as $200 billion.

Growing opposition to the war contributed to Democrats' takeover of the House and Senate in this month's elections. Pennsylvania Rep. John Murtha, an early critic of the war who lost his bid Thursday to be the House Democratic leader, vowed to use his clout as chairman of the House panel that reviews the Pentagon budget “to get these troops out of Iraq and get back on track and quit spending $8 billion a month.”

“The war's been an extraordinarily expensive undertaking, both in lives and in dollars,” said Senate Budget Committee Chairman Judd Gregg, R-N.H.

The new request is top-heavy with Army and Air Force costs to replace and repair equipment and redeploy troops, Hoagland said. That's why the 2007 cost is likely to top the war's average annual price tag.

Overall, he said, “we're easily headed toward $600 billion.” That would top the $536 billion cost of Vietnam in today's dollars. World War II cost an inflation-adjusted $3.6 trillion.

Leon Panetta, President Clinton's former chief of staff and a member of a bipartisan panel studying recommendations on Iraq for President Bush, said the Pentagon needs $50 billion to $60 billion to “restore the units that are being brought back here, to re-equip them and get them back to a combat-readiness status.”

Now, How To Put Iraqis In Charge (CSM)

By Peter Grier

The Christian Science Monitor, November 17, 2006

WASHINGTON

On Capitol Hill, there is near agreement on at least one aspect of Iraq policy: the Iraqis themselves need to shoulder more of the burden of stabilizing their country. But this consensus breaks down over the obvious follow-up question. How?

Many Democrats, newly emboldened by their election victories, favor an approach that might be labeled "tough love." It goes something like this: If the US plans a phased pullout of troops within four to six months, the Iraqi government will face up to what has to be done.

"This is not precipitous; it is a responsible way to change the dynamic in Iraq," said Sen. Carl Levin (D) of Michigan, soon to be chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, at a Wednesday hearing.

But the White House - and the top generals of the US military - favor a strategy that they consider more nurturing. The US needs to intensify efforts to train the Iraqi armed forces to fight for themselves, according to Gen. John Abizaid, US commander in the Middle East. A scheduled US pullout might simply cause Iraq's sectarian factions to prepare for chaos to come.

The gap between these approaches suggests that despite the recent shift in US politics, in Washington there are heated debates over Iraq yet to come.

"I believe in my heart of hearts that the Iraqis must win this battle with our help," General Abizaid told the Senate Armed Services Committee. The Iraq debate, post-midterms

Democrats don't ascend to control of the House and Senate until next year. But the promise of future power can lead to assertiveness in the present, and this week, with Congress back in session, Democrats were not shy about pressing their case for a change in strategy in Iraq.

Both the Senate and House armed services panels held full-dress hearings on Iraq Wednesday, the first such inquiries in months. At both, the established fault lines between party members, and among them, were on full display.

Senator Levin for instance, a Democratic party elder on military policy, kept pressing the idea of a phased pull-out, despite General Abizaid's objections. On the opposite end of the spectrum, Sen. John McCain (R) of Arizona, a likely front-runner for the 2008 GOP presidential nomination, waved about his proposal: an increase in troops of at least 20,000 to help bring stability to Baghdad.

Not that General Abizaid liked Senator McCain's ideas any better than those of Senator Levin.

Such an increase in US strength would have a very negative effect on public opinion in Iraq, noted Abizaid. And he questioned whether the US military was large enough overall to commit to a larger force in Iraq.

"When you look at the overall American force pool that's available out there, the ability to sustain that commitment is simply not something that we have right now with the size of the Army and the Marine Corps," said Abizaid.

And in a remarkably sharp comment about the political atmosphere in Washington, the top US military commander in the Middle East commented that some aspects of the search for alternative strategies seemed to him unseemly.

When I come to Washington, I feel despair [here]," Abizaid told the Senate panel. "When I'm in Iraq with my commanders, when I talk to our soldiers, when I talk to the Iraqi leadership, they are not despairing," General Abizaid insisted.

That said, comments this week from other US officials suggests that the intelligence community, at least, takes a dark view of the current Iraqi situation.

Iraqi insurgent attacks against US and coalition forces have increased from about 70 per month in January to 180 in October, according to the director of the Defense Intelligence Agency, Lt. Gen. Michael Maples. The rate of attacks on Iraqi civilians has increased fourfold over that same period of time.

"The perception of unchecked violence is creating an atmosphere of fear and hardening sectarianism, which is empowering militias and vigilante groups and reducing confidence in government and security forces," General Maples told the Senate Armed Services Committee.

Gen. Michael Hayden, director of the Central Intelligence Agency, was no more sunny.

"We're now face to face with whole societies that are in profound, and, frankly, volatile transitions, and whose fate will directly affect ... the security of the United States," said General Hayden. Political consequences for Democrats

Given this situation, the newly empowered Democrats face a difficult political and substantive situation, says Loren Thompson, a defense expert and chief operating officer at the Lexington Institute think tank in Washington.

If they force a redeployment of US troops, they may get blamed for any resulting violence in Iraq. Yet if they don't force a redeployment of US troops, when 2008 rolls around they and their candidates will have partial ownership of whatever the US situation in Iraq is at that time.

Sen. Levin and his cohorts are right in at least pressing the US military leadership for some sort of figures in regard to how long continued training of Iraq forces might take.

Otherwise the training mission "becomes an open-ended justification for sticking around," says Thompson.

Debate Grows Over Beefing Up U.S. Force In Iraq (WP)

By Josh White

The Washington Post, November 17, 2006

The debate about how to proceed in Iraq, which in the past few months has focused on withdrawing U.S. troops, now includes serious discussion about adding more forces to the fight.

Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) repeatedly suggested this week that the United States needs thousands more troops in Iraq, and members of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group have discussed similar ideas as they prepare a much-anticipated policy recommendation. Members of Congress raised the concept on Wednesday in hearings with the region's top U.S. military commander.

In a speech last night to Republicans, McCain, who is considering a presidential bid in 2008, reiterated his desire for more troops to solve a "dire" situation.

"Without additional combat forces, we will not win this war," McCain said, describing inadequate U.S. troop numbers to clear insurgent strongholds, stem sectarian violence and train Iraqi security forces. "We need to do all these things if we are to succeed. And we will need more troops to do them."

Military officials and defense experts, however, said yesterday that significantly escalating the number of U.S. combat troops in Iraq is largely implausible because it would severely strain the military, would be unsustainable for more than a few months and would offer no discernable long-term benefit.

On Wednesday, Gen. John P. Abizaid, who leads the U.S. Central Command, testified on Capitol Hill that he believes sending in a large contingent of infantry troops would be a mistake, in part because it could dissuade Iraqi troops from taking the lead in security operations. Abizaid said he plans over coming months to introduce a more robust training effort -- involving additional U.S. trainers and advisers to help boost the numbers and capabilities of Iraqi forces -- so Iraq can defend its homeland and thus transition toward a U.S. exit.

"It's easy for the Iraqis to rely upon us to do this work," Abizaid said. "I believe that more American forces prevent the Iraqis from doing more, from taking more responsibility for their own future."

About 140,000 U.S. troops are in Iraq, many stationed in the areas around Baghdad where violence has been most severe. Military officials said yesterday that a boost of 20,000 infantry troops -- five or six brigades -- would do little to change the nature of the insurgency or the sectarian strife and that commanders are not considering such a move.

"If you put 20,000 soldiers in Baghdad, they can provide a modicum of security where they have a physical presence," said a military officer familiar with discussions on the matter. "We could flex and bend, and we could do a spike. But we can't do a steady state with that many more troops. Additional troops could do a particular job for a finite period of time, but that doesn't solve the long-term problem of holding those areas."

Military officials and experts said yesterday that they think such a plan could work only temporarily because the Army and Marine Corps are stretched thin by ongoing conflicts. They said a large number of troops sent into Iraq would be hard to sustain over time without dipping significantly into the National Guard and reserves.

The argument for increasing troop numbers is that it might stop the cycle of violence and thus halt Iraq's drift toward civil war. The problem is that military analysts say there are not enough forces available to do that.

Under the troop-to-population ratios used in historical counterinsurgency campaigns, some of which had aspects of civil wars, the United States and its allies in Iraq would need at least 500,000 and perhaps more than 1 million troops, military experts say. No one thinks those numbers will be available anytime soon, even if the training of Iraqis is greatly expanded and accelerated.

Michael Vickers, director of strategic studies at the Center for Strategic and Budgetary Assessments, said a surge could have enormous costs down the road, when U.S. officials would need to rotate fresh troops into Iraq. He also doubts the value of having more troops even temporarily.

"In the past year, we've had between 125,000 and 140,000 troops there, and the daily attacks have almost tripled," Vickers said.

Americans have soured on the war in part because U.S. casualties have continued to mount, particularly in October and the first half of this month. Simply having more troops on the ground, or repositioning troops already in Iraq to the Baghdad area, has proven deadly.

"One of the ironies, of course, is that the more soldiers you have there, the more soldiers you have in harm's way," said Edwin Dorn, a professor at the University of Texas and a former undersecretary of defense for personnel and readiness. He said a major surge would require shipping to Iraq soldiers who just recently returned. "Sending people back into the fight who were just there would seriously harm morale."

Some experts said a short-term surge could create a window for Iraqi forces to develop and take over, but they said it would have to be temporary. Retired Lt. Col. Conrad Crane, the lead author of the Army's soon-to-be-finished counterinsurgency manual, said it is unlikely a short-term surge in combat forces would be decisive.

Instead, Crane supports Abizaid's idea of increasing training efforts.

"If his goal is to increase capacity and capabilities, that's the right way to go," Crane said. "The long-term solution is to get the host nation to be able to secure their own freedom and their own liberty and future."

Time To Fix What Four Years Of War Has Broken (MCT)

DOJ_NMG_0095536

By Joseph L. Galloway

McClatchy Newspapers, November 17, 2006

Former secretary of state James Baker and his independent commission are searching for a new strategy for Iraq, and legislators of both parties will soon begin looking for a compromise answer to the same knotty problem. But it's past time to start repairing the damage the Bush administration's way of war has done to our Army and our Marine Corps.

Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld hasn't cleaned out his desk yet, and the colonels and generals are still mentally dancing in a joyous conga line through the corridors of the Pentagon's E-Ring, but there's work to be done, and none of it is more important than fixing what four years of war in Iraq and Afghanistan has broken.

The Senate has yet to confirm Robert Gates to replace Rumsfeld, but whatever his faults - and there are more than a few - he's likely to earn swift bipartisan approval, if only because Rumsfeld won't leave until he's on deck.

The fate and the future of the U.S. Army and Marine Corps desperately need to be addressed. Doing so will take many years and many billions of dollars.

Our nation, which is defended by about seven-tenths of 1 percent of its 300 million people, today devotes just about 5 percent of its gross domestic product to defense spending. When Jack Kennedy was president, military spending totaled almost 10 percent of GDP.

The Army, and its National Guard and Reserve, have been worn down - some would say worn out - by the endless deployments of troops on one-year combat tours to Iraq and Afghanistan. Many professional soldiers and their families are now enduring their second or third trips to Iraq, certain that a fourth or fifth awaits them if they continue to serve.

Their equipment, from Abrams tanks to Bradley fighting vehicles to Stryker armored cars to Humvees and helicopters, is wearing out even faster than the soldiers are. The money to repair and rebuild those vehicles - Army Chief Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker says he needs $17 billion for that right now - hasn't been forthcoming from this administration and the outgoing Congress.

Army officials say they're a total of some $25 billion short of what they need to sustain the current levels of operations. Because that's not available, they've been robbing Peter to pay Paul, then robbing Paul to pay Patrick. Money budgeted to repair family housing and mow the grass and open the recreation centers on our Army bases is going, instead, to pay for the wars.

It's also getting harder to fill the ranks of an Army that's dropped in total manpower from 1.2 million a decade or so ago to just 497,000 at present, even as the demands for its services have grown exponentially.

In a week when the San Francisco school board voted to bar junior reserve officer training from the high schools and to ban military recruiters from their campuses, the Army is scraping the bottom of the barrel trying find enough recruits to keep the all-volunteer Army afloat.

Only by lowering standards of mental acuity and ability, accepting recruits up to age 45, paying large cash bonuses to anyone who signs on the dotted line, taking in more high school dropouts and granting waivers to recruits with criminal records, bodies covered in tattoos or both can the Army fill the holes left by those who leave every year.

In this dangerous world, Americans must be willing to pay for an Army, and they must be willing to send their sons and daughters to serve in that Army. Nations that are unwilling to defend themselves and are governed by an elite that's unwilling to send its own children to be part of that defense, are doomed.

The Bush administration says we're embarked on what it defines as a long war - 40 or 50 or 60 years of struggle with the forces of Islamic fundamentalism - and if that's true, then it's long past time to begin making some sacrifices at home to prepare to fight and win that war.

Mr. Gates can begin his brief tour as secretary of defense by jacking up the most recent Quadrennial Defense Review, the Pentagon's 20-year look at the future and what will be funded in our defense budgets, and re-ordering its priorities. He must make the hard decisions that Mr. Rumsfeld promised to make but never did.

We cannot have business as usual in the Pentagon. We cannot continue to fund huge aircraft and ship purchases for the Air Force and Navy while starving the Army and Marines who are bearing the brunt of the fighting and dying in this brave new world of ours. Boots on the ground are not as glamorous - or as lucrative to defense contractors - as the high technology so beloved by Mr. Rumsfeld. But in places such as Iraq and Afghanistan, there is still no substitute for them.

My old friend Col. (ret.) T. R. Fehrenbach wrote in his landmark history of the Korean War that a nation that wants to hold the barbarians at bay must be willing to put its sons on the ground, in the mud and the blood. It also must be willing to pay the price for an Army and a Marine Corps that's fully manned, well trained, and equipped and supported with everything it needs.

Without that, this brave new century and millennium that were celebrated as America's will swiftly become someone's else's, and we will become no more than a footnote in history - a nation whose days of glory and power numbered only half a century or so.

Coalition Forces Are Dwindling As U.S. Mulls Next Move In Iraq (WT)

By David R. Sands

The Washington Times, November 17, 2006

Iraq's coalition of the willing is becoming an increasingly exclusive club.

As U.S. generals and lawmakers debated this week whether to cut, raise or hold steady the 141,000-strong U.S. troop contingent in Iraq, the coalition of foreign countries willing to deploy their forces in Iraq has shrunk steadily -- and soon could shrink even more.

Twenty-three countries remain in the U.S.-led coalition and the United Nations' mission serving in and around Iraq, down from a high of 42 that joined the United States in the invasion or the postwar occupation of Iraq. More than half of those contributors have fewer than 150 troops, engineers or military trainers in the Iraq theater.

Like President Bush, many leaders of the contributing countries are resisting intense domestic political pressures to bring the troops home, especially as the casualty levels rise and the problems of the embattled Iraqi government mount.

"We need to remember what is at stake here, not only for Iraq and the Middle East, but also for American power and prestige around the world," Australian Prime Minister John Howard said this week. Mr. Howard, a staunch U.S. ally, is scheduled to meet with Mr. Bush on the sidelines of an Asia-Pacific summit today in Vietnam.

Opposition leader Kim Beazley, citing opinion polls showing 60 percent disapproval of Australia's Iraq deployment, urged Mr. Howard to tell Mr. Bush that Australia's approximately 1,400 troops in Iraq would be leaving and that the United States should withdraw as well.

"When John Howard meets George Bush, he needs to be a statesman, not a sidekick," Mr. Beazley told reporters in Canberra.

Mr. Howard rejected that idea, but acknowledged in a speech this week that the Iraq mission was "the most poll-defiant thing I have done in the whole of my prime ministership."

Portugal, Hungary, the Netherlands and Ukraine were among the countries that pulled out of Iraq in 2005. This year, Japan announced it was withdrawing its noncombat troops from Iraq. Italy, one of the largest contributors to the multinational force, plans to have all its 1,785 soldiers home by the end of the year.

Poland, which was given overall command of Iraq's south-central region, has cut its forces from 2,400 to about 900.

Smaller parties in Poland's governing coalition are pressing for a quick withdrawal of the remaining troops. The government of President Lech Kaczynski has sent conflicting signals on how long the deployment will last.

Mr. Kaczynski and senior Polish generals have been quoted as saying that the country will remain in Iraq at least through mid-2007, but a government spokesman said this week that an earlier withdrawal -- perhaps by the end of this year -- hadn't been ruled out.

Like Mr. Howard and British Prime Minister Tony Blair, Mr. Kaczynski is confronting popular opinion polls that show more than three-fifths of his constituents support an immediate withdrawal.

Many foreign governments say they are closely following the U.S. troop debate and the recommendations to be put forward by the Iraq Study Group, a bipartisan commission led by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III. The panel's much-anticipated report, expected around the end of the year, could herald a course change in U.S. policy in the region and a shift in troop levels for the United States and its top allies.

Some countries in the Iraq coalition say they are holding firm, despite the political pressures.

Romanian President Traian Basescu told the Associated Press last week that his country's 600 noncombat troops will stay, despite pleas from the families with relatives serving there.

"Romania's honor is greater than its feelings," he said.

James Baker May Face His Toughest Challenge In Iraq (MCT)

By Warren P. Strobel

McClatchy Newspapers, November 17, 2006

WASHINGTON - When James Baker became President George H.W. Bush's secretary of state in 1989, one of the first things he did was cut a bipartisan deal to end years of poisonous wrangling over U.S. policy in Central America - an issue as divisive then as Iraq is today.

Seventeen years later, Baker faces a similar - but tougher - challenge as he and retired congressman Lee Hamilton co-chair a committee that's increasingly seen as the last, best hope for finding a respectable exit from Iraq.

Baker, now 76, is proceeding much as he did when he negotiated over Nicaragua and El Salvador in the `80s, according to individuals close to him and the panel, known as the Iraq Study Group.

Baker saw the disputes over Central America policy as "first and foremost a domestic political issue," he wrote in his 1995 memoir, "The Politics of Diplomacy." If the politics couldn't be defused, "any hopes for a diplomatic solution, much less achieving a bipartisan foreign policy, were doomed."

Today, the Iraq Study Group's five Republicans and five Democrats are widely portrayed as seeking new solutions to halt Iraq's slide into civil war and extricate the 141,000 U.S. troops there.

But there may not be any good solutions, and Baker's real goal is to forge a bipartisan consensus at all costs, the people close to him and the group say.

"It is not about new ideas. It is about ... ideas that can be supported across the political spectrum," said one person intimately involved with the group's work.

He and others spoke on condition of anonymity because Baker and Hamilton have demanded an end to media leaks about the group's deliberations. (Working in secrecy for as long as possible is another longtime Baker trait.)

Yet the hopes of finding a unified approach to the Iraq war appear to have faded since the midterm elections on Nov. 7.

Leading Democratic lawmakers, including incoming Senate Armed Services Committee chairman Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., have said they'll push for a withdrawal of U.S. troops beginning in the next four to six months.

President Bush and his top generals oppose timetables.

The White House initiated its own review of Iraq policy. It's unclear whether it's meant to support the Baker-Hamilton effort or pre-empt it.

"There's plenty of partisan tensions, despite all of the talk about bipartisanship," said Jeremy Rosner, a Democratic pollster and authority on public opinion and U.S. foreign policy. Still, he said, Republicans, stung by the election and looking to 2008, also are eager to see a rapid solution in Iraq.

Bernard Aronson, a former assistant secretary of state who helped Baker negotiate the Central America accord, said that in many ways, "the politics of the challenges are quite similar."

The accord with Congress essentially ended U.S. policy of trying to overthrow Nicaragua's Sandinista government by force, replacing it with a focus on democratic elections, which were won by a pro-American candidate.

But, Aronson said, Iraq "is a much tougher situation because the options are much narrower."

In 1989, he noted, the United States benefited from a changing Soviet Union that was willing to cut off arms supplies to the Sandinistas. Today, the other major player in Iraq is Iran, which by all accounts is becoming more intractable, not less.

Exactly what course in Iraq the Baker-Hamilton commission will recommend has become the No. 1 guessing game in Washington, as well as in Middle East capitals.

It appears unlikely that the panel will recommend a summary withdrawal of U.S. troops, given the White House's flat opposition and predictions from the Pentagon and U.S. intelligence agencies that a rapid exit would fracture Iraq and possibly draw its neighbors into the war.

Nor does a "stay the course" prescription seem to be in the cards.

That leaves some version of the "old college try," a last-ditch effort to stabilize the government of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al Maliki and build up Iraqi security forces.

Opponents argue it won't work, even with more American troops, because Maliki has been unwilling to rein in militias of Shiite factions, which form the base of his support. Iraqi security services, particularly the police, are widely reported to be involved in sectarian violence themselves.

One proposal put to the commissioners warns that it would take 50,000 more U.S. troops, plus 10,000 to 15,000 more U.S. advisers to the Iraqi army, to have any chance of success.

That many troops may not be available from a strained U.S. Army and Marine Corps.

"We can put in 20,000 more Americans tomorrow and achieve a temporary effect. But when you look at the overall American force pool that's available out there, the ability to sustain that commitment is simply not something that we have right now," Gen. John Abizaid, the chief of U.S. Central Command, told the Armed Services Committee on Wednesday.

Baker has suggested that he favors U.S. engagement with Iran and Syria as part of a more energetic regional approach to dealing with Iraq.

One person close to him said the former secretary of state is determined to have the commission, whose work is being coordinated by the U.S. Institute of Peace, issue a single consensus report, without the dissents that sometimes accompany such documents.

Baker, a Republican and one-time political campaign manager who was chief of staff and treasury secretary under President Ronald Reagan, has long been identified with the pragmatic "realist" foreign policy of the first President Bush. That's anathema to conservatives who favor an idealistic foreign policy based on aggressively spreading democracy.

One of those conservatives, former Pentagon official Michael Rubin, writing in the Wall Street Journal, decried the proposals to engage Iran and Syria and what he called "the resurrection of realists" such as Baker and Defense Secretary-designate Robert Gates.

Aronson said the image of Baker as an amoral "pol" is unfair. "Foreign policy is politics on an international stage," he said. "You can't be effective in foreign policy unless you understand politics, broadly speaking."

Analysis: Few Military Options In Iraq (AP-Y)

By Anne Plummer Flaherty, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 17, 2006

Withdraw U.S. troops from Iraq? Won't work. Beef them up? We're stretched too thin.

As President Bush, Congress and a special commission seek new approaches for the unpopular war, warnings from the top American commander in the Middle East make clear there is no simple answer.

At the end of the day, military deployments will be up to President Bush, who has staunchly defended his handling of the war.

He said after last week's Democratic triumph in congressional elections that he is open to fresh approaches. With pressure on him to find a different path, the only thing most experts agree on is that each idea presents considerable risk.

"There's a big question right now on whether Iraq can be saved," Kenneth Pollack, who served on the National Security Council staff during the Clinton administration, said Thursday.

Gen. John Abizaid, who oversees military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan, told lawmakers this week that the best way out of the war would be to intensify efforts to train Iraqi security forces.

Abizaid said he planned to bolster U.S. advisers assigned to Iraqi units to train them on how to fight more effectively until they can take the lead in combat.

"Ultimately," Abizaid said, "capable, independent Iraqi forces, loyal to an equally capable, independent Iraqi government, will set the conditions for the withdrawal of our major combat forces

The problem, Abizaid conceded, is the Baghdad government, which he said is only beginning to understand that it must support the Iraqi Army and not the Shiite militias engaged in near civil war against Sunni fighters.

Abizaid told the House Armed Services Committee about putting his faith in the Iraqi government and its forces, "Well, maybe it's a dumb bet. But I don't think so."

If that seemed a halfhearted endorsement of his own strategy, his description of other alternatives was even more glum.

Abizaid swatted down a suggestion being pushed by many congressional Democrats, including Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., to begin decreasing U.S. troop levels because it could cause instability. Democrats are expected to support that plan when they take over control of Congress next year.

Abizaid also said a proposal by Sens. John McCain, R-Ariz., and Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., to bolster the 141,000 U.S. troops already there could not be sustained because the American military is stretched too thin already. He said troop increases would also erode the effort to force Iraqis to take on more responsibility.

"I believe that the troop levels need to stay where they are," he told the Senate Armed Services Committee. "We need to put more American capacity into Iraqi units to make them more capable in their ability to confront the sectarian problem."

On top of everything, the general predicted that if the insurgents and sectarian militias are not brought under control in four to six months, the violence would surge out of control. Coincidentally or not, that is the same time frame Levin — who is slated to become chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee — has proposed for beginning a U.S. withdrawal.

Bush's top military and political advisers are scrubbing military and political options in Iraq. A bipartisan commission led by Bush family friend and Republican James A. Baker III and former Democratic Rep. Lee Hamilton are conducting an independent assessment expected to produce recommendations next month. Senators leading the Armed Services Committee — Levin and John Warner, R-Va. — say they too plan to recommend a new way ahead.

Baker's panel has attracted the most attention, but is widely expected to defer to military commanders the big question on Iraq: How many troops should stay and for how long?

Abizaid's testimony will go a long way in influencing the Iraq debate. Known as a straight shooter and one of the military's premier experts on the Middle East, his advice is well regarded in Congress and at the White House.

His answer disappointed many lawmakers who said his plan sounded too much like the status quo.

"We're in one heck of a mess in Iraq, and the American people told us loud and clear last week that they are not happy with the course of this war. Neither am I," said McCain, a presidential contender in 2008.

The war is a top issue for Democrats as well. An AP-Ipsos poll released Tuesday found that people consider Iraq the top priority for Congress over the next two years, although 57 percent say the Democrats in Congress have no plan for Iraq.

"There's no evidence that three or six or nine or 12 months of this will get us over the hump," said Richard Haass, a former adviser to Colin Powell at the State Department. Haass is now president of the Council on Foreign Relations in New York.

Pollack, now an analyst at the Brookings Institution in Washington, said he thinks more consideration should be given to boosting troop levels dramatically — even if it means hurting the readiness of units to fight the next fight.

"McCain is absolutely right we need more troops. But where would they come from?" asked retired Army Lt. Gen. Jay Garner, a critic of Bush's handling of the war. Garner said he thinks U.S. forces should act as a backup and logistics supplier, providing fire power when needed but focusing on advising the Iraqis.

Garner, who Bush appointed in 2003 to head reconstruction efforts in Iraq but swiftly replaced with Paul Bremer, also said the Bush administration should force CIA and State Department employees to "deploy" as troops do to hasten reconstruction, he said.

Why Iraq Is Crumbling (WP)

By Charles Krauthammer

The Washington Post, November 17, 2006

"A republic, if you can keep it."

-- Benjamin Franklin, upon leaving the Constitutional Convention, in answer to "What have we got?"

We have given the Iraqis a republic, and they do not appear able to keep it.

Americans flatter themselves that they are the root of all planetary evil. Nukes in North Korea? Poverty in Bolivia? Sectarian violence in Iraq? Breasts are beaten and fingers pointed as we try to somehow locate the root cause in America.

Our discourse on Iraq has followed the same pattern. Where did we go wrong? Too few troops? Too arrogant an occupation? Or too soft? Take your pick.

I have my own theories. In retrospect, I think we made several serious mistakes -- not shooting looters, not installing an Iraqi exile government right away, and not taking out Moqtada al-Sadr and his Mahdi Army in its infancy in 2004 -- that greatly compromised the occupation. Nonetheless, the root problem lies with Iraqis and their political culture.

Our objectives in Iraq were twofold and always simple: Depose Saddam Hussein and replace his murderous regime with a self-sustaining, democratic government.

The first was relatively easy. But Iraq's first truly democratic government turned out to be hopelessly feeble and fractured, little more than a collection of ministries handed over to various parties, militias and strongmen.

The problem is not, as we endlessly argue about, the number of American troops. Or of Iraqi troops. The problem is the allegiance of the Iraqi troops. Some serve the abstraction called Iraq. But many swear fealty to political parties, religious sects or militia leaders.

Are the Arabs intrinsically incapable of democracy, as the "realists" imply? True, there are political, historical, even religious reasons why Arabs are less prepared for democracy than, say, East Asians and Latin Americans who successfully democratized over the past several decades. But the problem here is Iraq's particular political culture, raped and ruined by 30 years of Hussein's totalitarianism.

What was left in its wake was a social desert, a dearth of the trust and good will and sheer human capital required for democratic governance. All that was left for the individual Iraqi to attach himself to was the mosque or clan or militia. At this earliest stage of democratic development, Iraqi national consciousness is as yet too weak and the culture of compromise too undeveloped to produce an effective government enjoying broad allegiance.

Last month American soldiers captured a Mahdi Army death squad leader in Baghdad -- only to be forced to turn him loose on order of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki. Two weeks ago, we were ordered, again by Maliki, to take down the barricades we had established around Sadr City in search of another notorious death squad leader and a missing American soldier.

This is no way to conduct a war. The Maliki government is a failure. It is beholden to a coalition dominated by two Shiite religious parties, each armed and ambitious, at odds with each other and with the ultimate aim of a stable, modern, democratic regime.

Is this America's fault? No. It is a result of Iraq's first democratic election. The United States was not going to replace Saddam Hussein with another tyrant. We were trying to plant democracy in the heart of the Middle East as the one conceivable antidote to extremism and terror -- and, in a country that is nearly two-thirds Shiite, that inevitably meant Shiite domination. It was never certain whether the long-oppressed Shiites would have enough sense of nation and sense of compromise to govern rather than rule. The answer is now clear: United in a dominating coalition, they do not.

Fortunately, however, the ruling Shiites do not have much internal cohesion. Just last month two of the major Shiite religious parties that underpin the Maliki government engaged in savage combat against each other in Amarah.

There is a glimmer of hope in this breakdown of the Shiite front. The unitary Shiite government having been proved such a failure, we should be encouraging the full breakup of the Shiite front in pursuit of a new coalition based on cross-sectarian alliances: the more moderate Shiite elements (secular and religious but excluding the poisonous Sadr), the Kurds and those Sunnis who recognize their minority status but are willing to accept an important, generously offered place at the table.

Such a coalition was almost created after the latest Iraqi elections. It needs to be attempted again. One can tinker with American tactics or troop levels from today until doomsday. But unless the Iraqis can put together a government of unitary purpose and resolute action, the simple objective of this war -- to leave behind a self-sustaining democratic government -- is not attainable.

Luther lives

Letter dated Nov. 12, addressed to D.C. Mayor Anthony A. Williams, from resident Jesse H. Merrell of Garfield Street Northwest:

"Dear Mayor Williams: I realize you are going out of office but ... I write in a final futile effort about your Department of Public Works notice of Nov. 6, 2006, to Luther L. Miller, with a $75 fine for his trash containers being 'out for collection at the wrong time or place.'

"As I've repeatedly told you, Luther L. Miller is dead — has been for nearly 30 years! On Nov. 1, 2001, after a similar notice, I told you Luther Miller has been dead since 1976. On Nov. 27, 2001 — after a second notice — I wrote that Mr. Miller was 'still dead,' and to direct all future correspondence to him at Old Stone Church Cemetery, Lewisburg, W.Va.

"On Dec. 14, 2001 — after a third letter — I wrote again, asking what part of 'dead' confused you, and sent you a certified copy of his death certificate. On Feb. 2, 2002 — after an unbelievable fourth letter — I wrote and asked if I took you to see his tombstone in Lewisburg, would that help? ...

"Now, undeterred, your unrelenting, unstoppable bureaucrats ... sent another notice to Luther L. Miller on Nov. 6, 2006."

Farewell, Rummy

The American Spectator's 2006 Robert L. Bartley dinner on Wednesday was "off-the-record," but we can tell you that outgoing Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld's keynote address made clear that the United States should not abandon Iraq anytime soon.

Subsequent remarks from Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, which were filled with praise for Mr. Rumsfeld and the U.S. military (several injured Iraq war veterans were in the packed audience at the Mandarin Oriental hotel), echoed the secretary's sentiments.

Master of ceremonies Grover G. Norquist pointed out that Ronald Reagan's ultimate victory in the Cold War never came until 1991 — nearly three years after he left office. Patience, he said, being the key word.

One of our favorite lines of the evening was compliments of Michael Barone, senior writer for U.S. News & World Report, who was presented with the 2006 Barbara Olson Award. Without naming names, he touched on the probability of one potential 2008 presidential candidate "throwing her broom into the ring."

Standard role

"We didn't vote for him," write the editors of the conservative Weekly Standard magazine, but "would still like to congratulate James Webb on his victory in the Virginia Senate election."

By winning, they explain, the Democrat who defeated Republican Sen. George Allen "becomes the first-ever Weekly Standard contributor to leave private life for national political office. In fact we were more than a little amused when the National Republican Senatorial Committee ran television advertisements attacking Webb for statements he made in an essay 'The War on the Military Culture' from our Jan. 20, 1997 issue."

The essay highlighted the problems posed by the assimilation of women into the military, and on that front, at least, the editors and Mr. Webb, a former Navy secretary and Republican-turned-Democrat, remain in agreement.

Minor Bach

That would be a rare concert performance of Johann Sebastian Bach's towering Mass in B Minor, led by internationally acclaimed Bach authority J. Reilly Lewis, filling the afternoon air around the Washington National Cathedral on Sunday.

DOJ_NMG_0095543

"It's a monumental work that is seldom done here in the States," Lawrence Patrick Reppert, director of administration for the Cathedral Choral Society, tells Inside the Beltway. "We're dealing with 160 to 180 voices, and a full Bach orchestra."

"Bach never intended the Mass to be performed in a place as large as this cathedral, so it will really be a treat to hear it performed in such a large space," Mr. Reppert adds.

The concert begins at 4 p.m. Tickets are required ($60 sections are sold out, but $25-to-$40 seats remain) and can be obtained in advance by calling 202/537-5527, or at the door starting at 3 p.m. Sunday.

Rumsfeld's Additional Accomplishments (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, November 17, 2006

Seemed Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld had barely left his Oval Office firing ceremony when the Pentagon Web site popped up with a new feature titled "Six Years of Accomplishments" with Rummy.

First and foremost were his accomplishments in the "war on terror," where overall, military efforts "liberated 50 million people in Afghanistan and Iraq." More specifically, they've "liberated 31 million Afghans from Taliban control and destroyed Al-Qaeda sanctuary." And they've "liberated 27 million Iraqis from a brutal dictatorship and turned over sovereignty of the country to an Iraqi government."

Math, apparently, is not a strong point. Somewhere it seems they lost -- or gained -- 8 million people.Following Rumsfeld Out

Meanwhile, Rumsfeld's firing is sure to spark the departure of many of his top aides. One assistant secretary, Peter Rodman, has already moved back to the Brookings Institution -- but that was long planned, we're told.

Several others are on the endangered species list. Stephen Cambone, the undersecretary for intelligence, is surely gone. His deputy, Lt. Gen. Gerald Boykin-- famed for his memorable remark that "my God was bigger than his" and other sage observations -- won't be far behind.

Others on the various DOD departure lists include acquisitions chief Kenneth Krieg; comptroller Tina Jonas; assistant secretary Thomas W. O'Connell, who runs Special Operations and Low-Intensity Conflict; and top Rumsfeld aide Robert Rangel, though Rangel is highly regarded in the building and among some House folks.

Reporters will be watching to see if spokesman Dorrance Smith, who just beefed up his public affairs staff with a "rapid response" team to correct media lies, mischaracterizations and inaccuracies, hangs on.

When the media rebuffed press office demands for corrections or declined to publish editorials, Smith had them printed in the Pentagon's "Early Bird" compilation of important news. Not just printed, but put right at the very top.

The "war on media" produced as many as six letters or "corrections" demands in a single day on Oct. 30, five of them signed by Smith.

But in recent days, there haven't been any, which would indicate either that the media have become accurate -- a near impossibility -- or just that we've lightened up on the nearly departed.

As for Smith, oddsmakers are thinking he'll probably go after Robert Gates comes in. But we're told the White House is supportive of his efforts, and we recall that Smith worked closely with Gates on the latter's successful CIA confirmation hearings. Also, Smith is on the Bush Library board at Texas A&M, where Gates is university president; they see each other and enjoy "a more-than-cordial relationship."Financial Advice for War Zone

What Iraq really needs, World Bank President Paul Wolfowitz opined on Tuesday, is advice on rebuilding its institutions -- not just money from the international community.

"I am not saying they don't need money," Wolfowitz told the European Parliament's development committee, "but they have a lot of money on their own and it's not managed right."

"What they need is help in constructing better institutions, public financial management and advice on how to better manage the petroleum sector," he said. "Help, I believe, in how to manage social safety nets."

Of course, money management isn't easy in the middle of a war that has killed or made refugees of a huge chunk of the managerial class.

Wolfowitz said he didn't know if U.S. Mideast policy will change with the Democratic takeover of Congress. "I know that they are not going to come and ask me for my opinion," he said. That's a safe bet.

"I am not sufficiently well informed on political and security issues to give sensible advice," he added. Wolfowitz was much better informed when he predicted Iraqi oil revenue would pay for the war.

More Marines Headed To Anbar Province (AP)

By Robert Burns

AP, November 17, 2006

About 2,200 Marines are headed from their ships in the Persian Gulf to an undisclosed location in Iraq's western Anbar province to help shore up U.S. combat power in an area riddled with insurgent violence.

The move, intended as a short-term measure, is evidence of the severity of the conflict in Anbar. The insurgency is entrenched and well-organized in a province where U.S. soldiers and Marines are being killed almost daily.

Maj. Matt McLaughlin, a spokesman for U.S. Central Command, said Thursday that members of the 15th Marine Expeditionary Unit were "in the process of transitioning and moving" from their ships to a transit point for deployment to Anbar. He said he could not discuss specifics of their mission or exact destination.

It will be the unit's third tour in Iraq. It participated in the initial invasion in March 2003 and returned in March 2005.

A Marine expeditionary unit typically is organized as a combined arms team. That means it includes infantry, armor and artillery, as well as a helicopter squadron and a small number of AV-8B Harrier fighter jets.

The move was disclosed on Wednesday by Gen. John Abizaid during testimony to the Senate Armed Services Committee. He said he approved the deployment "to help address" concerns expressed by Maj. Gen. Richard Zilmer, who commands all U.S. forces in Anbar. Abizaid did not elaborate. Zilmer's staff has indicated in recent months that an increase in troop levels could help the fight against the insurgency in Anbar.

Abizaid acknowledged, when pressed during questioning by senators, that Anbar is not under the control of U.S. or Iraqi forces. He said the security problem in Baghdad was even worse and that Anbar's problems therefore must be deemed secondary to suppressing the sectarian violence in the capital.

There already are about 30,000 U.S. troops in Anbar, which includes the trouble spots of Fallujah and Ramadi. The province stretches west from Baghdad to the borders with Syria, Jordan and Saudi Arabia.

In all of Iraq there are about 141,000 U.S. troops.

When U.S. commanders decided to step up security efforts in Baghdad last summer, they moved forces into the capital from elsewhere in Iraq; one combat unit was shifted from Rawah, a restive town in Anbar.

The 15th MEU was aboard ships in the Gulf as part of a normal deployment that included recently participating in exercises with the Indian navy.

It had been designated by Abizaid as a reserve force for Iraq, to be tapped in the event circumstances required a temporary boost in combat power. Until recently an Army combat brigade also had been held in reserve in Kuwait; it also was sent into Iraq to bolster security.

Contractor's Boss In Iraq Shot At Civilians, Workers' Suit Says (NYT)

By C. J. Chivers

The New York Times, November 17, 2006

CAMP FALLUJA, Iraq, Nov. 16 — Two former employees of an American private military contracting company have claimed in a Virginia court that they witnessed their supervisor deliberately shoot at Iraqi vehicles and civilians this summer, and that the company fired them for reporting the incidents.

The allegations, made in a lawsuit filed in Fairfax County Circuit Court, say Triple Canopy, one of the largest private military contractors to work with the United States in Iraq, retaliated against the men for reporting that the supervisor had committed violent felonies, and perhaps murder, on the job.

The lawsuit also claims that Triple Canopy's management blacklisted the men in the private military contracting industry, rendering them unemployable in the lucrative trade of providing private security in Iraq.

The suit was filed in late July. A motion by Triple Canopy to dismiss it in full was rejected by the judge last month. On Thursday, the court set a trial date for next summer.

In response to an inquiry, a spokesperson for Triple Canopy issued a statement on Thursday from the company's headquarters in Herndon, Va., outside Washington.

"Triple Canopy requires all employees to maintain the highest professional and ethical standards in every aspect of their work, including in high-threat environments such as Iraq," the statement said. "Out of respect for our judicial system and all those involved, Triple Canopy does not comment on ongoing litigation."

Triple Canopy, founded by former Delta Force commandos in 2003, is one of several young companies that support military operations in Iraq, Afghanistan and other countries.

In the suit, the former employees — Shane B. Schmidt, a former Marine Corps sniper, and Charles L. Sheppard III, a former Army Ranger — claim that on July 8 their shift leader fired deliberately and unnecessarily at Iraqi vehicles and civilians in two incidents while their team was driving in Baghdad.

Their job that day, the suit says, was to pick up an employee of KBR, a subsidiary of the Halliburton Company that is involved in construction in Iraq, at the Baghdad airport.

In the suit and in telephone interviews, however, the men said that their shift leader, who was scheduled to leave Iraq the next day, was determined to kill before he left Baghdad. (The shift leader, a former American serviceman from Oklahoma, was not named in the suit.) The first incident occurred about 2:15 p.m., the suit says, when their vehicle approached the airport entrance.

Their shift leader, the suit claims, announced that he was "going to kill someone today," stepped from his vehicle and fired several shots from his M4 assault rifle into the windshield of a stopped white truck.

The men claim that the truck was not an evident threat and that their team was not in danger. The men say in the suit that the shift leader then returned to their truck and said, "That didn't happen, understand."

Later that day, the suit says, the shift leader said, "I've never shot anyone with my pistol before," and then opened the vehicle door and fired seven or eight shots into the windshield of a taxi.

Neither of the plaintiffs, in telephone interviews, said he knew for certain what injuries had been suffered by civilians in the two vehicles that had been shot at by their shift leader. In each case, they said, their own vehicle drove away quickly after the shift leader fired.

Both men said that the shift leader had told them that if they reported the shootings they would be fired, and that they feared that the shift leader, whom they regarded as unstable, was dangerous to them.

Nevertheless, on July 10, the day after the shift leader left Iraq, the two men reported the shootings to Triple Canopy's senior supervisors in the country, the lawsuit says, adding that retaliation was swift.

"Immediately after making the report, Plaintiff Sheppard was pulled from duty and suspended," the suit claims. "Plaintiff Schmidt was suspended the following day. Within a week the plaintiffs were terminated as a result of having reported the Shift Leader's unlawful conduct."

Both men had been paid $500 a day by Triple Canopy for their work in Iraq, the suit says. Since then, they claim to have been blacklisted.

Both men seek lost earnings and damages, said their lawyer, Patricia A. Smith.

U.S. Contractor Fired On Iraqi Vehicles For Sport, Suit Alleges (WP)

By Tom Jackman

The Washington Post, November 17, 2006

A man who worked in Iraq for a Herndon-based security company is accused in a lawsuit of firing twice into Iraqi civilian vehicles last summer without provocation, possibly killing at least one person.

DOJ_NMG_0095546

Two co-workers who witnessed the shootings say in the suit that there has been no investigation, even though they reported the incidents.

All three men worked for Triple Canopy, a corporation formed in 2003 by former military men to provide security in the Middle East for the United States government and private companies. Triple Canopy was the ninth-largest contractor for the U.S. State Department in fiscal 2005, with payments totaling more than $90 million, government records show.

That sum does not include what Triple Canopy is paid by private firms such as KBR, formerly Kellogg, Brown & Root, a subsidiary of Halliburton Co. that is involved in rebuilding in Iraq. Former Army Ranger Shane Schmidt, former Marine Charles L. Sheppard III and their shift leader were all working on an assignment for KBR when the shootings occurred near Baghdad on July 8, alleges the suit, filed in Fairfax County Circuit Court.

Schmidt and Sheppard say they reported the shootings to Triple Canopy. Instead of investigating, the men allege, Triple Canopy fired them and prevented their being hired by other companies in the Middle East. The lawsuit alleges wrongful termination and wrongful interference with their professional future.

Triple Canopy and KBR declined comment on the suit. Defense Department officials did not respond to numerous inquiries, and State Department officials said they were unaware of the incidents that are being alleged.

Schmidt and Sheppard allege that Triple Canopy did not report the shootings to KBR or the government. They say that no one has ever contacted them about the shootings.

In court papers, Triple Canopy has not denied that the incidents occurred. The company has tried to have the case dismissed on the grounds that no violation of Virginia law occurred and that Schmidt and Sheppard were "at-will" employees and could be fired for any reason.

At a hearing last month, Fairfax Circuit Court Judge M. Langhorne Keith said the state's "at-will" legal doctrine has exceptions, including "when people allege that they reported a murder, two murders or maybe more than two murders, conducted by a fellow employee, and were fired for making that report."

The lawsuit does not name the person accused of the shootings, a shift leader. Schmidt and Sheppard's attorney, Patricia A. Smith of Alexandria, declined to name the man. The case is scheduled to go to trial July 30.

Smith said Schmidt and Sheppard were not available for interviews yesterday. Schmidt lives in Herndon, and Sheppard resides in Destin, Fla. Both have private security jobs in this country, far removed from the high-adrenaline, $500-a-day work they did for years in Iraq and Afghanistan, Smith said.

Schmidt was a Marine from 1995 to 2003 and was one of the first Marines deployed to Afghanistan, Smith said. He began working for Triple Canopy in Iraq in 2004.

Sheppard served in the Army from 1995 to 2002, including time as a Ranger, and was deployed in Albania and Kosovo. He worked in Iraq and Qatar for other private security companies and began working for Triple Canopy in April.

"These guys are tremendously experienced and well-respected in the field," Smith said. They assert that Triple Canopy has given other companies false reasons for firing them.

On July 8, according to their lawsuit, Schmidt and Sheppard were riding with their shift leader in a convoy to pick up a KBR employee at the Baghdad airport.

As their vehicle approached the airport, their shift leader declared that he was "going to kill someone today," the lawsuit states. The man then stepped out of the vehicle and fired several shots from his M4 rifle into the windshield of a stopped truck.

Schmidt and Sheppard were horrified, Smith said. According to the lawsuit, the shift leader told them, "That didn't happen, understand?"

After their convoy picked up the KBR employee, the crew headed to its next destination. At this point, Schmidt and Sheppard allege, their shift leader declared, "I've never shot anyone with my pistol before." The man then opened his door and fired seven or eight rounds into the windshield of a nearby taxi. Schmidt and Sheppard later heard that a cabdriver was found shot to death in the area, according to the suit.

Schmidt and Sheppard initially hesitated to report the two seemingly unprovoked shootings, especially because their supervisor told them that they would be fired if they did, their lawsuit claims. The men also feared for their safety, they said.

But the next day, the shift leader was returned to the United States at the end of his three-month contract, Smith said. The two men reported the shootings, were suspended, then were fired. Smith said Triple Canopy told them they were fired for not reporting the shootings quickly enough. Schmidt asserts that when he asked who was investigating the incidents, Triple Canopy told him no one was investigating.

Smith said she does not know how many people might have been wounded or killed in the shootings. She said that Schmidt and Sheppard could not see into the truck that was fired on but that they did see a cabdriver in the second vehicle.

Attempts to oversee American contractors in Iraq, including the thousands who have been hired to provide security, have "gone from completely absent to spotty," said Peter W. Singer, a specialist in warfare and the Middle East at the Brookings Institution. Most oversight is focused on how U.S. money is spent, Singer said. But as to the regulating of contractors' conduct, "that part of the discussion is pretty much missing still."

Fallujah Now A Safe Haven For Sunnis (AP)

By Steven R. Hurst

AP, November 17, 2006

Some 30 Sunni refugees seeking a safe haven from Baghdad sit under the shade of a camouflage net on the outskirts of Fallujah, waiting at a makeshift U.S. facility for city IDs.

A skinny young man with a red and white scarf wound around his head pulls a reporter aside and lifts his right pant leg, exposing a shin with marks where Shiite militiamen had bored into the bone with an electric drill — the current tool of choice for Baghdad torture specialists.

Security is tight and snipers abound, but Fallujah — once an extremely violent Sunni insurgent bastion where the charred bodies of four Blackwater security men were hung on a bridge — has become a refuge from the death squads and mortar battles in Baghdad. U.S. Marines say about 150 Iraqis flee here each week from the capital, 40 miles to the east.

Unlike Baghdad, which houses large numbers of both Muslim sects, Fallujah's population is overwhelmingly Sunni Arab. As a result, Fallujah has not experienced the raging sectarian warfare that has the capital teetering on the brink of civil war. The migration is part of a larger exodus out of Baghdad, where entire neighborhoods have been uprooted.

Population figures in Iraq are little more than estimates, but Fallujah was said to have about 450,000 residents before U.S. forces stormed the city in November 2004 to drive out the insurgents. As the assault gained force nearly 400,000 of that number had fled, but the Americans say there are about 300,000 living in the city now.

Two years after the U.S. attack on Fallujah, Marine Col. Lawrence Nicholson takes rightful pride in what he and his men have done since taking over.

Nicholson strides the stony ground here in snappy camouflage fatigues, his dog tag secured under the laces of his left boot. He doesn't slip into his flak jacket but instead assaults the bulletproof vest, wrestles it on, then walks off with the slightly bowlegged gait of a man just off a horse.

"This is the club. Welcome to our country club, our gated community," the 51-year-old Toronto native said with a grin during a tour of the city Wednesday.

But if Fallujah were a hospital patient, it would still be in intensive care. Two city council members and the council president have been assassinated since February. At least 30 police officers were gunned down this summer. The mayor fled in July.

Reconstruction of the city, ruined in the Marine assault, is in progress but far from complete.

There's no bustle on the main street, and not much to bustle to. Unemployment is well above 50 percent. The cement factories are only now struggling back to life.

A reporter who tried to step outdoors during a city council meeting — part of the tour — was grabbed by the arm and pulled back inside by Marines who warned of snipers right in the center of the city.

Nicholson and his 5,000 Marines of Regimental Combat Team 5 have Fallujah sealed — the incoming roads at least — with what they call ECPs, or entry control points, manned by Americans, Iraqi army soldiers and Iraqi police. As a result, a long line of cars stretches at Fallujah's eastern reaches. The Americans said they have reduced the wait to drive into the city to about 40 minutes since the ECPs were put in place several months ago. It looked like a much longer wait.

In order to get in, everyone must carry a U.S.-issued ID card proving he or she is a resident and registered to live in the city. Weapons are banned in Fallujah, by law if not in fact.

At one point, Nicholson strode in to begin directing traffic himself, then pulled a local Iraqi policeman — a Sunni Muslim — together with an Iraqi soldier — a Shiite — and asked them if there were any problems between them. The men, from the rival sects whose religious-based conflict is tearing apart central Iraq, assured the colonel all was well.

Nicholson smiled and shook his head in a "Didn't I tell you so?" gesture.

He was seriously wounded the same day he took control of RCT 5 shortly before the Marine assault in November 2004. He missed the Fallujah operation but has returned and surrounded himself with an impressive team of junior officers to whip the place into shape.

His command comes across like a squad of corporate turnaround specialists sent to a troubled regional hub of some Fortune 500 company. They are smart, well-groomed rising stars of the Marine Corps — specialists in Sunni tribal affairs, linguists, organizational experts.

Nicholson — wiry and ruddy-faced with the look of a street brawler — keeps a tight rein on Fallujah and its townspeople. He understands their deep ambivalence about the U.S. forces that keep the peace.

"The average person here would tell us to 'Get the hell out of my city — but not just yet,' " the colonel said.

So while he's here, Nicholson is a nonstop dynamo — here, there, everywhere, or so he would have the Fallujans believe.

His men call him the mayor of the town. The real mayor is Jassim al-Bedawi, who took over from a predecessor who fled to Jordan this summer under threat of death.

Al-Bedawi, a lawyer, looks like a bit like Burt Reynolds in his younger days — the same white-toothed grin under a he-man mustache. He took Nicholson to task at the latest city council meeting for closing a bridge over the Euphrates River.

They call it the new bridge here. The old bridge, built in 1937, is now called the Blackwater Bridge. It's where insurgents hung the bodies of the four security men who were killed in the city in March 2004.

Al-Bedawi complained that the heavy security and closed new bridge were jamming traffic, blocking deliveries of necessary goods such as canisters of cooking gas.

Nicholson stood as if at attention in front of his chair along the wall of the City Council chamber, listening but shaking his head side to side. He said he would check but countered that there had been too many attacks on the Iraqi army at the new bridge.

He didn't say no, but he didn't offer much hope.

Only 12 of 20 council members showed up this week, obviously not keen to journey through town to a meeting that so closely associates them with the Americans.

The colonel calls the council "our dysfunctional family, but our family nevertheless."

"We preach Team Fallujah constantly ... that we're all in this together," the 26-year Marine veteran said. "But in the end we have to tell them it is their choice, what they want it to look like when we're gone."

Through the daylong tour a reporter observed, Nicholson shook as many Iraqi hands as he could, and introduced his visitors to both town dignitaries and men in the street — clearly unafraid of what the locals would say about his work.

And in short goodbye remarks, Nicholson smiled and said, "I hope you got a sense of what the average Omar is thinking."

Then he spun on his heel and barked out some orders.

Democrats See Improved Electoral Map (WSJ)

DEMOCRATS SEE improved electoral map as 2008 field expands.

DOJ_NMG_0095549

House Democratic campaign chief Emanuel touts gains among suburbanites and higher-income voters -- Democrats won among those earning $50,000 to $100,000. Republican consultant Steve Lombardo, citing Democratic advances among Catholics, says "only another election or two" can prove staying power of such trends.

Sen. Dodd of Connecticut, who may join Democratic nomination race, calls for "New Age of Idealism." His annual Williamsburg retreat for supporters attracts greater interest given his 2008 aspirations and ascension to Senate Banking chairmanship.

Democrats hold most congressional seats in states with 303 electoral votes, strategist Mark Gersh says.

ENERGY INTERESTS SPLIT on lame-duck drilling legislation.

Industry, agriculture and labor groups seek House passage of Senate's offshore drilling bill, which would send measure to Bush's desk. "We've got a bird in the hand," says Jack Gerard of American Chemistry Council.

Some companies hold out for more ambitious House bill, which would allow states such as Virginia to opt out of anti-drilling moratoria. Robert Slaughter of National Petrochemical and Refiners Association says "it will be difficult" to get Democratic majorities to revisit the issue later.

HEADHUNTING: Republicans confront loss of power -- and paychecks.

Defeated lawmakers search for new paths; some expect outgoing Indiana Rep. Hostettler to become a minister. Ousted Republicans should be "rich...or ready for retirement," one surviving lawmaker says, since "there are not going to be a lot of association head or lobbying jobs" in Washington.

Rumors swirl that outgoing Speaker Hastert may be Tokyo-bound, as Democratic predecessor Foley once was. Hastert, who speaks Japanese, isn't seeking a leadership post and may quit Congress altogether.

Nine of 24 Republicans on House Ways and Means Committee won't return in next Congress.

TURNABOUT: Moderate Democratic group Third Way touts increasing public receptivity toward gay rights, two years after Bush profited from anti-marriage stance. In post-election Zogby International poll, nearly two-thirds of voters support legal recognition for gay and lesbian couples. Although gay-marriage bans passed in seven states, they "have lost their impact as a wedge issue," argues Third Way's Rachel Laser. Arizonans defeated such a ban.

ADMINISTRATION DOWNPLAYS usefulness of talking to Iran and Syria about Iraq. Although Baker-Hamilton group, top Democrats and Britain's Blair recommend talks, Secretary of State Rice insists Iran or Syria would demand concessions and couldn't cure Iraq's rising sectarian violence.

INTRAMURAL FIGHT? Texas Democrat Jackson-Lee is in line to chair House immigration subcommittee, but draws criticism over her sometimes-combative style and may face competition for the post from California Rep. Lofgren. Immigration groups steer clear of debate. Iowa's Steve King, among the most vocal House opponents of immigration, is subcommittee's ranking Republican.

PARTY POOPER? Telecom bar association's annual holiday-season Chairman's dinner is nixed because FCC chief Martin won't show up; some lawyers fret he wants to kill it altogether. Last year's event attracted about 1,500 guests and raised $43,000 for scholarships. The bar association will try a springtime version next year.

VIETNAM TRADE STUMBLE catches White House by surprise.

Red-faced Trade Representative Schwab, in Hanoi, is forced to parse congressional procedures after trade pact wins majority but falls short of two-thirds required under special parliamentary rules. "Getting this through Congress was a huge deal" for Vietnam, an administration official says amid Bush's Asia trip.

Textile lobbyist Augustine Tantillo says misfire underscores spread of "cold feet" among lawmakers about free trade. North Carolina Republican Rep. Robin Hayes, whose dead-heat re-election race remains undecided, chides party leaders for bringing up the measure so soon after the election.

West Coast senators express reservations on concessions to textile-state lawmakers, fearing impact on U.S. exporters.

MINOR MEMOS: D.C. Delegate Eleanor Holmes Norton can't vote on House floor as representative of federal enclave, but may chair Transportation subcommittee in new Congress...Incoming Transportation Committee Chair Oberstar, facing uncharacteristically packed news conference, likens himself to the Bible's Joshua, "who did enter the Promised Land."

Soldier Gets 90 Years In Rape, Killing Of Iraqi Girl (WP)

By Josh White

The Washington Post, November 17, 2006

An Army specialist who admitted that he and a group of other U.S. soldiers raped a 14-year-old girl and killed her and her family in an Iraqi village was sentenced to 90 years in prison yesterday, by far the longest sentence for a U.S. soldier in connection with the death of an Iraqi civilian since the war began in 2003.

Spec. James P. Barker, 23, could be eligible for parole in 20 years, as part of a plea agreement with prosecutors that spares him the possibility of a death sentence. Barker has indicated he will testify against other soldiers in the case, some of whom face the death penalty.

Barker yesterday became one of 16 U.S. troops sentenced to prison time for the deaths of Iraqi civilians during the war, and he received a sentence of more than three times the length of the next-longest sentence in any case that has concluded. Two soldiers are serving 25-year sentences in unrelated homicide cases.

Also yesterday, Marine Lance Cpl. Tyler A. Jackson pleaded guilty to aggravated assault and conspiracy to obstruct justice in the death of an Iraqi man near Hamdaniyah. As part of a deal, he was sentenced to 21 months in prison.

The slaying of the girl, Abier Kassim Hamzah Rashid al Janabi, on March 12 was particularly shocking because it had no connection to military combat operations and was carefully planned by soldiers who had spotted her while patrolling the Mahmudiyah area weeks before. The girl's father, mother and young sister were also killed, and soldiers set the teenager's body on fire to try to conceal the crime.

In a nine-page document that provides chilling details of the case, Barker confessed to plotting the attack on Abier with other soldiers as they played cards and drank whiskey mixed with a carbonated energy drink. The soldiers donned disguises, cut through chain-link fences and sneaked into the house, planning to kill everyone inside, according to the document.

The soldiers alternated holding Abier down on the floor while raping her, according to the document.

Another soldier, former Pfc. Steven D. Green, herded Abier's family members into a bedroom before shooting them, according to Barker's account. Green then raped and killed Abier, according to the document.

"I want the people of Iraq to know that I did not go there to do the terrible things that I did," Barker said in court, the Associated Press reported. "I do not ask anyone to forgive me today."

Barker said he became "angry and mean" as a way to survive in the austere and dangerous conditions where he served south of Baghdad, and as a result he began to hate everyone in Iraq.

Attorneys for Barker have argued that he was under extreme pressure and emotional distress while working in the Yusufiyah area, an insurgent stronghold where U.S. forces faced daily attacks and were severely understaffed. David Sheldon, Barker's civilian attorney, said he believes his client's sentence should make it difficult for prosecutors to get the death penalty against the other soldiers.

"Specialist Barker took responsibility for his actions and has expressed sincere remorse for his conduct," Sheldon said. "This sends a clear message to the government that it will be difficult to obtain a death sentence against any of the defendants, including Pfc. Green."

U.S. Airstrikes Climb Sharply In Afghanistan (NYT)

By David S. Cloud

The New York Times, November 17, 2006

The Air Force has conducted more than 2,000 airstrikes in Afghanistan over the past six months, a sharp increase in bombing that reflects the growing demand for American air cover since NATO has assumed a larger ground combat role, Air Force officials said.

The intensifying air campaign has focused on southern Afghanistan, where NATO units, primarily from Britain, Canada and the Netherlands, as well as American Special Forces have been engaging in the heaviest and most frequent ground combat with Taliban rebels since the invasion five years ago.

The NATO forces are mostly operating without heavy armor or artillery support, and as Taliban resistance has continued, more air support has been used to compensate for the lightness of the units, Air Force officials said. Most of the strikes have come during "close air support" missions, where the bombers patrol the area and respond to calls from ground units in combat rather than performing planned strikes.

On a recent 11-hour mission that included a reporter for The New York Times, a B-1 bomber orbited at 20,000 feet, responding to radio calls from American and Canadian troops who asked the plane to use its radar to watch for insurgent forces and to be prepared to drop bombs.

On a separate mission last week, a bomber dropped its entire payload of eight 2,000-pound bombs and six 500-pound bombs after ground units called for help, Air Force officials said.

One B-1 pilot, Lt. Col. Tim Schepper, said that when troops called for airstrikes, "There are times when you can hear the gunfire and R.P.G.'s over the radio in the background, and that's when you know you have helped keep them alive." An R.P.G. is a rocket-propelled grenade.

To carry out the heavier mission load, the Air Force's entire complement of B-1 bombers was shifted over the summer from the British air base at Diego Garcia in the Indian Ocean to a Middle Eastern airfield closer to Afghanistan. The new basing arrangement shortens the flying time to Afghanistan by two hours, allowing bombers to remain overhead for longer periods between refueling by aerial tankers.

Air Force officials said they were prohibited from disclosing the location because of sensitivities by the host country about disclosing the extent of its cooperation with the American military.

Lt. Gen. David Richards, the British commander of NATO forces in Afghanistan, has promised to bring stability and win support among Afghan civilians by focusing primarily on economic development and avoiding combat. But the resurgence of the Taliban has made that difficult. NATO forces have established numerous small bases and sent out extended patrols in small formations and with little or no heavy armor and artillery. And NATO has also lacked a reserve force that can be shifted quickly to hot spots, though Poland has promised to send more troops to fulfill that role.

The 2,095 attacks by American aircraft since June is many times greater than the number of airstrikes in Iraq, where the terrain and nature of the conflict are less susceptible to bombing campaigns. There have been only 88 attacks by American aircraft in Iraq since June, according to Air Force figures. Unlike in Afghanistan, insurgents in Iraq are largely in urban areas and do not often mass in groups large enough to warrant use of airstrikes, Air Force commanders said.

The increase in total munitions dropped has also been substantial. This year in Afghanistan, American aircraft have dropped 987 bombs and fired more than 146,000 cannon rounds and bullets in strafing runs, more than was expended in both categories from the beginning of the American-led invasion in 2001 through 2004, the Air Force said. During those years, a total of 848 bombs and just over 119,000 bullets were used by aircraft, according to Air Force figures.

On the B-1 flight last week that included a reporter, Colonel Schepper and his two-man crew received a radio call from a Canadian soldier at an isolated base near the town of Tarin Kowt, who asked the aircraft to stand by for potential attacks on insurgent forces. A few hours later, the bomber crew received a similar radio message from an American Special Forces soldier, who warned that Taliban attacks on his position had been frequent. "We've had contact every day this week," said the soldier, who could not be identified under military rules. "As sure as the day is long, we'll have more."

The surge in recent airstrikes coincided with NATO moving into the south over the summer, a period when Taliban attacks also increased. Much of the bombing in September was conducted during several major NATO ground operations against concentrations of Taliban fighters. But the number of air attacks has stayed high, reaching 397 in October, and is expected to remain at comparable levels this month, according to Air Force commanders.

In Afghanistan the increased use of air power has also come at a cost in casualties among allied forces and civilians. In September, an American A-10 attack jet mistakenly opened fire on Canadian troops southwest of Kandahar, killing one and wounding dozens more.

Later that month, a nighttime NATO air attack involving an AC-130 gunship killed 31 civilians, most of whom were shepherds, a joint NATO and Afghan investigation concluded recently. The civilians were killed as they fled their tents with their wives and children after a NATO bomb struck a nearby compound, killing 20 Taliban fighters. There have also been increased reports of damage or destruction to mosques and other civilian buildings and property.

In addition to dropping bombs, Air Force jets are increasingly being called on to provide ground forces with intelligence about possible insurgent forces in their vicinity, using infrared cameras, radar and other surveillance equipment.

While the B-1 has proven useful in Afghanistan because of its large fuel tanks and bomb-carrying capacity, the planes' 30-year-old electronics have sometimes been a liability.

On the recent 11-hour mission, the B-1 crew had to inform ground troops several times that the plane's radar could not deliver the detailed picture of ground activity they wanted and that many fighter jets and other aircraft equipped with more modern surveillance equipment could provide.

During the mission, one American soldier called up to say that his unit was holding a memorial ceremony for a soldier who had been killed several days earlier in combat. Trying to detect any possible ambushes of the service, he asked whether the plane could see whether there were any "military-age males" with weapons nearby — a request beyond the capabilities of the B-1's electronics, the crew told him. So he requested that the B-1 perform a "show of force," a low-level pass meant to frighten any fighters nearby.

Colonel Schepper dropped the jet steeply from 20,000 feet to around 8,000 feet and roared over the soldiers' position, releasing flares to heighten the effect of the fly-by.

On the plane's radio, the soldier voiced a simple response: "Beautiful, beautiful, beautiful."

Army Retooling Itself To Fight Counterinsurgency Wars (MCT)

By Drew Brown

McClatchy Newspapers, November 17, 2006

FORT LEAVENWORTH, Kan. - At this historic Army post on a bluff overlooking the Missouri River, the Army has mounted an intense effort to train its soldiers how to fight insurgents more effectively in Iraq, Afghanistan and beyond.

Fort Leavenworth is where all-black regiments known as "buffalo soldiers" once galloped off to police the American frontier. Later generations here studied how to defeat Soviet tank divisions. Now the United States Army Combined Arms Center has retooled the Army's leadership and training programs to focus on what motivates insurgents, the strategies and tactics they use and the cultures in which they operate.

The shift away from major combat operations to irregular warfare is one of the most significant changes in doctrine and training the Army has undertaken since World War II.

"It's a big change for our Army," said Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, the Iraq war veteran who commands the Combined Arms Center. "Although we have done lots of counterinsurgency operations over the years, historically we have, as an institution, tended to refocus on major combat operations, the big battles, after each of our counterinsurgency operations was over."

The last time the U.S. Army fought a major counterinsurgency war was 40 years ago in Vietnam. The Army fought a smaller counterinsurgency war in El Salvador in the 1980s and intervened in Somalia, Haiti and the Balkans in the 1990s. But the Army's primary focus remained winning an all-out conventional war in Europe against the Soviet Union and the Warsaw Pact.

Irregular war and stability operations were considered lesser tasks that required little preparation or practice.

Large-scale war remained the Army's focus even after the invasion of Iraq in 2003. Since then, however, that focus has changed as it's become clear that Iraq and Afghanistan are part of a long guerrilla struggle that could last decades.

"One of the light bulbs that's come on in the last year or so is to no longer accept the notion that ... if you can do high-end major combat operations and you've got a disciplined force, then you can do this other stuff," Petraeus said. "But that's not the case. If you want to do this other stuff, then you've got to train for it."

"The greater goal is to help our Army truly be a learning organization, one that is adapting in response to the challenges we face in the long war (and) one that strives to ensure basic combat competence, but also a degree of confidence in a number of the other tasks that our soldiers are asked to perform," Petraeus said.

That means preparing soldiers for everything from high-intensity combat to peacekeeping and reconstruction. Soldiers in Iraq and Afghanistan can be asked to hunt down insurgents one day, guard polling stations another and rebuild schools the next.

Waging a successful counterinsurgency war means that military commanders must be prepared to carry out all those missions at once, while taking into account what political and economic effects their actions will have, officials say.

"Sometimes the best action is inaction," said Clinton J. Ancker, III, the director of the Combined Arms Center Doctrine Directorate. "It's a very difficult job balancing the application of force."

Lessons such as that are at the heart of the changes the Combined Arms Center is helping to make across the Army and other services.

A team from the Army and the Marine Corps are writing the military's first counterinsurgency field manual in 20 years. A main theme is that military action is only a means to a political end.

"This manual is as much about the next fight in the GWOT (global war on terrorism)," said Ancker, who's overseeing the project. "It's not solely about the one we're in now."

At the Army's three large training centers - Fort Irwin, Calif., Fort Polk, La. and Hohenfels, Germany - soldiers now train in mock Iraqi and Afghan villages.

The exercises involve hundreds of Arab and Afghan American role players. Soldiers are given a number of missions to accomplish while fending off improvised explosive and sniper attacks. Whether they succeed depends on the relationships they establish with the villagers.

Basic trainees at Army bases in Georgia, South Carolina, Kentucky, Missouri and Oklahoma now learn how to spot and avoid roadside bombs, react to ambushes on their convoys and train with local security forces.

Hundreds of additional students enroll annually in Arabic, Pashtun and other languages at the Defense Language Institute in Monterey, Calif. And any soldier can download a course in Arabic from the Army's Web site for free.

Computer specialists at Fort Leavenworth's Battle Command Knowledge System run three dozen online forums where soldiers in the field can share information.

Books on al-Qaida, militant Islam, Iraqi and Afghan history and the Muslim world are now required reading for majors and lieutenant colonels at the Army Command and General Staff College at Fort Leavenworth. There also are courses on Middle East culture and on Islam. A week is devoted to the study of irregular warfare.

"We can't make them a cultural expert in every culture that exists over there," said Russ Crumrine, a Middle East specialist who teaches there. "But the key is to get them thinking about what they need to know and how they might apply it."

The odds are that every student at the college will be serving in combat within weeks of graduation. The faculty wants to ensure that these officers will think about the cultural effects of what they do in Iraq or Afghanistan.

"No officer would ever plan an operation without studying the terrain," said John Cary, who also teaches Middle East studies. "Now, no officer would ever plan an operation without studying the human terrain."

The Combined Arms Center at Fort Leavenworth has nine organizations involved in doctrine and leadership development, training and battle command. The center oversees field exercises at posts in California, Louisiana and Germany and training programs at another 11 schools, ranging from combat arms to military intelligence and foreign language study.

The Center also is home to the Army Command and General Staff College, a key school for mid-level officers, and the Center for Army Lessons Learned, which collects, analyzes and distributes the latest insights and observations from the battlefield. Officials describe the Center at as one of the Army's "engines of change."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Bush Administration To Ease Corporate-Fraud Rules, People Say (BLOOM)

By Robert Schmidt

Bloomberg, November 17, 2006

Nov. 17 (Bloomberg) -- The U.S. Justice Department plans to make it harder for prosecutors to force companies to waive their legal rights in plea negotiations to avoid indictment, people familiar with the plan said.

The proposed changes address concerns that companies are being asked unfairly to reveal confidential talks with their lawyers and cut off legal support for employees under investigation, the people said. Businesses, lawmakers and federal judges have complained that the department rules adopted in the wake of corporate accounting scandals in 2001 and 2002 erode the rights of companies and employees.

``This is a policy issue that needs to be addressed and there has been a lot of criticism from a lot of different directions," said former Justice Department official George Terwilliger, a partner at the White & Case law firm in Washington. ``There is also a recognition that we need to be careful how we tinker with the engine of commerce."

Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty is likely to announce the revised policy in a speech early next month, the people said. They stressed that the changes won't be dramatic and are still being debated within the department.

McNulty, who also heads President George W. Bush's corporate fraud task force, hasn't signed off on the proposed changes, the people said. He was traveling and unavailable for comment.

``We want to get it right," McNulty told a Senate Judiciary Committee hearing in September. ``We don't want to do something that is inappropriate or unreasonable."

Protecting the Public

Brian Roehrkasse, a Justice Department spokesman, said the rules are under review and any changes would be in accord with ``safeguarding the integrity of our financial institutions" and ``the public interest."

The policy in question -- originally outlined in a 2003 memo by then-Deputy Attorney General Larry Thompson -- offers leniency to companies that cooperate with prosecutors. It suggests that companies can benefit by waiving attorney-client privilege and by not paying the legal bills of ``culpable employees."

Because an indictment is often fatal for a company, corporate lawyers are under pressure to meet almost any government demand to avoid charges. That has made the memo a rallying point for companies who say the policy amounts to coercion to settle with the government.

Arthur Andersen LLP, one of the so-called Big Five accounting firms with 85,000 employees, collapsed after it was indicted for destroying documents related to its work for Enron. The U.S. Supreme Court in 2005 overturned the conviction, too late to save the firm.

Coalition of Critics

Senator Arlen Specter, a Pennsylvania Republican who will give up his Judiciary Committee chairmanship in January, plans to introduce legislation that would compel the Justice Department to overhaul the Thompson memo. A coalition that includes the Washington-based U.S. Chamber of Commerce, the Chicago-based American Bar Association and the New York-based American Civil Liberties Union has spearheaded the attack on the memo.

DOJ_NMG_0095555

The incoming chairman of the Judiciary Committee, Vermont Democrat Patrick Leahy, has also expressed support for changing the guidelines.

The Justice Department's proposed revisions to the Thompson memo are intended to address its critics, who include three former attorneys general, the people familiar with the matter said.

One of the changes, they said, would require prosecutors to get approval from the attorney general or his top deputy before seeking a waiver of attorney-client privilege.

Each of the 93 U.S. attorneys' offices across the country has its own policy now on asking for the waivers, leading companies to complain there is no uniformity and giving prosecutors a free hand in demanding confidential material.

`A Significant Step'

``Taking the step of requiring approval in Washington would be a significant step," said Michael Horowitz, a former chief of staff in the Justice Department's criminal division and now a partner with the Cadwalader, Wickersham & Taft law firm in Washington. It would force prosecutors to justify their actions to their superiors, he said.

Another proposed revision would say companies won't be penalized for refusing to reveal confidential talks with their attorneys, the people said. They could still waive the privilege and get credit for cooperation, the people said.

The Justice Department also is considering deleting the language referring to legal fees for ``culpable employees," they said. Several federal judges have questioned that provision, including one in New York who in June ruled that the practice violated the rights of former KPMG LLP executives being tried on charges of selling illegal tax shelters. The Justice Department has appealed.

Some Critics Want More

Some critics of the current guidelines want a more drastic overhaul.

``We've built a heck of a lot of momentum, and we don't want this problem to resurface," said Susan Hackett, senior vice president of the Association of Corporate Counsel, a Washington- based group. The Justice Department is ``trying to throw a train off the tracks" by proposing only minor changes, she said.

The Justice Department says the guidelines are vital to speed investigations and help protect investors. The agency also maintains that companies often take the initiative in waiving attorney-client privilege and cutting off support for employees.

``Most corporations want out from the dark clouds of criminal wrongdoing as quickly as possible," McNulty told the Senate Judiciary Committee in September.

Ken Lay's Death Spurs Senate Bill To Allow Convictions To Stand (WSJ)

By Judith Burns

The Wall Street Journal, November 17, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The death of former Enron Corp. chief executive Kenneth Lay prompted Senate lawmakers to introduce legislation Thursday that would end the practice of dismissing convictions of defendants who die before an appeal is final.

The bill by Senate Judiciary Committee members Dianne Feinstein, a Democrat from California, and Jeff Sessions, a Republican from Alabama, was written with help from the Justice Department, which had sought changes after Mr. Lay's death on July 5.

Mr. Lay died just weeks after being convicted on criminal charges including securities and bank fraud; a federal district court judge in Houston dismissed the convictions in October. Under current U.S. law, criminal convictions are tossed out when defendants such as Mr. Lay die before they exhaust their right to an appeal.

"We need to ensure that, in these types of cases, hard-won convictions are preserved and restitution remains available for the victims of crime," Ms. Feinstein said in a statement on the legislation.

Mr. Sessions noted that Mr. Lay's trial took months and cost taxpayers millions. In such cases, he said "it is wrong to force the victims or the government to start over from scratch."

Messrs. Feinstein and Sessions said the Justice Department supports the "principles" contained in the bill. A Justice Department spokesman wasn't immediately available to comment. Samuel Buffone, an attorney for Mr. Lay in Washington, D.C., declined to comment, saying he hadn't seen the legislation.

Mr. Lay's case not only inspired the bill but would be covered by it, as the legislation would apply to all cases or appeals pending as of July 1, 2006.

As written, the bill would end the practice of vacating convictions in such cases and establish new procedures that would allow some cases to continue. While it would forbid imposing further criminal punishment on deceased defendants, the bill would permit the government to continue to press for -- and collect -- other relief, such as restitution to victims of financial frauds. The bill sets a process to ensure that after a person convicted of a crime dies, a representative of his estate can stand in his place to challenge or appeal his conviction, and secure a lawyer. In cases where a criminal forfeiture action was filed in an effort to obtain assets linked to the defendant's crimes, the bill would give the government two years after a defendant's death to seek to recover the same assets by filing a parallel civil forfeiture lawsuit.

Lay's Death Leads Senators To Offer Restitution Measure (HC)

Houston Chronicle, November 17, 2006

WASHINGTON - In the wake of a federal judge's decision vacating the late Ken Lay's fraud and conspiracy convictions, two senators introduced a bill today to allow victims to seek restitution when a defendant convicted of a crime dies before his appeals have been completed.

The same day the Justice Department filed notice it will appeal U.S. District Judge Sim Lake's decision to clear Lay's name "in light of pending legislation."

Last month, Lake wiped out the one-time Enron Corp. chairman's convictions because Lay died before the appeals process had been completed.

In reaching that decision, Lake was following a precedent set in the New Orleans-based 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals — the same court that will hear the government's challenge.

The 5th Circuit is unlikely to side with the Justice Department because that court set the precedent Lake followed, said Brian Wice, a Houston attorney who specializes in appeals issues. But the government needs to appeal to that court before it can appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court, he said.

Earlier this month, a three-judge 5th Circuit panel already refused to order Lake to reverse his decision. The panel reiterated Lake's position that legal precedent says that "when a defendant who has been found guilty of a federal crime dies before exhaustion of his appeal, his prosecution must be abated, his conviction vacated and his indictment dismissed."

The ruling responded to an appeal of Lake's decision by an Enron shareholder.

Representatives of the Lay family couldn't be reached for comment this evening.

Today, Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., and Sen. Jeff Sessions, R-Ala., both members of the Senate Judiciary Committee, introduced legislation designed to clarify the legal procedures when a defendant dies in this way.

"We need to ensure that, in these types of cases, hard-won convictions are preserved and restitution remains available for the victims of crime," Feinstein said in a statement today.

When convicted, a criminal defendant can be ordered to pay restitution to his victims, to try to make them whole. But since Lay's conviction was vacated, his estate cannot be ordered to pay restitution.

Instead, the Justice Department was forced to file a civil suit seeking to wrest control of $12.7 million worth of assets. If the government is successful, it could then turn over some or all of those proceeds to victims of the Enron debacle.

The Justice Department proposed legislation last summer that sought to preserve such convictions after a defendant dies pending sentencing and appeal — and wanted it to be retroactive to July 1, four days before Lay died. That proposal never garnered a sponsor.

The Justice Department helped Feinstein and Sessions craft the legislation introduced Thursday.

"We share Sen. Feinstein and Sen. Sessions' commitment to do away with the harmful and unwarranted effects of the abatement doctrine on crime victims," Justice Department spokeswoman Jaclyn Lesch said.

Feinstein and Sessions' bill would stipulate that a defendant's conviction cannot be vacated just because the person has died.

DOJ_NMG_0095557

That would allow for the defendant's estate to be ordered to pay direct restitution to victims. However, the proposal would allow a representative for the estate to appeal the conviction.

The bill also would give the federal government an additional two years to file a civil complaint to try to force an estate to forfeit assets.

Whether the senators can get the legislation through in the dwindling days of a lame duck session remains uncertain.

"The time is short," said Scott Gerber, a spokesman for Feinstein. "We'll do the best we can."

If they are unsuccessful, the lawmakers plan to reintroduce the bill in the new Congress.

Chronicle reporter Tom Fowler contributed to this report.

Sessions Moves To End Precedent That Cleared Enron Founder (AP)

By Ben Evans, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 17, 2006

Republican Sen. Jeff Sessions is joining a California Democrat to try to scrap the legal precedent that allowed Enron founder Kenneth Lay's fraud conviction to be cleared from his record after he died in July.

The clearing of Lay's record has hurt prosecutors' efforts to extract $43.5 million in restitution from Lay's estate. Sessions' legislation is an attempt to address that.

Working with the Justice Department, which asked for similar legislation shortly after Lay died, Sessions of Mobile joined Democrat Dianne Feinstein of California to introduce a bill this week that would keep federal convictions in force when a defendant dies, while allowing victims to continue seeking restitution.

Courts traditionally have interpreted the law differently, erasing the convictions of defendants who die before having the chance to appeal.

The bill would make the changes retroactive to July 1 so that they would apply in the Lay case.

"When a criminal conviction involves financial restitution to the victims of the crime, or when the conviction could be used in a later civil lawsuit, those effects of the conviction should not be erased by the death of the defendant," Sessions, a former U.S. attorney, said in a release. "It is wrong to force the victims or the government to start over from scratch."

Sessions, who along with Feinstein sits on the Judiciary Committee, also cited the huge costs of lengthy criminal trials.

Lay's trial "took nearly four months and cost the taxpayers millions of dollars," he said.

Lay was convicted on May 25 on 10 counts of fraud, conspiracy and lying to banks in connection with the energy conglomerate's financial collapse, which wiped out billions of dollars in market value and pension plans. He faced the prospect of spending the rest of his life in prison but died of heart disease before being sentenced on July 5, while vacationing in Aspen, Colo.

At the request of Lay's attorneys, a federal judge erased his conviction Sept. 17, despite a request from the Justice Department to postpone the decision so Congress could consider a Justice proposal to change current law.

Legal experts said the decision to clear Lay's record was consistent with long-standing precedent because Lay had not had the opportunity to appeal.

Federal prosecutors could still win the $43.5 million they say Lay gained from Enron's fraud, but they have to do so through civil proceedings in competition with other litigants and without the benefit of a criminal conviction in hand.

Along with clarifying the law on maintaining convictions, the proposed bill would allow a representative of a deceased defendant to act on the defendant's behalf in an appeal, and it would give the government extra time to file parallel civil lawsuits to try to recover unlawfully obtained assets.

Skilling, Government Agree On $85 Million Enron Deal (HC)

Houston Chronicle, November 17, 2006

Former Enron CEO Jeff Skilling has settled the last dispute in litigation by former Enron employees seeking to recover at least some of their pensions that disappeared when the company crashed.

The ex-CEO, who is slated to begin serving more than 24 years in prison next month, has withdrawn his opposition to an $85 million settlement that plaintiffs reached with former company directors and other executives two years ago.

In exchange, plaintiffs resolved claims against Skilling — the last named defendant who hadn't settled — effectively bringing the litigation to a close.

"Yes, it's over. Our clients are thrilled," said Lynn Sarko, an attorney who represents ex-Enron employees, today. "While they are grateful that some of their retirement money was recovered, it will never make up for the destruction of their retirement nest egg."

The lawsuit, which recovered about $265 million in settlements — including the $85 million held up by a Skilling appeal — was filed on behalf of more than 20,000 employees after Enron went bankrupt in December 2001. The Labor Department later filed similar litigation, which was folded into the main lawsuit.

The Labor Department announced the agreement with Skilling today.

The $85 million settlement is derived from insurance money that covered Enron directors and other executives who served on the company's administrative committee. They, as well as Skilling, were named as defendants in the litigation.

Skilling argued that as an ex-Enron officer and director, he also was entitled to some of those insurance proceeds. He filed an appeal opposing any distribution of the funds until that question was resolved.

However, the Labor Department said today that Skilling had dropped his opposition to the settlement. Skilling also agreed to waive his right to benefits under Enron's pension plans and is permanently barred from overseeing any employee benefit plan governed by the Employee Retirement Income Security Act.

Skilling's lawyer, Daniel Petrocelli, didn't respond to a call for comment.

If U.S. District Judge Melinda Harmon approves the agreement as expected, the $85 million can be distributed to ex-Enron employees along with the other $180 million recovered, Sarko said.

Harmon has yet to determine how or when the money will be distributed.

Harmon oversees litigation filed on behalf of employees as well as shareholders who lost retirement funds or investments when the company crashed into bankruptcy nearly five years ago. The shareholder litigation has recovered more than $7 billion, but several banks remain named defendants and aim to go to trial next year.

Skilling was convicted in May of 19 counts of fraud, conspiracy, insider trading and lying to auditors for his role in leading and perpetuating fraud at the company. Last month he was sentenced to 24 years and four months in prison, and aims to appeal.

Upon being sentenced, Skilling agreed to turn over $45 million to the Justice Department in conjunction with his conviction. The money is to be added to a restitution fund related to the civil litigation on behalf of employees and shareholders.

Skilling maintains his innocence and aims to appeal. If he loses, that $45 million will be distributed to shareholders. If he wins his appeal, Skilling will get the money back.

But his agreement settling his dispute in the employee lawsuit says that he will still pay $2.5 million to ex-employees if his conviction is overturned or erased and the restitution fund is dissolved.

Skilling has been ordered to surrender to a low-security federal prison in Waseca, Minn. on Dec. 12.

Study Charts Broad Manipulation Of Options (NYT)

By Eric Dash

The New York Times, November 17, 2006

Abuses of stock option grants are perceived to have spread like a virus among high-technology companies. But a new study suggests that hundreds of old-economy companies may also have caught the backdating bug.

In a paper to be released today, researchers estimate that 590 nontechnology companies appear to have manipulated options so their chief executives received them at the lowest price of the month. That compares with 130 technology companies that appear to have backdated their chief executives' options to a monthly low during a 10-year period to the end of 2005.

Traditional manufacturing and service firms make up the bulk of publicly traded companies, so it comes as no surprise that the sheer number of manipulated grants outside the technology sector is larger.

Yet old-economy companies also appear to have made improper grants somewhat less frequently than their new-economy peers, making patterns more difficult to find. That combination, the researchers suggest, has allowed old-line companies to escape much of the scrutiny.

The study is the latest in a series of papers by academic and governance research groups that attempt to measure the extent of the backdating scandal and to explain how it spread. More than 120 companies are under investigation by the Securities and Exchange Commission. The Justice Department and Internal Revenue Service are conducting separate reviews. More than 50 executives and directors have been forced out or fired as a result.

Even as companies like UnitedHealth Group and KB Home have reported options-related problems and ousted their top executives, many observers still consider backdating a hangover from the dot-com boom.

Most companies that have come forward so far appear to be concentrated around Silicon Valley and other technology hot spots. They include a large number of software and semiconductor companies, with a big portion of their executives' total pay apparently coming from equity grants.

But the study suggests that the problem was more widespread.

Of the roughly 1,150 options grants that the researchers believe were manipulated, an estimated 950, or 80 percent, were at nontechnology companies.

"It is not the case that people should concentrate on new-economy firms," said Lucian Bebchuk, a Harvard Law School professor and director of its corporate governance program. "That is the impression that one might get from the cases that have come under scrutiny thus far."

Professor Bebchuk co-wrote the study with Yaniv Grinstein, a Cornell University professor, and Urs Peyer of the French business school Insead. It is to be posted today on the Web site of the Harvard Law School corporate governance program.

The study also questions the notion that companies backdated stock options as a tax-efficient method of compensation. Backdated gains, in this view, were simply a substitute for offering executives more cash.

The analysis found that this was not the case. "C.E.O.'s who got lucky grants also received higher levels of other forms of compensation relative to peer companies," Professor Bebchuk said.

The researchers said the study underscored the importance of having independent directors to counter the influence of the chief executive. A company that had a majority of independent directors on its board reduced the chances that it engaged in manipulation by more than a third, according to a statistical analysis in the report.

In their study, the researchers examined some 19,000 options grants at about 5,800 companies from 1996 to the end of 2005. They found evidence suggesting that nearly 12 percent, or about 720, of the companies appear to have made at least one options grant that occurred at the lowest price of the month because of manipulation. That number may expand by several hundred companies if the second- and third-lowest prices of the month are included.

Still, the new figure is significantly smaller than the estimate that more than 2,000 companies, or 29.2 percent of companies in the study, engaged in backdating to sweeten their executives' pay. That finding, based on a similar data analysis, was released this summer by Randall Herron, an Indiana University finance professor, and Erik Lie, a University of Iowa finance professor whose research is widely credited with provoking the inquiries into options grants.

The study by Professors Herron and Lie found that the abuse was more prevalent in high-technology firms, where an estimated 32 percent of unscheduled grants were backdated; at other firms, an estimated 20 percent were backdated.

Professor Bebchuk's group found a much lower level of manipulation and a narrower difference between old- and new-economy companies. In his study, the percentage of all grants that were in the month's lowest price because of manipulation was 5.7 percent for nontechnology firms, compared with 6.1 percent for the entire sample.

The discrepancy between the two studies probably results from their different starting points and approaches. Professors Herron and Lie searched for differences in backdating patterns between new- and old-economy companies by observing abnormal returns before and after an options grant date for corporate insiders. Professor Bebchuk's team focused on the grants awarded to chief executives at monthly lows, which were most likely to be manipulated, and then on the differences between technology companies and nontechnology companies.

Backdated Options Pad CEO Pay By Average Of 10% (WSJ)

By John Hechinger

DOJ_NMG_0095560

About 850 U.S. chief executives received backdated or otherwise manipulated stock option grants that boosted their annual pay, on average, by at least 10%, according to a new study.

The study, released yesterday by professors at Harvard and Cornell universities and the French business school Insead, bolsters the view of federal prosecutors who have viewed stock-option backdating as means to steal money from shareholders. Defenders of the companies who engaged in the practice have said that backdating often involved minor sums and was merely an alternative way of providing market-based pay.

The study, a paper done for the Harvard Law School Program on Corporate Governance, didn't name executives or companies that may have backdated. It relied on broad statistical analyses that identified suspiciously "lucky" patterns of options granted at low prices.

The researchers also found that executives who reaped riches from backdating options started out with reported compensation that was richer than their peers at similar companies. On top of that above-average pay, executives received an average of an extra $1.3 million to $1.7 million through each manipulated grant, the academics found.

"It's not pocket change," said Lucian Bebchuk, a professor of law, economics and finance at Harvard and one of the study's authors.

More than 130 companies are under federal investigation in the stock option timing scandal, which has claimed the jobs of more than 50 executives and directors. Five former executives face criminal charges.

A stock option gives an employee the right to buy shares of a stock in the future -- generally at its current, or strike, price. The lower the strike price, the more potentially valuable the option. Backdating the option to when the stock was trading at an unusually low price can add millions of dollars to executives' pay.

Researchers examined the timing of stock option grants from 1996 through 2005, sifting through 19,036 grants made by about 6,000 companies led by a total of 8,800 chief executives.

The professors found that 2,329, or 12%, were granted at monthly low prices -- what the professor termed "lucky" grants. Only 4% were granted at monthly highs. If options were chosen randomly, roughly 5% should have been granted at monthly lows or highs, since there are about 20 trading days in a month.

The professors determined there were more than 1,100 "lucky" grants that didn't result from random selection, but were instead likely backdated or otherwise manipulated. In all, 12% of all U.S. public firms, or 720, awarded one or more manipulated grants, the study found. The study said 850 CEOs, or about 10%, received "lucky grants" based on manipulation.

Study Hits Out At Options Practice (FT)

By Francesco Guerrera And Brooke Masters

Financial Times, November 17, 2006

The controversial practice of backdating stock options to boost executive pay went hand-in-hand with poor corporate governance practices and overbearing chief executives, according to a study published on Friday.

The research by three academics is the first to suggest a link between lax internal controls and stock options backdating. The scandal has so far engulfed more than 130 US companies in internal and regulatory probes but the study suggests that number could climb to 720.

The research also found that, contrary to a widespread perception, “old economy” companies used the practice almost as much as rivals in “new economy” sectors – a feature underlined by one of the most recent casualties of the scandal, Bruce Karatz, the ousted chief executive of the housebuilder KB Home.

The results of the study, which looked at options granted by 8,000 companies between 1996 and 2005, will undermine claims by some companies and lawyers that backdating was a widespread and legitimate way of rewarding chief executives.

“These findings are consistent with the view that grant date manipulation reflects governance problems rather than a compensation device used for valid business reasons,” conclude the authors – Harvard Law School’s Lucian Bebchuk, Yaniv Grinstein from Cornell University and Insead’s Urs Peyer.

The research counters the view that gains from backdated options were not material, or simply a tax-efficient replacement for other pay, estimating that, on average, these grants increased executives’ yearly compensation by more than 10 per cent.

By focusing on “lucky grants” – options priced at the lowest share price in a given month – the academics found that 12 per cent of companies had manipulated the timing of one or more grants.

The practice was more prevalent among companies whose boards did not have a majority of independent directors and whose chief executives had been at the helm for a long time – a sign of a link between poor corporate governance and backdating.

In total, an estimated 850 chief executives received grants that had been backdated to the lowest share price in the month to increase potential rewards, according to the study. And more than 600 chief executives were granted even more lucrative options – backdated to the lowest share price in a given quarter.

Executive Retreat Stock-Options Scandal Fugitive Puts Roots Down In Namibia (WSJ)

By Steve Stecklow

The Wall Street Journal, November 17, 2006

WINDHOEK, NAMIBIA -- Wolfgang Balzer, general manager of the Hotel Thule, now realizes there was something unusual about the Israeli family who checked in this summer for a month, identifying themselves as the Jacobs.

Saying they were planning on settling here, they didn't use credit cards and paid their bill in advance. The husband, who usually kept to himself, became extremely agitated when CNN wasn't available for a few days on their television.

"I personally thought he was a lawyer or something and he was going to work here," the hotel manager says. He learned otherwise in late September.

That's when it emerged that the husband was Jacob "Kobi" Alexander, a fugitive wanted in the U.S. on fraud charges related to stock-options backdating. The former chief executive of Comverse Technology Inc., a New York software company, had skipped out on the chance to begin talks with U.S. prosecutors that his own New York lawyers had initiated, according to a person familiar with the discussions.

He was arrested at U.S. prosecutors' request on Sept. 27 during lunch with his wife at a country club, even though Namibia has no extradition treaty with the U.S. A Namibian bank regulator had noticed large transfers to Mr. Alexander's local account and tipped off U.S. authorities. Mr. Alexander already had received a two-year work permit under his own name, even though he used an alias at the hotel. The Namibian government asked him to invest $43 million to help qualify for permanent residency.

Life on the lam has been full of bizarre twists for Mr. Alexander, a 54-year-old Israeli citizen and wealthy ex-CEO who abandoned his family's life in Manhattan for this remote, arid spot in southern Africa.

He was released from jail six days after his arrest on $1.4 million bail, a record amount in this country. Now he continues to live here, out in the open, sometimes buying ice cream in a local mall for his three children. If extradited and convicted in the U.S., he faces up to 25 years in prison. While his team of local lawyers has been fighting extradition, he appears to be trying to settle in Namibia for the long haul.

He has bought a house that backs onto a golf course, put his children into private school here, and invested in local businesses including an auto-body repair shop called Monarch Panelbeaters. One of his new business partners is a former Namibian military official linked to a scandal involving a collapsed asset-management company.

Yesterday, Mr. Alexander won at least five more months in Namibia. In a closed-door meeting, a local magistrate scheduled a three-day hearing on the extradition request to begin next April 25. "Nothing will happen until April," Johnny Truter, the Namibian government's prosecutor, said afterward.

He added that even if the ex-CEO loses the case, the appeals process could allow him to stay here for years.

Mr. Alexander, dressed for court in an open-necked blue sport shirt and dark sports jacket, declined to comment for this story. One of his attorneys, Rudi Cohrssen, said, "Things will get clearer in April."

Mr. Alexander's new life in Namibia marks one of the most unusual chapters in the stock-options backdating scandal, which has embroiled more than 130 companies, cost the jobs of more than 50 top executives and directors and led to more than $5 billion in financial restatements. Mr. Alexander is accused in a 35-count criminal indictment of engaging in a fraudulent scheme to backdate Comverse options to days when the stock was trading at low points, generating millions of dollars in extra compensation for himself and other executives.

Prosecutors say that Mr. Alexander realized $138 million from options whose grant dates were backdated. They allege he misled auditors and shareholders and used fictitious names to generate thousands of backdated options that were parked in a secret slush fund, dubbed "I.M. Fanton" (an apparent reference to "Phantom of the Opera"), and awarded to favored employees. The indictment also charges him with witness tampering by allegedly offering millions of dollars to a Comverse executive, whom people familiar with the matter have identified as former chief financial officer David Kreinberg, "to falsely take sole responsibility for the fraud scheme."

Mr. Kreinberg and Comverse's former general counsel, William Sorin, recently pleaded guilty for their roles, naming Mr. Alexander as the scheme's mastermind. The timing of Mr. Alexander's option grants was first reported by The Wall Street Journal in March, sparking investigations by the Securities and Exchange Commission and the Justice Department. Comverse announced on May 2 that Mr. Alexander had resigned as CEO amid an internal probe of backdating.

Mr. Alexander visited Windhoek, Namibia's hilly, picturesque capital, alone in early July, Mr. Truter says. He began signing documents to invest in land here and then returned to Israel, where he was vacationing with his family. The initial trip "was obviously just preparations for coming with his family," Mr. Truter said.

But Mr. Alexander's lawyers in New York also were approaching federal prosecutors. In a July 21 phone conversation, prosecutors for the Eastern District of New York in Brooklyn suggested that Mr. Alexander return to the U.S. as a show of good faith. Federal authorities agreed to meet him at John F. Kennedy International Airport in New York but not to arrest him. They offered to begin negotiations on July 31.

Mr. Alexander appeared to agree. He provided evidence that he was booked on an El Al flight that would arrive in New York on July 28. But on July 27, he flew instead from Israel to Frankfurt, and disappeared. Prosecutors now believe Mr. Alexander was deceiving his own lawyers. He also attempted to wire $12 million out of the U.S. around July 31. He had already transferred $57 million to Israel, before the U.S. froze $48 million of his assets.

Robert Morvillo, a lawyer for Mr. Alexander in New York, said attorneys had approached prosecutors "to better understand what the allegations were, and to develop a presentation or arguments that this was not an appropriate criminal case." He declined to comment on other matters, saying they were already described in government papers.

After Mr. Alexander failed to return, prosecutors filed a criminal complaint under seal, charging him and the two other former Comverse executives with fraud. They unsealed it on Aug. 9.

By then, Mr. Alexander and his family were ensconced in two adjacent, ground-floor rooms at the Hotel Thule, which from its dining room offers a dramatic view of the dry, craggy hills that surround Windhoek. With the exception of a weekend journey to a famous Namibian safari park, hotel manager Mr. Balzer says the family spent most days in the city, traveling in a chauffeured van that picked them up each morning. Mr. Alexander's wife, Hana, sometimes would ask him questions about local schools upon their return. One of the two boys often kicked a soccer ball in the parking lot, he said, and the other son and the couple's daughter played hide-and-seek.

Mr. Alexander paid in advance for the family's two, $143-a-night rooms through a local travel agent, Namibia Travel Connection, which had booked them under the name Jacobs, Mr. Balzer says. The fact that Mr. Alexander avoided using a credit card caused some complications: At one point, Mr. Balzer says, the agency said Mr. Alexander would pay his own bills going forward. Then the hotel was told one of Mr. Alexander's lawyers, Richard Metcalfe, would cover any charges. Later, the travel agency called back and said it would take care of them after all, and did.

Mr. Metcalfe didn't return phone calls seeking comment. A man and woman at the travel agency, which operates out of a private house behind a gate, declined to comment.

Mr. Balzer recalls that when CNN, the American news channel, stopped working on the hotel's television screens, "That stressed [Mr. Alexander] out completely. He was complaining about it badly." Because it was a weekend, it couldn't be fixed for a couple of days, frustrating Mr. Alexander further.

Mr. Balzer says he assumed that the hotel guest was monitoring developments of the Israeli war then being fought in Lebanon. But he now suspects Mr. Alexander had a different concern: whether U.S. authorities were closing in.

That wouldn't come for a few weeks. In the meantime, Mr. Alexander didn't waste any time establishing his family's new life in Namibia, a former German colony that later fell under the rule of South Africa. Previously known as South West Africa, it gained independence in 1990 after decades of armed struggle. A tourist destination for wildlife lovers, it recently generated headlines when actors Angelina Jolie and Brad Pitt came here for the birth of their daughter.

After visiting several private schools, the Alexanders enrolled their children in an international school. Mr. Alexander bought a 2006 Toyota Land Cruiser for $107,000, he said in a sworn affidavit filed in Namibian court. He said he paid $543,000 for a two-story, beige stucco house whose backyard faces Windhoek's only golf course and country club.

Mr. Alexander hired a full-time security guard to stand outside the front of the house, which is part of a small development of 57 homes behind a guarded, locked gate. A basketball hoop hangs over the garage, and a satellite dish sits on the roof.

On Aug. 29, court records show, the Namibian Ministry of Home Affairs and Immigration issued Mr. Alexander a two-year work permit, just a day after his lawyer, Mr. Metcalfe, filed an application. Mr. Alexander also applied for permanent residency. The ministry said in a letter it will consider the residency application provided he submits plans to transfer and invest $43 million in the country. The Namibian official who signed the letter couldn't be reached for comment.

Mr. Truter, the local prosecutor, said foreigners essentially can "buy" work permits in Namibia by promising to invest in the country. "If you have a lot of money to invest, they will give it to you," he said.

Mr. Alexander said in his affidavit last month that he already had transferred more than $17 million to banks in Namibia from Israel and had invested about $1.6 million in various land deals, including a low-income housing project on the coast.

He also has invested $843,000 in Monarch Panelbeaters, the local auto-body shop, which he said was owned by "previously disadvantaged Namibians" who were saddled with debt and cash-flow problems, according to the affidavit. He called it "an example of a successful locally owned and operated business."

Under Namibian law, foreign investors must find local partners to invest with. Mr. Alexander's partners include Brigadier Mathias Shiweda, whom he described as "a well known Namibian business personality." Mr. Shiweda, a former Namibia Defense Force official who remains in charge of a state-owned military hardware manufacturer, is well known here. He's also the subject of some controversy. Last year, he was linked to a scandal in which Namibia's Social Security Commission invested and lost $4.3 million in an asset-management company that collapsed.

According to local news accounts, at an inquiry, Lazarus Kandara, the head of the collapsed firm, named Mr. Shiweda among the shareholders, and as one of several recipients of a commission from the management company in connection with another deal. A few days later, Mr. Kandara died in what Namibian police ruled a suicide. Mr. Shiweda later testified that he received no money from the firm. He declined to comment for this story.

By late August, U.S. authorities had tracked down Mr. Alexander to Namibia. But they were in a legal bind because Namibia has no extradition treaty with the U.S. American authorities had to ask Namibia's president, Hifikepunye Pohamba, to issue a formal proclamation adding the U.S. to a list of countries that fall under the country's extradition act. Although the president issued the document on Aug. 31, it wasn't published until Sept. 27, when it took effect. "We had to lay low before they changed their law and we could arrest him," said one U.S. official.

At a bail hearing on Oct. 2., Mr. Alexander presented the sworn affidavit that challenged his arrest, saying he had acted above board, and discussed his investments in the country. "While in Namibia I have used my own name openly and publicly in all my encounters and ventures with government officials and private individuals alike," he said. "I entered Namibia openly and lawfully, and I have not in any manner tried to hide my whereabouts from anyone."

To the surprise of Namibian prosecutors, a local magistrate agreed to release Mr. Alexander on bail. The release was unusual. A German citizen living in Namibia has been fighting extradition here for four years, and has spent all of that time in jail.

Mr. Truter says Mr. Alexander offered to surrender his Israeli passport and post $700,000 bail if he was released. The government asked for double that amount, and he agreed, Mr. Truter said, adding it was a record amount for bail. Dennis Khama, a government attorney who handles extradition cases, said the government has appealed Mr. Alexander's release, although no date has been set for a hearing. "Litigation can go on and go on and go on," Mr. Khama said. "There's no way of stopping that."

Mr. Khama says the fact that Mr. Alexander isn't a U.S. citizen should have no effect on whether he ultimately is extradited, nor should his investments in Namibia. But one issue may be whether stock-option backdating is a crime in Namibia, he added, noting that hasn't yet been decided. Mr. Cohrssen, Mr. Alexander's attorney, said: "There are many arguments" Mr. Alexander's defense team can make.

The arrest of the Israeli citizen had reverberations in the country's tiny Jewish community, especially when his bail hearing was scheduled for Oct. 2 -- which happened to be Yom Kippur, the holiest day in the Jewish calendar. Zvi Gorelick, a retired Namibian-born entrepreneur who offers kosher safari tours and performs some rabbinical functions, said he received calls from Namibia and Israel asking him to help Mr. Alexander get out of jail.

Mr. Gorelick said he quickly began "thinking like a Jew: I must get him some kosher food." But he learned that Mrs. Alexander was bringing her husband food in jail.

He said the Jewish community was divided over the fate of Mr. Alexander, though most have never met him. "On one hand you feel, 'Let's give the guy a break. He's going to bring money into the economy.' But on the other hand, you say, 'We don't need another dishonest person. There's enough dishonest people in the country,'" he said. He added that Mr. Alexander must be presumed innocent.

At the Windhoek Country Club Resort, some guests have also gotten wrapped up in Mr. Alexander's case. Sam Shapiro, owner of a fish company called Mazel Dagim in Monsey, N.Y., shook his head over Mr. Alexander's bid to stay in Namibia. "If you're asking me, it's the wrong choice to come here," he said, adding, "It's not New York, where there are movies, you can go to concerts."

Ex-Adelphia Officer Gets Lifetime Ban (WSJ/AP)

The Wall Street Journal, November 17, 2006

NEW YORK -- A federal judge barred a former Adelphia Communications Corp. executive from ever serving again as an officer or director of a publicly traded company.

Ruling in a case brought by the Securities and Exchange Commission, the judge said former Adelphia vice president Michael C. Mulcahey had helped the former cable-television giant's founding family engage in a fraud that contributed to the company's 2002 collapse.

Mr. Mulcahey was acquitted of criminal fraud charges in 2004, but the SEC sought regulatory sanctions for his conduct.

U.S. District Judge Kevin Castel conducted a trial in July and ruled yesterday that although Mr. Mulcahey wasn't an "architect" of fraud at Adelphia he had "egregiously" violated "numerous securities laws."

The judge also ruled, however, that Mr. Mulcahey hadn't been personally enriched by fraud at the company. He declined to order any fines against Mr. Mulcahey, who made $140,000 in his best year with Adelphia, but banned him from receiving "anything of value" in the future from the family of the company's founder, John Rigas, who was convicted along with a son on fraud charges.

Mr. Mulcahey's attorney, Mark J. Mahoney, said he was "grateful" the judge decided not to impose economic sanctions but intended to appeal the lifetime ban.

Adelphia was the country's fifth-largest cable television company before it disclosed that its executives had improperly concealed $2.3 billion in debt. Its remaining assets were bought last year by Comcast Corp. and Time Warner Cable.

As Scandal Unfolded, H.P.'s Profits Surged Ahead (NYT)

By Damon Darlin

The New York Times, November 17, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO, Nov. 16 — In a period punctuated by distracting revelations of company spying, Hewlett-Packard nevertheless sharply increased its revenue and made more profit from the revenue.

Net income for its fourth quarter, which ended Oct. 31, rose to $1.7 billion, or 60 cents a share, from $416 million, or 14 cents a share, a year ago, which included $1.57 billion in restructuring charges. After adjusting for the manner in which the charges are accounted for, net income increased 27 percent. Revenue increased 7 percent, to $24.6 billion.

With $91.7 billion in revenue for the year, a 6 percent increase over 2005, the company overtook I.B.M. as the world's largest technology company. (The consensus of analysts puts I.B.M.'s 2006 revenue at $90.72 billion.) H.P. has also overtaken Dell as the world's largest PC vendor mostly because sales of its notebook computers grew 24 percent.

"We certainly aren't taking any victory laps, but we are pleased with the progress," the chairman and chief executive, Mark V. Hurd, said.

Analysts were pleased with revenue growth in the quarter, but they were focused on how the company had made more money on each dollar of revenue across all but one line of business. For example, revenue from personal computers grew 10 percent to $7.8 billion while operating profit grew 68 percent to $336 million, largely because of the strength in sales of notebook computers. While selling PCs remained a low margin business, operating profit margin increased to 4.3 percent of revenue from 2.8 percent a year earlier.

The story was similar in the company's printer business. Operating profit grew 22 percent to $1.1 billion as operating margins increased to 14.8 percent from 13.2 percent. In software, operating margins were 17.2 percent up from 9.2 percent a year ago. The company's $4.7 billion services business, which had been its weakest link, saw operating profit jump 56.8 percent as margins rose to 12.4 percent from 9 percent.

The company's top executives were distracted through much of the quarter by revelations of spying operations conducted against several directors and journalists. The imbroglio led to the resignation of Patricia C. Dunn, the company's chairwoman, who this week pleaded not guilty to four felony charges. A former company lawyer and its director of ethics, Kevin Hunsaker, also faces charges. He has pleaded not guilty. Three contractors were also charged and have also pleaded not guilty.

The fallout from the affair has not ended. The company disclosed that the Securities and Exchange Commission has opened an investigation of the handling of disclosures of board information. It also said the Federal Communications Commission has requested information on the company's spying, which included using false pretenses to obtain private phone records. The California attorney general is expected to sue Hewlett-Packard in civil court. In addition, the United States attorney in Northern California continues his investigation.

The strong profit is one reason that investors snoozed through a month of reports of the illegal and unethical behavior by company lawyers, investigators and private detectives.

H.P. shares rose as high as $40.51 in after-hours trading and closing at $40.13 in regular trading.

The company's executives said that the improvement in profit margins showed that Mr. Hurd's plan to cut costs and free up cash to invest in growth opportunities is starting to work. "Restructuring has done wonders for profitability and it will give them room to strengthen market share gains in key areas," said William C. Shope, a securities analyst with J. P. Morgan. "The challenge will be to sustain revenue growth."

CRIMINAL LAW:

U.S., Canada To Share Forensics Data (AP)

AP, November 17, 2006

ASHEVILLE, N.C. - U.S. and Canadian law enforcement officials agreed Thursday to begin sharing forensics data from crimes scenes in both countries.

A memorandum of understanding signed by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Canadian Minister of Public Safety Stockwell Day marks the first in which the United States has agreed to immediate sharing of crime-scene information with a foreign government.

"And while terrorism is a primary concern for all of us, it is not our only job," Gonzales said. "Criminals are constantly searching for new ways to prey upon our communities. To stop them, we must maintain the same vigilance we show against terrorists."

Before Thursday's action, the two countries exchanged only a limited amount of ballistics information.

Under the agreement, each country will be able to view real-time forensics data, allowing bullets and firearms to be linked across crime scenes in both countries, said Michael Sullivan, acting director of the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives.

Canada has strict laws governing handgun sales, with the result that the majority of handguns used to commit crimes in Canada are purchased in the United States, Sullivan said.

The signing took place as part of the ninth annual United States-Canada Cross-Border Crime Forum, which is held at the historic Biltmore Estate in western North Carolina. The two-day meeting brought together hundreds of law-enforcement officers from the two countries.

Also present for the signing was U.S. Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, who praised the agreement as an opportunity to stop crime at the border and improve systems that attempt to keep potential terrorists from entering both countries.

Attorney General, Other Officials Discuss U.S./Canada Border Issues Here (ASHCT)

By Mark Barrett, STAFF WRITER

Asheville (NC) Citizen-Times, November 17, 2006

ASHEVILLE – U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, Secretary of Homeland Security Michael Chertoff and other government officials from the United States and Canada are on the Biltmore Estate today for a meeting on fighting crime along the two countries' border.

Canadian Minister of Justice Vic Toews and Stockwell Day, Canada's minister of public safety and emergency preparedness are also scheduled to attend.

Approximately 130 people are attending the forum, including Canadian and U.S. officials and the U.S. Attorneys General from all the border states with Canada.

Biltmore Estate spokesperson Elizabeth Sims said a past visit to the estate by Gonzales' wife inspired forum organizers to choose Biltmore for their meeting.

"Mrs. Gonzales visited the property a couple of years ago and stayed at the inn and she just really liked the Biltmore Estate," Sims said. "So when they began looking for a location for this meeting, they thought we were a great place."

Gun Data Pact With U.S. (CP)

Canadian Press, November 17, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Canada and the United States signed a deal yesterday to share more information quickly on guns, bullets and cartridges related to crime scenes.

The agreement will enable police on both sides of the border to compare evidence electronically and instantaneously instead of exchanging it manually on a case-by-case basis.

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales also emphasized co-operative steps to combat the illegal flow of U.S. firearms north of the border, including a focus on the rise of gun-related violence in the Toronto area.

Canada has long complained about the weapons, particularly handguns, smuggled in from the United States.

Abramoff Reports To Prison; Officials Focus On Reid, Others (ABC)

By

ABC News, November 17, 2006

As convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff reported to federal prison today, a source close to the investigation surrounding his activities told ABC News that Sen. Harry Reid (D-Nev.) was one of the members of Congress Abramoff had allegedly implicated in his cooperation with federal prosecutors.

A spokesperson for Reid, elected yesterday as the Senate Majority Leader, said the senator had done nothing illegal or unethical.

"We have no idea what Abramoff is telling prosecutors to save his skin, but I do know that these kind of old allegations are completely ridiculous and untrue," Sen. Reid's spokesman Jim Manley told ABC News.

DOJ_NMG_0095567

A source close to the investigation says Abramoff told prosecutors that more than $30,000 in campaign contributions to Reid from Abramoff's clients "were no accident and were in fact requested by Reid."

Abramoff has reportedly claimed the Nevada senator agreed to help him on matters related to Indian gambling.

The Associated Press reported earlier this year that Reid wrote at least four letters helpful to the tribes that had contributed money to his campaign.

Reid has denied there was any connection between the letters and the contributions and has said he is a longtime opponent of certain kinds of Indian reservation gambling.

The AP reported that Reid acknowledged "routine contacts" with Abramoff's lobbying partners and intervening to block rival tribal casinos.

The AP also reported that Abramoff's billing records showed extensive contact with Reid's office over a three-year period in which Reid collected more than $68,000 from Abramoff's firm, partners and clients.

Prosecutors have said that Abramoff's cooperation is essential to the corruption investigation, but, so far, they have brought only one prosecution against a member of Congress connected to Abramoff, Republican Bob Ney of Ohio, who resigned.

The source said prosecutors do not intend to rely solely on Abramoff's account of events, and his allegations against Reid and others will not necessarily result in criminal charges.

Sources close to the federal investigation say Abramoff has offered testimony about his contacts with "six to eight seriously corrupt Democratic senators" and an ever larger number of Republican members of Congress.

In addition to Reid, the sources say Abramoff has been most closely questioned about his contacts with Sen. Conrad Burns (R-Mont.), who was defeated in last week's election.

"Being defeated may have been one of the best things that ever happened to Burns," said a source close to the investigation. "There is much more interest in members of Congress who are still in office," the source said.

Burns, who received more than $150,000 in Abramoff-connected campaign contributions, has strongly denied any wrongdoing and returned the money.

Sen. Reid has been an outspoken critic of the connections between Abramoff and Republican legislators.

In a speech earlier this year, Sen. Reid described it as "a program where the lobbyists paid and the Republican members of Congress played."

The Justice Department said it would have no comment on the ongoing Abramoff investigation.

Texas Appeals Court Takes Bush To Task For Stepping In For Foreign-born Death Row Inmate (AP)

By Michael Graczyk, Associated Press

AP, November 17, 2006

HOUSTON – A state appeals court chastised President Bush for intervening in the case of a condemned killer born in Mexico, one of several dozen cases in which Bush ordered new hearings amid international complaints.

The Texas Court of Criminal Appeals on Wednesday rejected the argument from Jose Ernesto Medellin that he was denied legal help he should have received under international treaties.

Medellin, who spent most of his life in Texas, was sentenced in 1994 to die for the rapes and killings of two teenage girls.

“We hold that the President has exceeded his constitutional authority by intruding into the independent powers of the judiciary,” the court said in a 64-page ruling.

Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said the department was reviewing the ruling and considering its options.

Medellin was supported in his appeal by dozens of countries, legal groups and human rights organizations, as well as former American diplomats and the European Union. Much of the international community is opposed to capital punishment and the execution of Mexican nationals in Texas, the nation's most active death penalty state, is a particularly touchy point.

At issue overall was how much weight U.S. courts should give to decisions of the International Court of Justice in The Hague, which ruled the convictions of Medellin and 50 other Mexican-born prisoners violated the 1963 Vienna Convention. The pact requires consular access for Americans detained abroad and foreigners arrested in the United States.

In February 2005, Bush unexpectedly ordered new state court hearings for all 51 prisoners. The Texas court said Wednesday neither the Constitution nor any act of Congress gives the president the power to issue such an order.

The decision means Medellin, 31, is not entitled to additional review of his international rights claim.

Last year, the Supreme Court rejected Medellin's case and those of the 50 other Mexican nationals on death row in the United States, citing the presidential order, and sent them to their respective state courts for review. That ruling avoided the dispute over whether international law is binding on American courts.

In their arguments to the Supreme Court, Medellin's attorneys said his court-appointed trial lawyer was suspended from practicing law for ethics violations during the case, and he failed to call any witnesses during the guilt phase of the trial. Lawyers for Mexico said the country would have made sure Medellin had a competent lawyer had it known about the trial.

Medellin, 18 at the time, was one of six members of a fledgling Houston street gang convicted in the slayings of Jennifer Ertman, 14, and Elizabeth Pena, 16. The pair had been tortured, raped and strangled.

One of Medellin's companions, Derrick Sean O'Brien, also 18 at the time of the slayings, was executed earlier this year. In a confession, O'Brien said Medellin was at one end of a belt being pulled around Ertman's neck as he yanked on the other.

Two other gang members had their death sentences commuted to life in prison when the Supreme Court last year barred executions for those who were 17 at the time of their crimes. The man authorities call the gang's ringleader remains on death row without an execution date.

The sixth person convicted was Medellin's brother, Vernancio, who was 14 at the time and received a 40-year prison term.

Lawrence Death Sentence Set Aside (WBNS)

By Lindsey Seavert & Penny Moore

WBNS-TV, CBS 10, Columbus, OH, November 17, 2006

A jury found Daryl Lawrence guilty of murdering a Columbus police officer.

But Thursday, a judge put Lawrence's death sentence on hold, taking the convicted killer off Ohio's Death Row for now.

Lawrence shot Officer Brian Hurst during a bank robbery committed January 6, 2005. That conviction stands. The dispute is over the jury's sentence recommendations on two separate murder counts.

One called for giving Lawrence the death penalty. The other recommends a life sentence.

Lawrence's lawyers argued the decision was inconsistent. On Thursday, a federal judge announced he agreed. Friends of Hurst, like his best friend Donnie Oliveiro, see the development as a bump in the road on the way to attaining justice.

"I've prepared myself for the last two years for this day to come," Oliveiro said.

Federal judge Gregory Frost issued a written decision reading the jury's sentencing on Lawrence's murder verdicts were inconsistent -- giving life on one charge and then death on another. The judge wrote: "The court has no choice but to set aside the death sentence and order a new sentencing hearing."

The judge added, "The discrepencies point to irrational arbitrary juror conduct."

That was the exact argument from Lawrence's legal team.

"What we were trying to achieve was to restore some logic to an illogical verdict," said defense attorney Kort Gatterdam.

Gatterdam argues the appropriate remedy for Lawrence is life sentences on both counts.

"There's no way for a jury to weigh the same mitigating factors and say he deserves life and go on and say he deserves death. It makes no sense," Gatterdam said.

But Oliveiro still believes in the system, and said the death penalty is appropriate punishment for the man who killed his closest friend.

"Unfortunately for us, Bryan wasn't given the opportunity to have rights and have decisions made and appeals on whether he should die that day," Oliveiro remarked.

DOJ_NMG_0095569

Franklin County Prosecutor Ron O'Brien told 10TV Thursday that he will meet with Justice Department officials to decide the next step. O'Brien said they will likely appeal this decision to the Federal Appeals Court.

Another option O'Brien mentioned is to follow the judge's ruling and allow a new federal jury to re-sentence Lawrence.

FDLE Launches Criminal Investigation Into Foley's Communications With Boys (FLSUNSEN)

By By Nancy L. Othón, South Florida Sun-sentinel

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, November 17, 2006

WEST PALM BEACH -- Not seen publicly since resigning from Congress in a national scandal, Mark Foley emerged on Thursday in Palm Beach County after the death of his father.

The former Congressman, who left his post as a U.S. representative in September after the disclosure that he had sent sexually explicit emails to Congressional pages, is in town for Ed Foley's funeral. Ed Foley, 85, died Tuesday.

Foley's emergence comes as the Florida Department of Law Enforcement indicated it has shifted from a preliminary inquiry to a "full-fledged criminal investigation" regarding Foley.

As the scandal unfolded and more details were made public concerning Foley's communications with teenage boys, the U.S. Justice Department and FDLE indicated they were launching inquiries.

"We found that there might be criminal violations that would warrant a full investigation," said FDLE spokeswoman Kristen Perezluha, adding that the agency also is assisting the FBI. "We don't know, but that's what we're going to look into."

Wearing a red polo shirt, Foley was seen with his attorney David Roth at the Palm Beach home of his friend Layne Nisenbaum on Thursday and later spent time at Roth's office, according to WPTV-Ch. 5. Nisenbaum has a Palm Beach dermatology practice.

It's unclear whether Foley will be at today's visitation at Quattlebaum Funeral Home or Saturday's funeral Mass at Mary Immaculate Catholic Church.

His attorney, David Roth issued a brief statement Thursday on behalf of Foley and his family asking for privacy. Roth could not be reached for comment beyond the press release.

Scott Ondich, funeral director at Quattlebaum Funeral Home, acknowledged there may be speculation about Foley's presence during services.

"This is about Ed Foley, not Mark Foley, and hopefully that's how it stays," Ondich said.

Foley recently underwent treatment for alcohol addiction in an Arizona rehabilitation facility. He previously announced, through his attorneys, that he is gay and that a priest molested him when Foley was a teen.

WPTV-Ch. 5 and Amie Parnes of Scripps Treasure Coast Newspapers contributed to this report.

Judge Stays Ex-procurement Chief's Sentence (GOVEXEC)

By Kimberly Palmer

Government Executive, November 17, 2006

In an unexpected move, a judge granted a request Thursday from David Safavian, the former head of the Office of Management and Budget's procurement policy shop, for a stay of his prison sentence, pending an appeal of his June conviction of obstructing justice and making false statements.

Safavian filed an appeal in September challenging his conviction on four counts of making false statements to General Services Administration employees and obstructing an investigation by GSA's inspector general. The charges stem from Safavian's relationship with lobbyist Jack Abramoff while serving as chief of staff at GSA, and focused on a Scotland golf trip the men took together, along with other officials, in 2002.

Appeals can take several years, so Safavian's sentence of 18 months -- if upheld -- will not begin until after that ruling.

In his opinion granting the request, U.S. District Judge Paul Friedman cited the section of U.S. Code that says that if a person is not likely to flee, and the appeal raises a substantial question of law likely to result in a reversal, new trial or different sentence, then the judge can grant a request for release on bond.

Safavian's lawyer, Barbara "Biz" Van Gelder, raised numerous legal issues before, during and after the trial, including questions about the admission of controversial e-mails between Safavian and Abramoff as evidence.

Friedman noted in his opinion that if one or more of the legal questions raised are decided in Safavian's favor, then a new trial is likely.

Justice Department prosecutor Peter Zeidenberg declined to comment. In a filing, prosecutors agreed that Safavian was not at risk of fleeing.

Feds Looking At Cleveland Housing Agency's Land Purchase (AP)

AP, November 17, 2006

CLEVELAND - Federal prosecutors are investigating the $150,000-an-acre purchase of inner-city land by the city's public housing agency.

U.S. Attorney Greg White said Wednesday that his office and FBI agents had begun a preliminary investigation of the purchase by the Cuyahoga Metropolitan Housing Authority.

White confirmed the investigation one day after Todd Davis, a developer whose company sold the land to the agency, met with federal investigators. Davis' lawyer said he requested the meeting after recent stories in The Plain Dealer about the deal.

"Mr. Davis and his companies have been transparent about their efforts during the seven years they worked on the project and have nothing to hide about the work they did turning this toxic property into a neighborhood asset," attorney John McCaffrey told the paper in an e-mail.

The agency's executive director, George Phillips, said through a spokeswoman that the agency would cooperate with any investigation.

Last month, the newspaper reported that a Davis company worked with officials to land $4.7 million in public funds to clean up and redevelop roughly 25 acres of contaminated industrial land in Cleveland. Davis' original plan was for an industrial park.

But with the approval of the agency and Cleveland officials, Davis' company instead sold the site to the housing authority for its new offices.

Northwestern Pa. Couple Wants $350,000 Reward In Trooper Shooting (NSDY/AP)

By Dan Nephin, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, November 17, 2006

PITTSBURGH -- A couple filed a lawsuit to claim a $350,000 reward offered for Ralph "Bucky" Phillips, a former fugitive who is accused of shooting a New York state trooper and suspected of shooting two others.

Phillips was captured Sept. 8 in Akeley, Pa., just south of the New York state line.

Jack and Gloria Young, of Warren, filed a federal lawsuit in Erie on Wednesday. The couple called Warren city police shortly before midnight on Sept. 7 after seeing a suspicious person near their property, a tip they say led directly to the capture of Phillips.

"But for my clients' phone call, (police) still would not have found Bucky, or at least not found him that night," Robert C. Greene, an attorney for the Youngs, said Thursday.

"There's little if any question that it was Bucky Phillips" that the Youngs saw, said Elliot J. Segel, another attorney for the couple.

The couple is suing the Police Benevolent Association of the New York State Troopers Inc., which they say is wrongly withholding the reward.

Greene said he sent a letter by regular and certified mail to the union on Sept. 14, but has heard nothing.

Dan De Federicis, president of the union, said its attorneys talked with the Youngs before the suit was filed. "We haven't said no. We're going slow here," he said.

"There's not a clear line. They saw a prowler. It's just not crystal clear," he said.

The union was working with the FBI on the reward, he said. The $350,000 includes $25,000 from the union, plus money from other groups.

The FBI put up an additional $100,000 reward. The lawsuit does not address that reward, but Greene said the couple is considering suing the FBI also.

Phillips is charged with attempted murder in the shooting of Trooper Sean Brown near Elmira, N.Y., in June, and authorities say he is suspected of shooting Troopers Donald Baker Jr. and Joseph Longobardo on Aug. 31 in western New York, near the Pennsylvania border. Longobardo died three days later. Baker is recovering.

Phillips surrendered five months and one week after escaping from a New York jail. The manhunt was one of the largest in New York state history.

Reputed Mob Figure Charged In Drug Case (PHI)

By George Anastasia

The Philadelphia Inquirer, November 17, 2006

Reputed mob associate Damion Canalichio was released on $75,000 bond yesterday after his arrest earlier this week on two-year-old drug-dealing charges.

Canalichio, 37, is the second high-profile mob figure to be arrested in the last month in what some law enforcement sources say is part of a concerted federal push against alleged South Philadelphia mob boss Joseph Ligambi.

Mob enforcer Vincent "Big Vince" Filipelli was jailed three weeks ago on gambling and extortion charges.

Canalichio, who was arrested at his South Jersey home Wednesday, was charged with cocaine trafficking. He pleaded not guilty yesterday during a brief hearing before U.S. Magistrate Judge Linda Caracappa in federal court in Philadelphia.

Caracappa ordered Canalichio released on a bond secured by the deed to his home on Ganttown Road in the Turnersville section of Washington Township. He was also ordered to wear an electronic monitor and was placed on limited house arrest.

Canalichio and Christopher Kerr were charged in a seven-count federal indictment unsealed Wednesday. Kerr is scheduled to appear at an arraignment and bail hearing today.

According to the indictment, Canalichio set up three drug deals in South Philadelphia in June 2004. In each, Kerr supplied about four ounces of cocaine to a buyer who was cooperating with federal investigators.

The fact that authorities waited more than two years to bring charges in the case has fueled speculation that Canalichio is a target in a broader probe.

His attorney, Joseph Santaguida, said yesterday that he originally thought his client was going to be arrested on illegal-gambling charges. In June, the FBI raided Canalichio's home and an apartment on Snyder Avenue out of which he and Kerr allegedly operated.

No drugs were found, but authorities reportedly seized records and documents tied to a gambling operation. According to two sources familiar with the case, one of the items seized at the Ganttown Road home was a book labeled "Daddy's book... do not open." Inside, authorities said, were names and dollar amounts that investigators believe was a list of gamblers and the amounts they owed or were owed.

Canalichio, a onetime close associate of jailed mob leader Steven Mazzone, has two prior convictions. He was sentenced to 27 months in prison after pleading guilty to a federal cocaine-distribution charge in 1998. Three years later, he pleaded guilty to receiving stolen property and was sentenced to three years' probation.

Since Mazzone's arrest in 2000, Canalichio has been identified by federal and local investigators as a key player in the Ligambi organization.

Law enforcement sources say Canalichio's arrest is one piece of a broader probe into the crime family. That investigation is focusing on gambling, extortion, loan-sharking and three unsolved murders: the November 2003 shooting of John "Johnny Gongs" Casasanto, the January 2002 ambush of Raymond "Long John" Martorano, and the October 1999 slaying of Ron Turchi.

Like the charges against Canalichio yesterday, the arrest of Filipelli last month raised more questions than it has answered. The bulky former professional body-builder was charged with using threats of violence to collect debts for a mob bookmaking operation.

The operation was reportedly run by a South Philadelphia gambler now living in the Cherry Hill area. No one else has been charged in the case, but the bookmaker is believed to have ties to the Ligambi organization.

Mob Killer Gets Parole For Christmas (BOSH)

By Michele McPhee, Boston Herald Police Bureau Chief

Boston Herald, November 17, 2006

Vincent Federico - the convicted killer who became a made man in the Mafia while on a weekend prison furlough in a ceremony that was bugged by the FBI - will be paroled for Christmas after he disavowed any mob ties, the Herald has learned.

Federico, now 46, is a second-degree lifer at MCI-Norfolk in connection with the murder of a Cambridge man, Robert McFarlane, who was hit by five bullets as he helped a friend move out of a North End apartment above Federico's in 1977.

Federico had argued with the victim for no apparent reason before shooting him five times on Hanover Street, according to the parole decision. Federico is scheduled for release Dec. 15.

While imprisoned, Federico was granted a furlough, a weekend pass from prison that allowed him to become one of four men to be baptized into the Providence-based Patriarca crime family at a ceremony held in the basement of Federico's sister's Medford home on Oct. 29, 1989.

During the ceremony, which was overseen by reputed boss Raymond "Junior" Patriarca, the inductees pricked their trigger fingers, drew blood and burned a holy card of the crime family's patron saint while vowing: "As burns this saint so will burn my soul. I enter alive into this organization and leave it dead."

The baptism was secretly audiotaped by disgraced FBI head John Connolly, now facing the death penalty in Miami on murder conspiracy charges.

The FBI bug in the Medford basement was long considered the most important incursion ever by law enforcement into the innermost sanctums of organized crime, and the tapes helped bring down the Patriarca family.

Federico's pledge to protect mobsters was a major concern to the parole board, according to the decision.

"A focal point of deliberations during the past decade is Mr. Federicos much-publicized conduct in 1989, while incarcerated, with organized crime," the decision reads. "In a letter dated 2005, Mr. Federico expresses his regret and remorse of becoming involved with persons associated with organized crime."

When writing his letter, Federico apparently forgot the words of Biagio DiGiacomo, who baptized him and three other mobsters in 1989: "We get in alive in this organization and the only way we're going to get out is dead."

Authorities Confirm Investigation Into Dead Officer's Past (KTVU)

KTVU-TV, November 17, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO -- Federal authorities confirmed Thursday an investigation into the past actions of San Francisco police Officer Donald Ramirez, who died of an apparent suicide last month in a Cambodian jail cell where he was being held for sex crimes.

The death of Officer Donald Ramirez, 50, has some in and around the Police Department calling for a renewed investigation into whether he was traveling for years to Southeast Asia for sexual tourism -- a name given to the crime of traveling overseas to solicit children for sex.

On the evening of Oct. 31, police Sgt. Neville Gittens confirmed that Ramirez, a 25-year veteran of the force, had killed himself days earlier in a jail cell in Phnom Penh, Cambodia. Local authorities had apparently arrested Ramirez for sexual activity with a 14-year girl.

A spokeswoman for Immigration and Customs Enforcement said Thursday that Ramirez had been under investigation since 2001 when the San Francisco Police Department reported his suspicious travels.

According to Virginia Kice, immigration officials searched Ramirez as he came into the country several times but they never found any evidence of a crime.

"We have received several new leads and we will pursue those vigorously," Kice said.

Akha human rights activist Matthew McDaniel says he told an FBI agent that Ramirez "… had a real appetite for underage girls" when the agent contacted him a decade ago in Burma. McDaniel became aware of Ramirez and his habits when the officer frequented the village of Chiang Rei on the Thai-Burmese border when the activist lived there in the mid-1990s.

DOJ_NMG_0095573

And McDaniel and sources in the police department told KTVU reporter Rita Williams that other officers sometimes accompanied Ramirez on his extended visits and returned to work to brag about it.

Thursday, the mayor reacted by saying that there will be an internal investigation in the police department to see who knew what and when.

"Look, we take this seriously. I take this seriously," said Mayor Newsom. "We're going to do what's appropriate."

Police Chief Heather Fong also addressed questions about the renewed investigation into Ramirez's past and whether anyone in the department knew whether or not he traveled to Southeast Asia for sexual tourism.

"As the federal investigation moves forward, and there's information, the department will take any necessary steps," Fong said. "If people had factual information then that is a problem. We are law enforcement officers who are sworn to protect the public and to enforce the law, so if someone is aware of criminal activity and they choose not to do anything about it, that is a problem."

Police commissioner Joe Veronese said last week of the investigation that "there was no greater issue in the department than this." The police commission, however, has yet to announce if it will take up the issue.

Other police organizations are staying away from any involvement in the incident.

"Whatever he does in his off-duty time is his matter," Police Officers Association Vice President Kevin Martin said. "This is not a POA issue."

FEDERAL AUTHORITIES INVESTIGATE DEAD SF OFFICER'S PAST (BAYCNW)

Fired Banker Held Without Bond In $29 Million Embezzlement (ABJ)

Akron Beacon Journal, November 17, 2006

CLEVELAND - A former KeyBank vice president accused of embezzling $29 million is a risk to flee and must be jailed to await his trial, a federal magistrate ruled Thursday in denying bond for the suspect.

Magistrate Judge Patricia A. Hemann said the overseas travels of David F. Verhotz, 56, of Cleveland, likely gave him contacts that would be useful if he fled. In addition, she noted that more than $8 million is still missing.

Verhotz was arrested Saturday at Cleveland Hopkins International Airport after getting off a flight from Dallas. He was a senior vice president and director of the international division of Cleveland-based KeyBank.

An affidavit filed by the FBI said Verhotz took out loans in the names of three European banks and put the money in his accounts.

The bank has fired Verhotz.

Comal Woman Admits Guilt In Bank Fraud (SAEN)

By Guillermo Contreras, Express-News Staff

San Antonio Express-News, November 17, 2006

Nancy Lynn Limmer has been a New Braunfels councilwoman and bank branch manager, but on Thursday she became a federal felon.

In a federal court hearing in San Antonio, Limmer, 44, admitted that she defrauded more than $161,000 from the First Commercial Bank in New Braunfels, where she'd worked for 17 years.

Accompanied by her husband, Limmer quietly answered questions from U.S. Magistrate Judge Nancy Nowak and pleaded guilty to one count of bank fraud. She admitted misappropriating money from customers' accounts at the branch she headed in New Braunfels between April 2002 and August 2005.

Her crime was discovered last year after customers reported irregularities in their accounts to the Seguin-based bank, officials have said.

Limmer left the bank at the same time she quit the New Braunfels City Council, in July 2005, just two months after being elected.

"She obviously recognizes that she made a tremendous error," her lawyer, Van Hilley, said after the hearing. "She's done everything she can to rectify it."

That includes cooperating with the FBI and striking a plea deal before Assistant U.S. Attorney Tom McHugh presented the case to a grand jury.

Hilley told the judge Limmer's conduct has "weighed heavily on her" in the Comal County community, where her husband works as a deputy sheriff.

Hilley said Limmer acted alone, and her husband was unaware of her illegal acts.

"He was polygraphed and completely exonerated," Hilley said. "It was a unilateral action on her part."

The charge carries a maximum penalty of 30 years in prison, but because of Limmer's quick plea, she will win points toward her sentencing.

Hilley estimated she could face a sentence of about 30 months.

Sentencing was scheduled for Feb. 8 before U.S. District Judge Orlando Garcia. gcontreras@express-news.net

Adviser's Fraud Spree Ends With Guilty Pleas (HARTC)

By Kenneth R. Gosselin, Courant Staff Writer

The Hartford Courant, November 17, 2006

Avon investment adviser David M. Faubert lived the high life for five years, taking lavish vacations, buying expensive cars and developing a love for the Foxwoods and Mohegan Sun casinos.

But that lifestyle costs money. And as Faubert racked up $1 million in gambling losses and became a heavy cocaine user, he found a new source of financing: more than $4.5 million of his clients' money.

Faubert, 50, of Simsbury, pleaded guilty in U.S. District Court in New Haven to 10 counts of mail fraud, one count of embezzlement from an employee benefit plan and four counts of filing false tax returns, all between 2000 and 2005.

Tuesday's plea agreement in a criminal case against Faubert is the most recent development in a case that started 18 months ago. In early 2005, federal and state securities regulators filed lawsuits accusing Faubert of defrauding clients, some of them elderly and living in Greater Hartford.

It is unclear whether the 21 clients caught in the deception Faubert devised will recoup their money. Securities regulators in Connecticut said Tuesday they are pursuing that course, but declined to comment further.

Faubert's attorney, Hubert Santos, couldn't be reached for comment on Tuesday. Faubert is free on bail of $25,000.

According to court documents, Faubert persuaded his victims to transfer money from mutual funds and variable annuities. He told them he would invest their money in "fixed accounts" with a guaranteed return of 8 percent.

But those accounts did not exist, and Faubert diverted the money into business and personal accounts for his own use, the documents said.

Faubert, who owned Faubert Financial Group Inc., perpetrated the fraud by mailing false monthly financial statements with the "representation that certain monies were earning the promised return," according to the documents.

The documents paint a portrait of a life spinning out of control. In 2001, Faubert began to frequent Foxwoods, and then Mohegan Sun. He played the slot machines and traveled to the casino several times a week for "as much as three to four hours at a time,"the documents said. Faubert told law enforcement authorities that he lost more than $1 million between 2000 and April 2005.

Faubert told authorities that he began using cocaine in 2003 and became a "heavy user" a year later. He said he has been "addressing" his cocaine "problem" since March 2005.

Faubert also embezzled from his company's retirement plan and filed false income tax returns for 2000 through 2003, court documents said.

The Securities and Exchange Commission wrapped up its civil case last year. Faubert was ordered to pay $3.8 million to defrauded clients and $3.7 million in fines. But an SEC official in Boston said Tuesday that no payments have been made.

Faubert faces up to 20 years in prison and a fine of $250,000 on each of the mail fraud counts, five years and a $250,000 fine on the embezzlement count, and three years and a $100,000 fine on each charge of filing false tax returns.

Sentencing guidelines in the plea agreement call for up to eight years in prison and as much as $125,000 in fines. The judge does not have to adhere to those guidelines. Sentencing is set for Jan. 31.

Avon Broker Admits Stealing More Than $4 Million From Investors (NSDY)

Long Island Newsday, November 17, 2006

NEW HAVEN, Conn. -- The owner of an Avon firm admitted Tuesday to using more than $4 million stolen from investors for gambling, lavish vacations and expensive cars, federal authorities said.

David M. Faubert, 50, of Simsbury, pleaded guilty in U.S. District Court in New Haven to 10 counts of mail fraud, one count of embezzlement from an employee benefit plan and four counts of filing false tax returns.

Faubert, owner of Faubert Investment Group, Inc., provided insurance and other financial services to about 225 clients. Faubert told clients that he would guarantee them an 8 percent rate of return if the clients invested money in a fixed investment account he controlled, authorities said.

As a result of Faubert's promises, 21 clients provided him with about $5.5 million. But authorities say the fixed investment account did not exist, and Faubert deposited the money into his business and personal accounts.

As part of the scheme, Faubert spent about $4.45 million on gambling, vacations and cars for his personal use and for business expenses, authorities said.

In order to lull the investors into believing that the investments were earning the promised rate of return, Faubert mailed false monthly financial statements to his clients.

"Crimes committed by registered investment advisers who victimize individuals hoping for a relatively modest return on their investments are particularly reprehensible," said U.S. Attorney Kevin O'Connor. "We will argue for a strict sentence for this defendant, and will vigorously prosecute any broker who robs from trusting investors."

Faubert also embezzled $27,079 from his company's retirement plan by falsely telling two employees that the money had been withheld from their paychecks and invested in the retirement plan.

Faubert filed false income tax returns for 2000 through 2003 because he failed to report the funds he embezzled from the investment clients, resulting in a tax loss to the government of nearly $1 million.

Faubert faces up to 20 years in prison and a fine of $250,000 on each of the mail fraud counts, five years and a $250,000 fine on the embezzlement count and three years and a $100,000 fine on each charge of filing false tax returns. He will be sentenced on Jan. 31.

Jail Worker Gets 15-Year Sentence For Child Porn (TAMPTRIB)

By Elaine Silvestrini, The Tampa Tribune

Tampa Tribune, November 17, 2006

TAMPA - A former Polk County sheriff's employee was sentenced Thursday morning to 15 years in federal prison after pleading guilty to child pornography charges.

After he is released, James Patrick Odle, 24, of Winter Haven, will be on probation indefinitely under the terms of his sentence.

Odle was a civilian detention technician at the South County Jail in Frostproof when investigators from the FBI's Innocent Images Task Force searched his room in his parents' home.

The search occurred after Odle transmitted 32 images of explicit child pornography during an Internet chat session, according to Odle's plea agreement.

A forensic examination of his computers and electronic storage devices revealed more than 5,000 images, including three video files, of children engaged in sexually explicit conduct, according to the U.S. attorney's office.

Specialists such as Odle work in the jail control room, monitoring video and opening electronic doors, Polk sheriff's office Chief of Staff Gary Hester said.

Odle had been suspended without pay since November 2005 and left in June, Hester said.

Former Dean Admits To Child Porn Charge (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, November 17, 2006

(AP) - SAN FRANCISCO-A former dean at University of San Francisco's School of Education has agreed to plead guilty to a child pornography charge and serve more than 5 years in prison, federal prosecutors said.

William T. Garner, 66, of San Francisco, acknowledged in the plea deal that he knowingly possessed more than 15,000 images of minors engaged in sexually explicit acts, U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan said.

"The children depicted in these images are the victims of horrible abuse, and we will vigorously prosecute individuals possessing these materials," Ryan said in a statement.

Calls to Garner's lawyer were not immediately returned late Wednesday.

Garner and prosecutors agreed to recommend a 63-month prison sentence, a fine of $12,500 and $50,000 in restitution to be paid to the San Francisco Child Abuse Prevention Center, Ryan said. The penalties still must be approved by a judge.

The maximum penalty for the charge is a 10-year prison term and a $250,000 fine.

Garner was formerly the dean of the School of Education at USF. He retired from the university in July, said USF spokesman Gary McDonald.

Networking Exec Blasts Wiretapping Rules (CNET)

By Anne Broache, Staff Writer, CNET News.com

CNET News, November 17, 2006

Requirements for broader wiretapping on Net phone and broadband connections are too costly, unwieldy, says Global Crossing.

WASHINGTON--An executive from a company that manages a large portion of the Internet's infrastructure on Thursday slammed federal wiretapping rules expected to take effect next spring.

Paul Kouroupas, vice president of regulatory affairs for Global Crossing, strongly criticized the Federal Communications Commission's broadening of a 1994 law--originally intended to cover telephone providers--as disproportionately costly, complex, and riddled with privacy concerns. His company is one of the world's largest Internet backbone providers.

"Our customers are large Fortune 500 companies--not too many of those companies are conducting drug deals or terrorist activities out of Merrill Lynch's offices or using their phones in that way," Kouroupas said at an event here sponsored by the DC Bar Association. "By and large we don't get wiretap requests, yet we're faced with the costs to come into compliance," which he estimated at $1 million.

At issue is an order issued last fall by the Federal Communications Commission that set a deadline of May 14, 2007, by which most broadband and Internet phone providers are required to reengineer their networks for easier snooping by law enforcement. The move expanded the Communications Assistance for Law Enforcement Act, or CALEA, which Congress wrote to impose obligations on telephone companies, but not Internet providers.

Even without the new FCC rules, police have the legal authority to conduct Internet wiretaps, but they have claimed the need for a "standardized" system. The formal broadening of the rules followed lobbying from the FBI, the Drug Enforcement Administration and the Justice Department, which said they needed to be able to eavesdrop more readily on criminals who spurned traditional telephone lines.

Kouroupas questioned repeatedly whether the rules create an appropriate balance between law enforcement needs and communication provider obligations. After all, he said, federal and state courts only signed off on about 1,700 wiretaps last year. (The secret Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court authorized about 2,000 more, some of which involved terrorism investigations.) If the government doesn't have the budget to finance its own tapping technology, then why, Kouroupas asked, should it have the right to "deputize the telecommunications industry" to do that work?

Tom Beers, an official in the FCC's Homeland Security Bureau, said companies can file for financial assistance in making their systems compliant--but only if they're able to successfully satisfy 11 criteria outlined by the law.

The agency also plans to stand firm with the May 2007 deadline, he said. In fact, the days of "endless" extensions for achieving CALEA compliance are effectively over for any broadband or voice-over Internet protocol company, he said, because most deployed their equipment after October 1998, thereby exempting them from relief.

Kouroupas and Global Crossing aren't alone in balking at the mandate. A group of organizations and companies that included Sun Microsystems, Pulver.com, the American Association of Community Colleges, the Association of American Universities and the American Library Association lodged an appeal against the rules last fall. But a divided appeals court panel upheld the FCC's rules, dismissing the group's argument that Congress never intended CALEA to force broadband providers--and networks at corporations and universities--to build in surveillance hubs for the police.

Now on News.com:

Newsmaker: Ushering in Zune, spiffing up Office

Since then, confusion has continued to swirl around who must comply with the expanded rules. What if, for example, Global Crossing provided a virtual private network to a corporation, which then went on to install its own equipment that allows for voice-over Internet protocol traffic? If the cops approach Global Crossing for the voice data alone, the company doesn't have ready access to that isolated stream, Kouroupas said, so it would probably be forced to hand over all of the packets traveling over that company's network.

"Is that really allowed?" he asked. "Aren't these wiretaps supposed to be narrowly tailored?"

Maura Quinn, unit chief of the FBI's CALEA Implementation Unit, acknowledged that it's difficult for officials to say authoritatively who is covered and not covered by the law.

"If there's any question of whether you need to comply," Quinn added, "CALEA is the law of the land, and it's expected people will comply with that."

Man Arrested In Burglary At Site Of Slaying (WP)

By Allison Klein And Paul Schwartzman

The Washington Post, November 17, 2006

A burglary at a Northwest Washington townhouse has drawn the attention of D.C. homicide detectives investigating the unsolved slaying of a prominent lawyer three months ago at the same address.

Police have arrested a 36-year-old man in the burglary of the house, which was unoccupied during the break-in Oct. 30. Authorities quoted the man, Phelps Collins, as saying that he got inside with help from a friend -- the brother of the townhouse's owner.

Detectives have not drawn a connection between the break-in and the stabbing of Robert Wone on Aug. 2, but homicide detectives have been looking into the burglary in hopes of uncovering potential leads, authorities said. Wone, 32, was stabbed in the chest while visiting friends at the home in the 1500 block of Swann Street NW, on the edge of Dupont Circle.

New details about the burglary emerged through interviews, court papers and testimony at a hearing for Collins this week in D.C. Superior Court. Collins was arrested last Friday on a burglary charge.

Police said Collins told them that the friend, Michael Price, had a key to the house because it belonged to his brother, Joe Price. Police also quoted Collins as saying that Michael Price turned off the alarm once the two men entered the house. About $7,700 worth of electronics were stolen, police said.

Michael Price has not been charged in the burglary. He could not be located to comment.

After the break-in, detectives went to nearby pawnshops and found an audio system, two DVD players and other stolen goods, which led them to Collins, authorities said. Police also found a CD changer in a search of Collins's home on Calvert Street NW. Collins sold other stolen items on the street for money or drugs, they said.

Joe Price, a lawyer at a Washington firm, told police that he did not know Collins but that he had heard of him through his brother, according to an affidavit filed by police to get the search warrant for Collins's residence. Joe Price also told police that "his brother is known to use drugs and hang with subjects who use drugs on a regular basis," the affidavit said. Price told police that he did not give his brother or Collins permission to enter his house or remove and sell his property, the affidavit states.

Collins was jailed after his arrest and has been moved to a halfway house pending more hearings. His public defender declined to comment.

The Swann Street homeowners -- Joe Price and Victor Zaborsky -- were on vacation at the time of the break-in, police have said.

Joe Price, Zaborsky and another man, Dylan Ward, were in the home when Wone was killed there, police said. Wone, a lawyer for Radio Free Asia, worked late that night and was staying at the house instead of going to his home in Oakton. His body was found on a sofa bed in a guest room.

Police have offered no motive for the killing. Joe Price, Zaborsky and Ward have said they did not see what happened. They have said they believe Wone was killed by an intruder who slipped in and out of the back door without notice.

Until the break-in, police expressed doubt about the intruder theory. There was no sign of forced entry, the killer used a knife from the kitchen, and the crime scene appeared to have been cleaned before officers arrived, police said.

Investigators have convened a grand jury and enlisted the help of the FBI in the homicide. They kept control of the $1.2 million house for more than three weeks after the killing, removing flooring, pieces of walls, a chunk of staircase, the washing machine and sink traps in a search for blood and other evidence.

Although he is not charged in the burglary, Michael Price also faces legal trouble. He was arrested in Silver Spring hours after the break-in, accused of stealing a 1998 Mercury Sable belonging to his domestic partner, who had reported it stolen. During the arrest, Montgomery County police found a "broken glass pipe," the kind that often is used to smoke cocaine, in the pocket of his sweat pants, according to charging papers.

Collins, who is unemployed, has a criminal history that includes four drug convictions between 1998 and 2004 in the District and Montgomery, records show.

Authorities said some items taken in the burglary turned up at Sam's Pawnbrokers on 14th Street NW, a few blocks away.

DOJ_NMG_0095579

Sam Levy, a manager at the store, said in an interview that Collins had pawned goods at the shop in the past. Detectives visited the store last week to retrieve the items.

Levy said a detective whom he declined to identify told him that the burglary is "connected possibly to a homicide."

Stores Protect Turf From Gangs Of Thieves (USAT)

By Jayne O'Donnell

USA Today, November 17, 2006

SEMINOLE, Fla. — Justin Reed is scanning images from 18 cameras at a Beall's department store here when saleswoman Carissa Tunis calls from the juniors department to direct his attention to four young men behaving oddly.

Reed, sitting in the store's so-called loss-prevention room, zeros in on the men and sees one slip a wallet in his pocket. He goes back over the image a few times to be sure. When another camera shows the group leaving the store, Reed and Jim Stevenson, a Beall's loss-prevention senior manager, slip out the security door and nab a 17-year-old.

As the two beefy investigators hustle the teen back inside, he pleads that he's just off probation. They call the police anyway. Within minutes, he's the first of two shoplifters arrested during four hours that USA TODAY spent observing the store's crime-fighting efforts.

On this November day, the culprit is a fairly harmless high school dropout. But the retail industry spends billions on technology and investigators such as Reed to combat what they call “organized theft rings”: gangs of shoplifters who sweep through stores with military precision. The retailers are fighting back with a new national crime database, electronic receipts, digital video recording technology and their own brand of detective work.

Stymied by police and courts that are often unwilling or unable to tackle crimes they may see as petty theft, the retailers build their own cases against the gangs, connecting crimes that often cross county and state lines. To help document the scope of this organized thievery, investigators for Walgreens, Target, Safeway, Limited Brands and others even follow thieves from their stores to the “fences” where they sell the goods.

The FBI and retail groups expect that by the end of this year, every major retailer will be able to share crime data — including photos of suspects from their store cameras — in a computer database. Beall's, a Florida-based chain, and other retailers now track shoplifting gangs using the database, which has already helped link a suspect to thefts of $500,000 worth of goods from 12 retailers. The man is still a fugitive, but warrants for his arrest are out in three states.

“Retailers have now said, ‘Enough's enough,' ” says Joseph LaRocca, vice president of loss prevention at the National Retail Federation.

Retail theft cost the industry more than $37 billion last year, up from $31 billion in 2003, according to a University of Florida report. It is especially problematic during the holiday season when overcrowded stores make shoplifting more difficult to detect and fraudulent returns easier to conceal. The retail federation said this month that retailers expect to lose $3.5 billion due to just fraudulent returns this holiday season alone.

“Our retail loss numbers are below the industry average, but it is a tremendous amount of work to keep it that way,” says Daniel Doyle, Beall's vice president of loss prevention and chairman of an NRF loss-prevention committee. He wouldn't say how much the company spends on loss prevention.

Retailers are particularly concerned about gangs, which have established supply chains that make organized theft, known as “boosting,” too profitable to give up without a fight.

A single shoplifter operating as part of a gang can steal up to $200,000 worth of merchandise in a weekend, retail and police investigators say.

One night last August, Beall's cameras caught a gang of exotic dancers that stole about $170 worth of goods from the Bradenton store, police records show. Apparel from other retailers filled the women's rented SUV. Two of the three women, who worked for an exotic dancing and escort service called Black Xtasy, admitted that they were traveling the state to steal. The suspected ringleader had retail theft warrants against her in two other Florida counties.

Jerry Biggs, Walgreens' divisional coordinator for organized retail crime, says one group shoplifted from 24 of the drugstores in seven hours. In a videotaped interview with police and Biggs, admitted Walgreens shoplifter Jesus Hernandez said he could easily boost $10,000 worth of merchandise in four hours. Hernandez specialized in stealing diabetic test-strip packages, which sell for up to $100.

In one Walgreens investigation, a shoplifter's fence was caught with $35,000 worth of chewing gum 10-packs.

During a typical boosting, one or more gang members distract store clerks while one or two others lift merchandise. Some members stand outside the store doors, ready to signal if police or security officials are coming. Still others are in parking lots ready with getaway cars.

The gangs often are armed. One Beall's investigator was hospitalized last year after being pummeled by a man wearing brass knuckles who was serving as a gang's lookout.

The thieves usually seem to be one step ahead of security devices. Even locked glass display cases can be cracked. Fourteen Target stores in California, Illinois and Colorado were hit by thieves who broke open locked cases, filled carts with iPods and pushed the carts out the doors.

Professional shoplifters usually carry shopping bags lined with foil and duct tape to block the electric current that detects security tags.

Some thieves remove security tags and hide things under larger packages.

Anti-theft systems “only work against people who don't know how to thwart them,” says Tony Heredia, Target's director of investigations. “We call them organized thieves for a reason.”

Retailers worry about frustrating paying customers while attempting to thwart thieves. “We want to keep customers happy,” Biggs says. “But the things that keep them happy, like keeping large quantities of merchandise readily available, also keep thieves happy.”

Doyle says his investigators are “200% sure” before they apprehend a likely shoplifter, so they don't cause a customer-relations nightmare.

Returns are one area where retailers have cracked down. While some will still give cash for a return without a receipt, many major retailers require receipts. And many are using electronic receipts that can track purchases made with a credit card or check. These receipts nearly eliminate the ability to use counterfeit receipts or to return stolen goods. They also use display devices that make it difficult to slide all the items on a hanging rack into a bag, but not too difficult for legitimate customers to use.

“The retail world is so competitive that they are deathly afraid of alienating any customer or raising a ruckus,” says Peter Junger, president and founder of the electronic receipt company SiRAS.com, used by retailers including Wal-Mart.

Prosecuting retail crime is complicated in part because much of the merchandise stolen doesn't come with serial numbers. That makes it difficult to single it out as stolen.

Unless goods are made under a retailer's private label and the store has alerted police of a theft, police who stop the driver of a car full of stolen items are “probably not going to arrest them and, most likely, they're not even going to hold the merchandise,” Biggs says. “Part of what we do is help police pursue criminal charges.”

Eric Ives, unit chief for the FBI's major theft unit, which includes organized retail crime, says most of the FBI's retail crime cases come from retailers who have already done their own national surveillance and proved the interstate component the FBI needs.

Montgomery County, Md., Detective David Hill is one of the few detectives in the USA who specializes in retail crime full time. He arrested former Bush administration official Claude Allen earlier this year for felony theft after he repeatedly returned items he hadn't paid for. Allen pleaded guilty to misdemeanor theft. Hill says he got ribbed by colleagues who called him “mall man” when he took the post.

But that's quieted now that he's found connections to drug dealing and other crimes and has helped bust several organized theft rings, including a Peruvian and Colombian gang that was caught at a Maryland mall in February 2005 with $50,000 worth of apparel stolen in less than an hour.

“It definitely was a case that shows how much damage they can do in a short amount of time,” Hill says.

“The criminal world has recognized this as a much more profitable crime than burglary with much less penalty,” Biggs says.

DOJ_NMG_0095581

Indeed, while larceny overall was down 4.5% from 2000 to 2004, shoplifting increased nearly 12%, according to the FBI's Uniform Crime Report.

In Florida, the arrest of the shoplifting strippers at Beall's Bradenton store led police to a warehouse in Ocala, Fla., that they suspect was being run by a fence serving multiple gangs.

"We certainly hate to hear about groups, because they are difficult to catch, particularly with all the aliases," says Tim Osborne, a Beall's loss-prevention director who was on the scene when the strippers were arrested. "We were fortunate that night."

Armed Robbers Hit String Of City Bars (BSUN)

By Annie Linskey

The Baltimore Sun, November 17, 2006

A masked man put a gun to the head of a bartender at Dizzy Issie's and demanded that she open the register while he counted to five. The man yelled, "Keep down don't move" to the 50 or so people at the hipster Remington bar. A second man, also masked, stood lookout at a side door.

After prying the till free, the pair ran out with about $800 and hopped into a waiting car. Shaken customers picked themselves up. Several called police, and then everyone cleared out for the night.

Police say they believe the same men have held up eight bars in the past three weeks, usually the same way.

Either two or three men enter the tavern wearing gloves and masks or bandanas to cover their faces, according to police. One man, waving a gun, immediately jumps behind the bar and, in most cases, removes the entire cash drawer. Another man stands as a lookout and prevents people from leaving the bar.

"We're pursuing this very aggressively," said Matt Jablow, a police spokesman. "This is unusual for us. We're giving it a lot of attention."

In addition to the Tuesday night robbery at Dizzy Issie's, police believe the group is responsible for holding up three other bars this week -- one in Charles Village on Monday night, one in Upper Fells Point late Wednesday and another in Pigtown early Thursday morning. In recent weeks other bars have been held up in Remington, Mill Hill and Carroll-South Hilton in West Baltimore.

"It was really, really quick," said Gary Deane, the owner of I Bar, a cozy Charles Village watering hole that was robbed of about $350 Monday night. "I told the police it was almost military, the way he was in [and] out." Deane said he didn't know until after the robbery that a second man was standing at the door preventing people from leaving.

The tavern is a tiny room with exposed brick walls, a flat-screen television and a square bar. When one man flashed a gun, he said, most customers immediately crouched for cover.

"I was the only one left standing," Deane said. "It was a very frightening thing when it happened." Later, the police came and some customers trickled out. But others stuck around to exchange war stories. The next day, he said, 90 percent of his customers returned.

Police said the robbers want the cash register and don't ask customers for money. But at Molly's Public House, a Remington corner bar in a converted rowhouse that was robbed Nov. 1, one customer was apparently so flustered that he emptied the cash in pockets onto the bar without being instructed to do so.

The robbers scooped up the man's $8 as they fled with the till, according to the police report.

Getaway vehicles

Police believe the robbers have used three different escape cars: a red Dodge pickup, a black Volkswagen station wagon and a brown Mercedes. "We're cautiously optimistic that we'll make arrests in these cases," Jablow said.

In the Northern district, where three of the eight robberies have occurred, police have stepped up patrols and have additional plainclothes officers in the area.

"They are pretty brazen to do something like this," said Northern District Deputy Major Ross Buzzuro, "This is not the norm. We want this to stop. We don't want anybody to get hurt."

DOJ_NMG_0095582

Buzzuro said he believes the bars are targets of opportunity: "It is a quick way for people to get money." But, he cautioned, "these are dangerous individuals."

Remington targeted

One community particularly hard-hit is Remington, an up-and-coming residential neighborhood with a strong community association. Situated several blocks south of the Johns Hopkins University and the Baltimore Museum of Art, it attracts a mix of students and artists but also has families who have lived there for decades.

"Something needs to be done," said Elaine Stevens, the owner of Dizzy Issie's, which counts filmmaker John Waters among its patrons. Stevens said she has been a bar owner in the city for 20 years and has never experienced anything like this.

Stevens, however, was gratified that nobody was shot. And, she said, the loyalty of her customers surprised her. When the robbers left, people hugged each other. Customers left $200 cash on a table for various bills -- even though with the register out of service they couldn't settle up.

And the next day many of those who had left the bar without paying came in with money:

"My customers said they weren't going to be scared away."

District Slayings Usually With Gun (WT)

By Matthew Cella

The Washington Times, November 17, 2006

The District is among the major U.S. cities with the highest percentage of people being killed by firearms, despite having one of the strictest gun-control laws in the country.

A recent Metropolitan Police Department report on homicides from 2001 to 2005 states that 901 of 1,126 homicide victims, or about 80 percent, were fatally shot.

"It's a problem," Chief Charles H. Ramsey said. "It may be something that's with us for a while."

Firearms last year alone were used to commit 157 of the District's 196 homicides, or about 80 percent. That percentage has remained relatively consistent since 2001, when a five-year low of 78.4 percent of homicides were committed using guns.

FBI crime statistics for 2005 show 10,100 of the country's 14,860 homicide victims, or 68 percent, were killed by guns.

The District's percentage of gun homicides is comparable to those in other big cities, according to the U.S. Bureau of Justice Statistics.

In 2004, the last year for which comprehensive statistics were available, the 79.3 percent of homicides involving guns in the District was higher than the 61.1 percent in New York. Chicago reported 75.2 percent, and Baltimore had 77.5 percent.

Atlanta had a significantly lower percentage of gun homicides than the District, 73.2 percent, despite less-restrictive gun laws. In Georgia, gun owners are not required to obtain a license or a permit, there is no waiting period to buy a handgun and no background check for second-party sales.

The District did have a lower percentage of gun homicides than New Orleans at 92 percent, Los Angeles at 80.9 percent and Detroit at 80.5 percent.

D.C. law restricts ownership of most guns that were not registered before 1977. Privately owned rifles and shotguns must be kept at home and stored unloaded, disassembled, or bound by a trigger lock or a similar device.

Michael Campbell, a spokesman for the Washington field office of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, said that part of the problem is the District being surrounded by jurisdictions with less-restrictive regulations.

"You can't seal the borders," he said. "There's always going to be a market for guns."

Chief Ramsey agreed.

"We have tough gun laws, but most of our guns are coming from Virginia and Maryland," he said.

D.C. police have recovered nearly 2,400 guns thus far this year, the most during the past five years. Those figures do not include the 337 guns turned in as part of a gun buy-back program in September.

Chief Ramsey thinks most gun owners are responsible, thus is not in favor of eliminating gun ownership.

"Guns and our society go hand in hand," the chief said. But he favors "very, very stiff penalties" for people who violate the law.

The District's firearms restrictions, which were passed in 1976, include a maximum one-year penalty or $1,000 fine for first-time offenders and a maximum five-year penalty or $5,000 fine for second offenders.

"To me, that's not strong enough," the police chief said.

Carrying a pistol without a license in the District can be either a felony or a misdemeanor charge, depending on whether the offender was carrying the pistol someplace other than in his or her home or business.

Felons convicted of firearms possession can get up to 10 years in prison and a $10,000 fine. Felons who use a firearm during the commission of a violent crime can receive a maximum 15-year prison sentence. Possessing unregistered ammunition always is a misdemeanor.

Corruption Target Faces Sex Charges (LAT)

By Peter Y. Hong And Paul Pringle, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, November 17, 2006

John Malburg, son of the Vernon mayor and a focus of a voter-fraud case, allegedly molested boys while dean at an L.A. Catholic school.

A political corruption scandal took a sordid turn Thursday when a defendant in the Vernon voter-fraud prosecution was charged with sexually molesting four boys while serving as dean of students at Daniel Murphy Catholic High School.

John Joseph Malburg, son of Vernon Mayor Leonis Malburg, who is also accused in the corruption case, pleaded not guilty to numerous counts of child sexual abuse, lewd acts and making a videotape for sale of a minor engaged in sex acts.

Authorities said one student appeared in a sexually explicit tape in exchange for a higher grade. In addition, Malburg, 37, is charged with possessing child pornography and secretly videotaping boys while they showered at his Hancock Park home.

As an offshoot of the 19-month corruption probe, investigators began to examine Malburg's contact with the boys over a period of 10 years, according to the Los Angeles County district attorney's office.

The Archdiocese of Los Angeles learned about the sex abuse inquiry sometime before Malburg was fired in July but did not notify parents at the Fairfax-area school, spokesman Tod M. Tamberg said.

Tamberg said the district attorney's office asked the archdiocese to keep the matter confidential. Jane Robison, a district attorney's spokeswoman, could not confirm that.

"The school has been cooperating fully," Tamberg said. He said there had been no earlier complaints against Malburg, who joined Daniel Murphy in 1997.

In the complaint, Malburg is accused of surreptitiously videotaping one of the students two months after the school fired him.

Outside the Detroit Street campus, several students and parents said they had not been told of the charges against Malburg and declined to discuss them.

One parent, who asked not to be named, said she was "shocked" at the news but didn't fault the school for not informing parents.

"There's no need to panic," she said.

The allegations come as the archdiocese struggles to settle more than 500 sexual abuse lawsuits. At least six of those named in the suits once worked at Daniel Murphy, although not in recent years.

Mary Grant, western director of the Survivors Network of Those Abused by Priests, a group that represents alleged victims of pedophile priests, said the Malburg case "shows that nothing has changed in the L.A. Archdiocese."

She also said it "seems odd" that the archdiocese did not alert parents.

Malburg also pleaded not guilty Thursday to charges of perjury and false voter registration in connection with an alleged family-run, decades-long corruption scheme in Vernon, a tiny industrial city a few miles south of downtown Los Angeles, where his father has held elective office for more than 50 years.

DOJ_NMG_0095584

Leonis Malburg pleaded not guilty to seven felony counts alleging various forms of voter fraud. His wife, Dominica, who is the younger Malburg's mother, entered a not guilty plea to two counts of voter fraud.

The Malburgs are accused of living in Hancock Park while voting in Vernon, 20 miles away.

The district attorney's office said investigators looking for evidence of corruption allegedly found child pornography on a computer seized from John Malburg's home.

They also confiscated pornographic home videos, officials said.

The 12 counts against Malburg cover alleged incidents from 1996 through 2000 and from 2004 to September of this year. He is accused of molesting a boy whom he met while working as a psychologist — before he was hired at Daniel Murphy.

Malburg was released on $495,000 bail. Approached in court, he declined to comment.

Daniel Murphy, formerly called St. John Vianney, is named for a Los Angeles philanthropist. It has produced several prominent graduates, including Los Angeles City Councilman Bernard C. Parks and Fire Chief William Bamattre.

"It's disturbing," Parks, a 1961 graduate, said of the allegations. "It doesn't help the school and it doesn't help the church."

Parks said it was particularly troubling given the extensive publicity of the archdiocese's sexual abuse crisis. "With all the press coverage on this, you wonder why there are those who still think they can get away with it," he said.

Bamattre's office did not return calls.

In the Vernon case, longtime city administrator Bruce Malkenhorst Sr. pleaded not guilty to charges that he spent $60,000 in city money for personal use, including massages, golf outings, meals and political contributions.

Malkenhorst was the highest paid municipal official in the state before stepping down two years ago. He earned more than $600,000 a year for running a city with fewer than 100 residents. The city also provided him with a limousine.

Prosecutors allege that the Malburgs and their allies ran Vernon as a fiefdom.

Earlier this year, the city hired armed private investigators to shadow candidates running against Leonis Malburg and other City Council incumbents.

The city evicted the challengers from their residences and removed their names from the ballot, although a judge later ruled that the election, Vernon's first in 25 years, had to go forward.

Malburg was reelected, but the results were disputed and the case ended up in court.

Vernon was founded in 1905 by a charismatic Basque immigrant named John Baptiste Leonis, who over the next few decades built a political machine that chased dissenters out of town.

CIVIL LAW:

Exonerated In Mob Killing, Men Seek Retribution From Government (AP)

By Jay Lindsay

AP, November 17, 2006

BOSTON - Two Boston men spent 30 years in prison for an underworld slaying they did not commit after a judge ruled that the FBI withheld evidence that would have cleared the pair to protect a mob hitman who was serving as an informant.

Now, in a trial that opened Thursday, those men and the families of two others who were wrongfully convicted are seeking damages from the government that could total more than $100 million.

Joseph "The Animal" Barboza was a known mob assassin responsible for numerous hits during Boston's gangland wars of the 1960s. He was also so vital to FBI efforts to crack the mob that the agency allowed him to wrongly implicate four men for murder, attorneys for the plaintiffs said in opening statements.

Joseph Salvati and Peter Limone and the families of two other men who died while behind bars accuse the federal government of malicious prosecution, conspiracy and depriving the men's family of companionship.

"It was a rigged game, a charade, a story concocted by Mr. Barboza and assented to by the FBI," said attorney Austin McGuigan, who represents Salvati. "There was no hope the real story in this case would be uncovered."

DOJ_NMG_0095585

The case is the latest development in a scandal that unfolded in Boston about a decade ago, when it was learned that the FBI had a corrupt relationship with the mob, protecting killers who were informants and even tipping them off to pending indictments.

The lawsuit was filed after the Justice Department released documents in 2001 that showed the FBI withheld evidence from state prosecutors that could have cleared the men so the agency could protect an informant who actually committed the crime.

The lawsuit does not ask for a specific dollar award, but briefs filed in the case point to past decisions that have awarded $1 million for each year wrongly imprisoned, which would total more than $100 million in this case.

Justice Department attorney Bridget Lipscomb said federal authorities had no duty to share information with state prosecutors, and cannot be liable for the results of a separate state investigation. She also noted the four men had access to some FBI information, as well as top-notch attorneys who raised doubts about Barboza's testimony at their trial.

Limone, Louis Greco and Henry Tameleo were sentenced to death in 1968 for the murder of Edward "Teddy" Deegan, but were not executed before the death penalty was banned in 1975. Salvati was sentenced to life in prison.

Salvati, 72, and Limone, 74, were exonerated in 2001 after the Justice Department documents were released. Greco and Tameleo died behind bars before being exonerated.

The case is being tried without a jury before U.S. District Judge Nancy Gertner.

On Thursday, attorneys for the men and their families, said the problems were rooted in a 1960s FBI policy of protecting informants identities at all costs.

Days before Deegan was shot in the head in a Chelsea alley, FBI wiretaps caught Barboza and Vincent "Jimmy" Flemmi asking a Rhode Island mob boss for permission for the hit. Informants later told FBI agents that Barboza, Flemmi and three other men were responsible. FBI agent Paul Rico, who handled top echelon informants, listed Deegan as among seven people killed by Flemmi.

"The Deegan murder was literally surrounded by information that Jimmy Flemmi was one of the killers," said Michael Avery, who represents Limone and Tameleo.

But the FBI had recently recruited Flemmi as an informant and believed he would provide valuable information for years, McGuigan said. And when Barboza agreed to testify, he told the FBI he would never say anything to implicate his friend Flemmi, McGuigan said.

The FBI did not share any of this evidence with the state, Avery said, making the FBI "masters of this prosecution."

In his testimony in the Deegan case, Barboza implicated Limone, Salvati and Greco because of personal grudges, and Tameleo because an FBI agent wanted to arrest him, according to attorney Juliane Balirro, who represents Limone.

The FBI had at least 20 descriptions of the Deegan murder that conflicted with Barboza's testimony, but did not share them with prosecutors, she said.

Barboza was sentenced to a year and a day in prison after the Deegan trial, and later moved to California as the first participant of the federal witness-protection program. He was shot to death in San Francisco in 1976.

Lipscomb, the Justice Department attorney, said Barboza was subjected to more than six days of intense cross-examination during the trial, which included questions about Flemmi's possible involvement and accusations that he switched who was involved.

Trial Begins Over FBI Role In Wrongful Convictions (BOS)

By Shelley Murphy, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, November 17, 2006

There's no question that the FBI recruited notorious hitman Joseph "The Animal" Barboza as a witness against local Mafia leaders, then turned him over to state prosecutors in a case that led to the wrongful conviction of four men for a 1965 gangland murder in Chelsea.

DOJ_NMG_0095586

But Thursday, on the first day of a civil trial seeking more than $100 million in damages from the federal government, a Justice Department lawyer insisted the FBI can't be blamed because state prosecutors were responsible for investigating and trying the case.

"The FBI is not liable," said the government attorney, Bridget Bailey Lipscomb.

But lawyers for Peter Limone, Joseph Salvati, Henry Tameleo, and Louis Greco accused the FBI of making a "mockery" of justice by failing to tell state prosecutors or defense lawyers about evidence that suggested Barboza had framed the four men for the slaying of small-time hoodlum Edward "Teddy" Deegan.

Limone, 72, and Salvati, 74, spent more than 30 years in prison before they were exonerated five years ago, while Greco and Tameleo both died in prison.

"The FBI initiated the prosecution by delivering a perjurious witness to the state prosecutor, knowing his testimony was false," said Boston attorney Juliane Balliro, who represents Limone and Tameleo's family. "But for the deliberate misconduct of the FBI, these men would not even have been indicted, let alone convicted for the murder of Edward Deegan."

The lawsuit accuses the government of malicious prosecution, intentional infliction of emotional distress, negligent supervision of FBI agents, conspiracy, and loss of consortium by the men and their families.

Deegan was gunned down in a Chelsea alley in March 1965, but local police were unable to solve the slaying until the FBI struck a deal with Barboza. He was sentenced to a year in prison for his role in Deegan's murder and his testimony led to the 1968 conviction of the four men. Tameleo, Limone, and Greco were initially given the death penalty, then later sentence to life. Salvati was also sentenced to life in prison.

Feds Pay The Price For Botched Mob Job (BOSH)

By Peter Gelzinis, Boston Herald Columnist

Boston Herald, November 17, 2006

That the prospect of justice has arrived 40 years late for Joe Salvati and Peter Limone, along with two fellow defendants who died in prison, Louis Greco and Henry Tameleo . . . is shameful.

That the Department of Justice has seen fit to send Bridget Bailey Lipscomb back to Boston to defend the putrid reputation of the FBI . . . well, that could be called a blessing.

With Ms. Lipscomb at the government table, the only question may well be how much of a potential $100 million in civil damages will these men and their families see.

Five months ago, Lipscomb's attempt to convince U.S. District Court Judge Reginald C. Lindsay that the FBI could not be blamed for enabling their Teflon rat, Whitey Bulger, to slaughter John McIntyre, turned into graceless courtroom hash.

Though Lindsay was swayed by absolutely none of it, he tossed the government a considerable bone by confining the McIntyres' award to $3.5 million instead of a possible $50 million.

This time, however, the FBI's crime is even more egregious. And the case will be heard by a different federal judge, U.S. District Court Judge Nancy Gertner.

In a nutshell: H. Paul Rico - the Darth Vader of gangster G-men and mentor to fallen FBI agent and murder defendant John "Zip" Connolly - framed four men for a murder two of his informants committed.

From the first moment, more than 40 years ago, Rico knew that Salvati, Limone, Greco and Tameleo were innocent, yet watched them go off to prison, where three languished on death row.

During yesterday's opening arguments at the Moakley Courthouse, Lipsomb countered 40 years of government treachery with the Professor Irwin Corey defense, namely:

The feds were not obliged to share information with state prosecutors (who tried the original case) and can't be held liable for the results of a separate state investigation.

Makes perfect sense, doesn't it?

In the face of such circular reasoning, Peter Limone's defense lawyer, Juliane Balliro, was moved to note, "Despite all the exposure and attention this case has received, and the fact that these men were exonerated. Despite all that was revealed during the Wolf Hearings. Despite the condemnations of a congressional committee, the government does not change its stripes. They still remain in complete denial."

If "staying the course" in Iraq means holding the U.S. death count to, say, 10 soldiers a week, then perhaps staying the course when it comes to the rancid saga of Boston FBI criminals means holding the cash award to a small fraction of what is being asked.

Will Bridget Bailey Lipscomb get accolades from her DOJ bosses if the plaintiffs in this case came away with only $10 million or $20 million payout? Would that pass for a government victory?

Because the sheer weight of the evidence suggests she cannot win on the merits. Because in this case, the feds have no merit.

Juiliane Balliro sees this moment as an opportunity "to finally connect all the many threads of this case into a rope." Too bad such a rope cannot be slipped around H. Paul Rico's neck, for the decrepit old son of Hoover expired in a Florida jail, awaiting his own murder trial. [continue]

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Democrats Pledge To Scrutinize Justice's Civil Rights Arm (BOS)

By Charlie Savage, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, November 17, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Democrats on the Senate Judiciary Committee yesterday vowed to impose intense oversight on the Justice Department's Civil Rights Division next year, telling a Bush administration official in charge of the agency that the next Congress will scrutinize whether civil rights laws are being properly enforced.

Speaking at the first Civil Rights Division oversight hearing since May 2002, the Democrats cited several newspaper articles about the agency over the past year -- including a Globe analysis of changes in the hiring process for lawyers in the division -- and said they would investigate the administration's stewardship of the agency after they regain power in January.

"There are disturbing reports that career lawyers have been shut out of the division's decision-making process, that the division's civil rights enforcement on behalf of racial minorities has sharply declined, and that the department has packed the division with attorneys who have no background in civil rights litigation," said Senator Patrick J. Leahy, Democrat of Vermont, who will become committee chairman in January.

Senator Russell Feingold, Democrat of Wisconsin, said he wanted to know whether the Bush administration was exerting political interference on the division's decisions about when to file cases. The agency has long been a source of political tension because it is charged with enforcing antidiscrimination laws and reviewing changes to state voting rules.

"For the separation of powers designed by the Framers to work, we in the legislative branch need to take our oversight authority seriously," Feingold said. "While this hearing is the first good step, it is just a first step. It is clear that the Civil Rights Division of the Department of Justice requires our attention and that one hearing will not suffice."

Wan Kim , assistant attorney general for civil rights, said he welcomed congressional attention.

"I certainly share your . . . interest in oversight," Kim said, adding that he has "a deep and abiding respect for this committee and the work that it does in making sure that all branches of government are operating consistent with the law."

One major focus by the lawmakers was a change in hiring procedures. In July, the Globe reported that in late 2002, the Bush administration disbanded a longstanding hiring committee of veteran career lawyers. Political appointees took over screening résumés, interviewing applicants, and deciding who should fill vacancies in the permanent civil service ranks.

After the change, successful applicants were significantly less likely to have civil rights backgrounds, according to a Globe analysis of résumés obtained under the Freedom of Information Act. New hires were also more likely to have conservative credentials, such as membership in the Federalist Society, a group that takes a skeptical view of aggressive civil rights enforcement.

Arlen Specter, Republican of Pennsylvania and chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, and Senator Edward M. Kennedy, Democrat of Massachusetts, each raised the Globe article as an example of mounting "concerns" over the division's direction. Also, Leahy read a summary of the Globe's findings, then pressed Kim on whether ideology had become a factor in the hiring process.

Kim acknowledged that the hiring committees had been disbanded by then-Attorney General John D. Ashcroft. But he said "ideology is not a factor in my hiring process." He pledged that he would hire only "talented lawyers" who "share a commitment for the work that we do in the division."

Leahy accepted Kim's answer, but told the assistant attorney general that "I suspect during the coming year . . . we'll probably chat some more."

Specter then observed to laughter: "Sounds like a well-founded suspicion to me."

The senators also pressed Kim about several voting-rights decisions in which the division's leadership overruled career staff recommendations. In several cases, courts later rejected the division's conclusion that redistricting plans or laws were lawful.

One case involved a Georgia law that required voters without driver's licenses to buy an ID card for $20. A federal judge later blocked the law, comparing it to a Jim Crow-era "poll tax." Kim defended the Justice Department's decision to sign off on the new requirement, saying it was consistent with all relevant statutes.

Lawmakers also raised concerns about the division's process of deciding whether to bring discrimination cases. The number of cases alleging systematic discrimination against blacks has declined from previous administrations.

OC Apartment Owners Accused Of Discriminating Against Hispanics (AP)

AP, November 17, 2006

The U.S. Justice Department sued two apartment building owners for housing discrimination Thursday, claiming they favored Vietnamese tenants over Hispanic tenants.

Gary Luke and Mary Ngo, owners of adjacent apartment complexes in Garden Grove in Orange County, violated the federal Fair Housing Act barring discrimination against people based on national origin, the government claims.

The lawsuit arose from a charge made recently by the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development. The suit seeks monetary damages, civil penalties and a court order prohibiting future discrimination.

Federal authorities say Luke and Ngo issued notices in the last year to Hispanic tenants telling them they had 60 days to leave so their units could be renovated.

When Hispanic tenants later tried to move back into the remodeled units, all were either told that they could not return or were promised rental applications that were never provided, authorities said.

Vacated units were later rented out to Vietnamese tenants, the government said.

In one case Luke refused to rent to a Hispanic woman, saying his "partner has in mind only to rent to Vietnamese families," the government claimed. Ngo, who co-owns one of the properties with Luke, is of Vietnamese heritage.

Luke and Ngo could not be reached for comment; their telephone numbers were unlisted.

A call after business hours to defense attorney Christine Baran, who authorities say represents Luke and Ngo in the case, was not immediately returned Thursday.

Justice Department Possibly Investigating Election Day Fliers (WP)

The Washington Post, November 17, 2006

A senior Justice Department official said yesterday that the misleading fliers distributed by Republicans in Maryland on Election Day may -- or may not -- be the subject of an investigation by the department's criminal division.

Wan Kim, assistant attorney general for the department's civil rights division, said during a Senate hearing that he believed the matter was under investigation but quickly added, "I'm not 100 percent sure about that."

Two public affairs officers at Justice Department headquarters in Washington said they could neither confirm nor deny that an investigation is underway.

The fliers -- authorized by the campaigns of Republicans Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr., who lost his bid for a second term, and Michael S. Steele, who was defeated in his bid for a Senate seat -- have been widely denounced for implying, incorrectly, that the two candidates were endorsed by prominent black figures including former NAACP leader Kweisi Mfume and Prince George's County Executive Jack B. Johnson (D).

Two Face More Charges In Sex Trafficking Case (ROBCT)

By Kate Howard, Staff Writer

Robertson County (TN) Times, November 17, 2006

Indictment says man, woman forced minor teen into sex ring

Two people are facing additional federal charges this week for allegedly forcing a Mexican teenager into prostitution as part of a sex trafficking ring that operated in Nashville and Memphis, federal officials said.

A federal grand jury in Memphis issued indictments Thursday charging Juan Mendez and Cristina Andres Perfecto with using fraud and coercion to force an adult woman and the teenager into a life of prostitution. They were charged in October with sex trafficking of children.

Federal investigators believe the teenager was smuggled into the country from Oaxaca, Mexico, and thought she was going to get a job as a waitress at a Nashville restaurant.

She was taken to a Harding Place-area apartment, where she was beaten, raped and forced to have sex with as many as 40 men per day, according to court documents.

The girl, now 15, was taken into the custody of the state Department of Children's Services and placed with a Spanish-speaking foster family, DCS spokesman Rob Johnson said.

Raymundo Flores, Raul Santillan-Leon and Fernando Reyes-Santillan also were indicted on charges of conspiracy to launder money and harbor illegal immigrants at a brothel in Memphis, justice department officials said in a news release.

All five of those indicted were connected to the same sex-trafficking ring, according to federal officials.

Court documents said that some of the teenager's adult relatives were also lured to Tennessee with the promise of jobs and enough money to send back to their families in Mexico.

Leigh Anne Jordon, a spokeswoman for the U.S. Attorney's office in Memphis, said Thursday night that she couldn't release any additional details on the case.

Teel Defense Requests No Interference (BSH)

By Robin Fitzgerald

Biloxi Sun Herald, November 17, 2006

GULFPORT - Ryan Teel's attorney wants a judge to instruct the government not to interfere with the defendant's investigation in preparation of Teel's trial involving an inmate death.

The Harrison County Sheriff's Department has denied the defense a request to examine the county jail booking room and to question jail employees, according to a motion filed by Jim Davis, Teel's attorney.

Teel, a former corrections officer, is set to stand trial May 28 on criminal charges of civil rights violations in the fatal beating of Jessie Lee Williams Jr. The incident occurred in the jail booking room on Feb. 4. Regina Rhodes, also a former jailer, pleaded guilty to her role in the assault and to lying to cover it up.

Davis asked for an emergency telephone conference with a judge today to discuss his concerns.

Allowing the defense access to the booking room and jail employees is "necessary in order to properly prepare for trial," Davis wrote in his motion. He was not available for comment Thursday.

Teel is in custody at an undisclosed location.

Davis' latest motions claim Capt. Steve Campbell, who runs the sheriff's professional standards unit, agreed Nov. 7 to allow a booking room visit and witness interviews, but changed his mind the next day. Campbell said permission was needed from the U.S. Attorney's Office, an affidavit stated.

Sheriff George H. Payne Jr. declined comment and referred questions to his attorney, Cy Faneca, who said he advised the sheriff to let the U.S. Justice Department make that decision.

DOJ_NMG_0095590

"We are not involved in the criminal case because the Justice Department is conducting that investigation," Faneca said. "Nobody has told us what the ground rules are, so it certainly would be prudent to let Justice make that decision."

"The sheriff and I don't want to do anything that might interfere with the investigation by the Department of Justice."

The U.S. Attorney's Office, which is prosecuting Teel in the criminal case, operates under the Justice Department.

U.S. Attorney Dunn Lampton said his office will file a response to Davis' complaint today.

"The judge has asked that we not talk about these matters so a court document is the appropriate response."

A two-count indictment was unsealed after Teel's arrest by the FBI on Aug. 28.

One count accuses Teel of depriving Williams of his civil rights under color of law by using excessive force in an attempt to kill Williams. That count carries a penalty of any number of years to life in prison.

Prosecutors could upgrade that count to seek the death penalty. They have until Feb. 16 to decide.

The second count accuses Teel of falsifying a report with the intention of impeding or obstructing justice. That count carries a penalty of up to 20 years.

Two other sealed documents were filed in court on Oct. 25. Public records show no details.

UCLA Police Stun Student In ID Dispute (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, November 17, 2006

(AP) - LOS ANGELES-A UCLA police officer shocked a student with a stun gun at a campus library after he refused repeated requests to show student identification and wouldn't leave, police said.

The student, Mostafa Tabatabainejad, was shocked Tuesday at about 11 p.m. as police did a routine check of student IDs at the University of California, Los Angeles Powell Library computer lab.

"This is a long-standing library policy to ensure the safety of students during the late-night hours," said UCLA Police Department spokeswoman Nancy Greenstein.

She said police tried to escort Tabatabainejad, 23, out of the library after he refused to provide identification. Tabatabainejad instead encouraged others at the library to join his resistance, and when a crowd began to gather, police used the stun gun on him, Greenstein said.

Tabatabainejad was arrested for resisting and obstructing a police officer and later released on his own recognizance. He declined to comment Wednesday night.

New Focus On Affirmative Action (WP)

By Elizabeth Williamson And Valerie Strauss

The Washington Post, November 17, 2006

The number of minorities -- particularly black Americans -- winning government contracts and being admitted to public colleges and universities in California has dwindled since a ballot measure was passed 10 years ago outlawing preferential treatment for minorities in those areas, according to a study released yesterday.

The report comes as the longtime controversy over affirmative action is gaining new attention. Michigan voters last week adopted a constitutional amendment essentially taking the same action as California, and the American Bar Association is facing criticism from some groups for strengthening its diversity requirements for accreditation of law schools.

The study of California's Proposition 209 shows that it has had a major effect, according to Ellis Cose, who wrote the report for the Institute for Justice and Journalism at the University of Southern California's Annenberg School for Communication.

At the University of California's two flagships, the campuses in Berkeley and Los Angeles, the impact of Proposition 209 was immediate: The number of black and Hispanic freshmen admitted the year after the law took effect fell by half.

In California's transportation system, the report says, two-thirds of the minority contractors certified to do business with the state when the law went into effect have folded. "Once Proposition 209 passed, the contracts just dried up," Cose said.

The study comes after Michigan voters approved a ballot measure that aims, through a constitutional amendment, to bar public universities and state and local governments from discriminating or giving preferential treatment based on race, sex, color, ethnicity or national origin.

The vote shows that "there is a huge sense on the part of white voters that affirmative action needs to end," said Cose, an author and columnist for Newsweek. Although the national implication remains uncertain, "if this thing is put before states where there is a significant white majority, it's likely to pass," he said.

Michigan is a textbook example of what Cose calls the "chipping away of affirmative action," a process that began in the 1970s and gained political steam in the 1990s. In 1974, the Supreme Court rejected as a throwback to "separate but equal" a Detroit plan to bus city children to suburban schools. In 2003, the court ruled that a diverse student body was important enough to support race-conscious admissions at the University of Michigan's law school.

"The measure in Michigan, as did the measure in California, passed along very clearly racial lines," Cose said, showing that "even though jurists see a legitimate state interest in diversity voters, at least white voters don't."

Opponents to last week's ballot measure promise a legal battle, as do proponents. Although the Supreme Court has repeatedly ruled in favor of affirmative action programs, the court's written opinions have signaled for years that the programs' end may be near.

The question, the California report says, is whether Americans, decades after Jim Crow, still feel legally obligated to help boost people whose race puts them at an economic and educational disadvantage. Affirmative action opponents say special treatment based on race implies lesser treatment of others based on their majority status. So by addressing one injustice, they say, the programs commit another.

Because college admissions of minority students have slid nationwide in recent years, many admissions directors have changed their recruiting focus to identify not only minorities but low-income students, including whites.

"In the last couple of years, there has been a much more concerted effort to do this in a race-neutral way," said Lee Coffin, admissions dean at Tufts University in Massachusetts. "The poor white kid has a voice that needs to be heard, in addition to the kind of racial diversity we want to create."

University of Virginia Admissions Dean Jack Blackburn said his school has changed policies and part of its recruiting approach to find more needy applicants. "We realized that we are not providing access," he said. "We are not educating very many kids from low-income backgrounds. The numbers are shockingly low."

That, he said, was one key reason the university recently announced it was dropping its binding early-decision program.

Whether last week's elections -- which returned control of Congress to Democrats, who generally favor affirmative action -- will have an impact on such programs' future remains to be seen.

An important test could come next month, when the American Bar Association undergoes review of its authority to accredit university law schools. A Department of Education hearing, aimed at recertifying the ABA's Council of the Section on Legal Education and Admissions to the Bar as the official accrediting agency for law schools, is expected to be a forum for complaints.

The ABA recently rewrote a diversity standard for law schools, requiring more concrete action to promote a diverse faculty, staff and student body. The new standard drew fire from both sides of the debate: The Congressional Black Caucus did not think it went far enough, and the Bush administration's Commission on Civil Rights said this past summer that it went too far.

The National Association of Scholars has asked the Education Department not to renew the ABA's accrediting power if it does not eliminate all requirements of racial, ethnic and gender diversity from its accreditation standards.

Sources familiar with the issue said the department is divided over the question, with some administration political appointees sympathetic to that request.

Even if affirmative action were to disappear, "the universities are going to try very hard to admit a reasonable number of minority candidates," Cose said. "But they are inevitably going to see the numbers go down."

English As Official Language Gains Support At Local Levels (USAT)

By Oren Dorell

USA Today, November 17, 2006

Voters and town boards in several states recently passed laws making English the official language, garnering Hispanic support in one case for what many say was a message to Washington.

DOJ_NMG_0095592

Arizona voters last week approved Proposition 103, a constitutional amendment making English the official language of the state. Passing similar laws were the city councils of Taneytown, Md.; Farmers Branch, Texas, and the town board of Pahrump, Nev.

"The voters in Arizona are sick and tired of the federal government doing nothing on immigration," said Arizona State Rep. Kyrsten Sinema of Phoenix, in explaining why she thought the measure passed in Arizona. She was an opponent of the proposition.

While English-only proposals in the U.S. Congress have gone nowhere, the Arizona measure passed by a 3-to-1 ratio, with 48% of Hispanics supporting it, according to an Associated Press exit poll.

Hispanic support is a sign that "the majority of Hispanics believe that the key to success in America is to learn the language of the land, learn English," says Jose Esparza, vice chairman of the Arizona Latino Republican Association.

Lydia Guzman, chairwoman of the Coalition for Latino Political Action in Phoenix, opposed the bill. She said she is worried it will be misused by anti-immigrant extremists.

Guzman was not surprised that nearly half of Hispanic voters supported the measure. She says the Hispanic community includes people who have been here for generations, who don't speak Spanish and haven't experienced the "immigrant struggle."

In Taneytown, where only 1.5% of the population is Hispanic according to the 2000 census, Councilman Paul Chamberlain says the official-English law will make "no practical change" because Taneytown does not provide services in Spanish.

"We will be helping immigrants learn the English language and not segregate into different communities," he says.

Political scientist and pollster Fred Solop of Northern Arizona University says Arizona voters, including Hispanics, have made clear that the issue of illegal immigration is their number one concern.

"There were four immigration proposals on the ballot, if there were six, they would have all passed," he says.

Among the ballot initiatives that accompanied the official-English proposition were three others that targeted illegal immigrants.

Arizona State Rep. Russell Pearce of Mesa calls official English "part of us doing our job to help (immigrants) learn to communicate.

"Government has an obligation to promote and enhance English," he says, "to help people assimilate."

Sinema derides that sentiment as "so cute," pointing out that one of the propositions that passed denies illegal immigrants state benefits, including state-funded English classes.

"To punish people by taking away funding to learn English, and at the same time demand people learn English, makes no sense at all," Sinema says.

Esparza, who supported the official-English ballot initiative, also sees "an irony" in the voters' decision to deny state funding for English education. He said conflicting measures passed "because the public, including Hispanics, is frustrated that illegal immigration continues to be a problem and they want the federal government to take action."

A Chance To Get Into The Room (WP)

The Washington Post, November 17, 2006

They didn't leave work until after 4 a.m. Four hours later, they were back in the office -- frazzled and on edge. Sitting around a conference table, eight employees of Enlightened Inc., a technology consulting firm, were struggling to polish a proposal that could well determine the firm's future. It was not going well.

Chief executive Antwanye Ford was rubbing his forehead in frustration. He was dressed meticulously, as always, in a pressed Donald Trump-brand suit and a French-cuff shirt. Not even a succession of 18-hour days could make this man look rumpled. But on this day, he was oozing tension. Enlightened's bid for a multimillion-dollar contract to update the computer system used by the District's probation and parole officers was simply not good enough, he told his staff. The proposal needed more graphics, more punch. As Ford saw it, this bid was his fledgling black firm's ticket to a new competitive league.

Suddenly, Ford's cellphone was vibrating. He excused himself and headed into his private office. It was Larry Daniels, one of the District's chief accountants who oversees city spending. Daniels had received complaints about Enlightened's work on another project, a $400,000 contract to do inventory of D.C. property: police cars, fire trucks, public school furniture.

It was too much. Frustrated and embarrassed, Ford heaved his bottle of water across the room. "You only get one opportunity, maybe two at the most, to prove yourself," he later fumed to a visitor. "As a minority, you have to work extra hard. . . . We're constantly being watched and judged."

As the day wore on, Ford felt that what he had spent years seeking -- acceptance, respect, an unchallenged level of achievement -- had been put at risk. In danger of losing one contract and not winning another he coveted, Ford wondered: Would his aspirations for Enlightened ever be realized? Would he feel this extra pull to prove himself if he were not black?

Ford's anxiety about image is common among black businessmen who are barreling into territory where relatively few of them have established ownership: information technology, construction, real estate, financial management. Many bring with them advanced degrees, years of corporate experience, and cultural and emotional complexities that can both enrich and burden their lives as business owners. Many struggle with whether they must sacrifice their identity to be successful. In Ford's case, that means questioning whether Enlightened should even promote that it is black-owned.

"The dilemma is you don't know whether doing this or not will help," says Barron H. Harvey, dean of Howard University's School of Business and a long-time consultant to minority businesses. "There are some firms that have decided they are going to be who they are and not downplay that they are black-owned. But then they question if they had done it differently, would they have been more successful? You never know."

Ford decided he would take no chances. Enlightened's Web site features stock photos of three young, white men in suits and a white woman gathered around a laptop computer. There are no obvious indications that the firm is run by black men. "We don't want people to shut the door on us before we show them what we can do," Ford says.

The population of black male entrepreneurs has grown dramatically in the past 15 years, as more black men have abandoned corporate jobs and converted their expertise into livelihoods that they control. According to a recent U.S. Census report, the number of black men who own businesses increased by nearly a third from 1997 to 2002, and now number more than 571,000 nationwide. In eight years, at the current growth rate, that number will top 1 million. Previous generations of black businessmen were concentrated in the service and retail fields: They owned restaurants, barbershops, small grocery stores. Most relied on a black customer base. They were people like Ford's parents, who opened an upholstery shop on H Street in Northeast during the 1970s.

But that business model has markedly changed, and black entrepreneurs such as Ford are grappling with a different set of challenges.

Ford is not aware of ever having lost a contract because of his race, but he is mindful of America's history of racial prejudice. If minority companies did not face discrimination, he said, there would not be federally funded set-aside programs. Enlightened participates in such a program administered by the Small Business Administration. The 8(a) program offers business-development assistance and the opportunity to compete for federal contracts that have been reserved for small firms owned by "socially and economically disadvantaged" people, those whose net worth is less than $250,000. Enlightened, which has been in the program since 2001, is certified to participate for four more years.

But even though the program has generated considerable business, Ford is conflicted. He does not want Enlightened to be known as "just" an 8(a) firm. The designation, he believes, whispers: inferior company in business because of government handouts.

Some business choices do not come easily. The decision about what would appear on the Web site was agonizing. Asked whether he is hiding his heritage or is ashamed of it, Ford's smile disappears and his eyes narrow. He wonders aloud if it's being suggested that he is a sellout, then abruptly leaves the office to lift weights.

The next day, he admits the questioning angered him. "I had to pray about that," he says. Ford then proceeds to defend his racial consciousness: He mentors black teenagers interested in becoming entrepreneurs. He makes a point of employing black interns at his firm. And he still lives in the 'hood (in the Brookland section of Northeast), near vacant lots where he played football as a boy and within walking distance of his elderly parents. "It's expected that when you obtain a certain level of success, you move out to the suburbs, but that's not me," he says. Not even after his house was mistakenly riddled with bullets five years ago in a drive-by shooting.

Do not mistake his business decisions for some lack of black pride, Ford insists. Like many black businessmen who have long felt like outsiders, Ford just wants "a chance to get into the room."

"If I get in the room," he says, "I'll show you what I can do. And I'm going to do whatever I can do to get in that room."

The 'Myth Men'

In a sense, Ford's quest to "get in the room" originated on George Washington University's campus in 1983. He, Andre Rogers and Thomas Spann -- classmates who became good friends -- would meet at the black student union and fantasize about owning a business together.

At the time, blacks made up about 2 percent of the student body. On the first day of a class on race relations, the men recall, some white and Asian students talked openly about their perceptions of black people: lazy, good only at sports, the biggest beneficiaries of affirmative action. It was the first time anyone had voiced such perceptions in their presence.

"We sat there with our mouths open," Ford, 41, recalled.

The trio, along with nine other black male students, decided to form a group called the "Myth Men," in part because no black fraternities existed on campus and they craved a social outlet. But the group's other mission was to try to dispel the negative stereotypes about black men.

After graduating, Ford, Rogers and Spann worked in various corporate jobs for 10 years before deciding to pursue their college fantasy. In 1998, they began meeting in Rogers's basement after work, throwing out questions and ideas about launching an information technology consulting firm. Where should they be based? What would attract clients? Where would funding come from? With his outgoing personality, Ford was chosen as chief executive. Rogers's fondness for spreadsheets and numbers made him a natural finance chief. And Spann, who had experience in management, would be the company's chief operating officer. Because they planned to illuminate clients' possibilities, they chose a name that suggested imparting knowledge and insight. Companies that worked with them, the partners figured, would be enlightened.

In 1999, the three men resigned from their corporate positions -- Ford as a manager at Intelsat; Rogers as a software developer for Fannie Mae; Spann as a senior analyst at NASD, a financial regulatory company. With their severance packages as seed money, plus $15,000 each in cash advances on credit cards, they rented a small, windowless space, just big enough for five desks, in an office building at 11th and G streets NW. (Enlightened still has that space but has since expanded to another floor.) The company's initial work came from small government jobs subcontracted to Enlightened by larger minority firms.

Enlightened now employs about 60 salaried and hourly workers who make as little as $9 an hour and as much as $110,000 a year. Expectations are high, and so is turnover: Since Jan. 1, 21 employees have either resigned or been dismissed. Last year, Spann left his executive's chair to become a consultant because he was away from his family too much.

Enlightened designs software programs, hosts Web sites and creates management systems for such clients as the departments of Labor, Housing and Urban Development and Veterans Affairs, as well as Fannie Mae and AOL. This year, Enlightened projects revenue of about $4 million. By the end of next year, Enlightened hopes to reach $8 million in sales and double its workforce, to 120.

The company has attracted notice. In 2003, Entrepreneur magazine named Enlightened one of the country's "best and brightest" companies. A year later, Inc. magazine ranked it among the 500 fastest-growing private companies in the country -- No. 264 -- based on its 550 percent revenue growth from 1999 to 2003. Enlightened also has one of the best credit rating and financial strength scores of small companies nationwide, according to Dun & Bradstreet, an independent financial analysis firm.

With such success, why so much fretting about image?

High Expectations

To Ford, perceptions are powerful.

DOJ_NMG_0095595

Take what happened when former Enlightened accountant Frank Wentink was hired last year. His friends told him that working for a black firm would not be so hard. Set-aside programs, they said, would make his workload easier. But Wentink, who is white, soon found that he was working through the weekends and pulling all-nighters and that Ford and his senior managers were always in the office "working their tails off," he said.

Such false assumptions drive Ford, the firm's big thinker who is responsible for long-range planning. A muscular 5-foot-11 and 205 pounds, Ford thunders into a room like a politician, laughing, shaking hands, demanding eye contact. With employees, he is often like a jovial, joke-cracking big brother. But when problems surface or deadlines approach, employees say, the big brother turns into a stern, no-excuses businessman.

Ford doubts that executives at BearingPoint Inc. or Perot Systems Corp., much larger competitors, have his kind of anxiety. They never have to worry about race being a factor in winning major contracts, he says.

Some of Ford's worries about image can be traced to a 2003 meeting between Enlightened's partners and a black procurement officer for a federal agency whose contract the company had just won. [Ford declined to identify the woman or her employer because the agency remains a client.]

The procurement officer told Ford that she had noticed the startled reaction of her colleagues, most of whom were white, when Enlightened's all-black team had entered the conference room to pitch its proposal. She said Enlightened needed to "lighten up" -- hire some white staff members -- to succeed in this town. According to federal personnel statistics, nearly 70 percent of federal contracting officers are white.

Ford was offended, but he did not let it show. He told the procurement officer that he understood she was trying to be helpful. But her comments suggested that no one would take a black-owned firm seriously. And he didn't want to believe that. But her advice began to eat away at him. He started looking to hire white men, white women, anyone who would signal that his company was diverse -- and thereby more desirable to clients.

He kept thinking back to his early years in the business world, after he had attended night classes at GWU to get his master's degree in information systems, landed a job with MCI Inc.'s internal consulting division, did well and ran into what he thinks was a racial ceiling. His bosses said he simply needed more patience. They also suggested something else.

"I think he was overly conscious of race to the point where it didn't serve him well," said Lynn K. Hall, his former boss at MCI. "He focused on it. It was an internal motivator, but it also colored his perception." Hall, who is white, said that when clients questioned Ford's abilities as a consultant, Ford often attributed those assessments to racial prejudice. She remembers when Ford was tapped to implement a new finance system at MCI. During the initial meeting, employees, most of whom were white, grilled Ford with questions about his plan's practicality. Ford thought his ideas were challenged because he is black. Hall disagreed. "All consultants face those challenges," she said, adding that Ford was an "excellent" worker who "always delivered" and would have eventually moved into management.

But Ford thought the company was devaluing him. The final insult: when he learned he was being paid less than a white woman he had trained to take over one of his former jobs. The woman, he was told, had a year more experience than Ford, which is why she was paid more. "But she was doing my old job," Ford says, exasperated. "Every time I would jump a hurdle, they still wouldn't let me in the room."

So he left MCI, became a manager for Intelsat's consulting arm, and for six years prepared for the day when he could run his own business.

Among Ford's most critical hires at Enlightened: Anita Hinnerichs, 33, the company's No. 4 executive, who manages most of its day-to-day operations. In the office, Hinnerichs wears her shoulder-length brown hair in a ponytail. But when accompanying Ford or Rogers to client meetings, she lets her hair fall to her shoulders. "I realize being a white woman in this town is an advantage," she says matter-of-factly. "If I can help get them get in the door, the work will keep them there."

One of Hinnerichs's unofficial roles is to make male clients, particularly white men, feel at ease. Recently, Hinnerichs attended a meeting with a white male government official who would not return phone calls or e-mails from Rogers and a senior male employee. Now, the client responds promptly -- but only if the correspondence is from Hinnerichs.

"If we're selling to men, females are more of a plus," Ford said. "But being passionate and hungry are more important than anything."

DOJ_NMG_0095596

This strategy may be good for business, but it has caused tension in the Enlightened offices, especially among black employees, who number seven of the 18 core staff members at headquarters. Some feel like systems analyst Akisha Campbell, who says that with seven years in business and a long list of satisfied clients, Ford has proven himself. "I don't see why race would still be a problem," Campbell said.

Managing black employees, Ford and Rogers say, can be challenging. Some work hard and want executives who look like them to succeed. Others are extremely talented and therefore difficult to keep because larger firms can offer them as much as $25,000 more in salary. And then there are those who expect special breaks, challenging their bosses to the point of insubordination.

"I have very high expectations, regardless of race," Ford said. "But when it is an African American person who disappoints me, I get hurt."

Work Ethics

Working through the night is common at Enlightened, though it is not always pleasant. Gospel music, late-night inspiration for Ford and Rogers, blares through their computer speakers. If you hear Fred Hammond or Byron Cage singing, you know Antwanye Ford and Andre Rogers are around.

But not everyone can fight exhaustion with church music. During a recent all-nighter, six workers were collaborating on a proposal due at 9 a.m. By 3 a.m., weary senior manager Habib Nasibdar demanded to know why only half the staff was still working. Where were the other senior staffers, he asked Ford. "Don't raise your voice at me. This is my house," Ford snapped.

Days later, the two men joked that whenever they fight, they end up getting a contract. "We have to fight more often," Ford said.

Ford and his No. 2, Rogers, often handle confrontations differently. Rogers, 40, is more patient, more pragmatic than Ford. When he deals with employees, he gives them specific, detailed instructions so there is no confusion. More introverted than Ford, Rogers was teased for being a bookworm while growing up in New York. He is happy to let Ford take center stage.

Ford was meeting recently with one of his advisers, a George C. Scott look-alike named Joseph Libby, when Rogers walked in. Libby took one look at Rogers's black suit and joked that it matched his dark skin. Rogers just laughed. "You'll never change," he told Libby, who runs a Fairfax insurance firm. Ford dropped his head, clearly irritated. As much as he treasures Libby's counsel, his gruff jokes are difficult to accept.

Embracing diversity can be as tricky at black-owned companies as anywhere else. Ford and Rogers are vocal Christians in a workplace that includes Jews and Muslims. Ford says he tries to ensure that all employees' faiths are respected. During Ramadan, he joined his Muslim workers in a sunrise-to-sunset fast. More recently, Ford opened a senior staff meeting with a prayer, asking God to "give us the guidance and wisdom to make the right decisions," which was followed by Rogers's, "thanking you, Lord, for the opportunity to worship."

"One of the perks of owning your own business is you don't have to deny who you are," said Ford. Though some people see spirituality as a sign of weakness, he says, he believes the opposite.

"We will be humble before God but bold before man."

Source of the Drive

Ford is driving his 2005 Porsche Carrera toward Saratoga and Montana avenues in Northeast. Growing up, he spent many days in this neighborhood hanging out with friends. It's 2 p.m., and Ford notices a dozen black men his age and younger standing in front of an apartment building. Some are holding wads of cash, others are shooting dice. Cruising by, Ford feels uneasy. He jokes that in his designer suit, he is dressed like "a victim," an attractive robbery target.

His family had a house near Hechinger Mall when he was a child. After school, Ford and his sister spent evenings at the J&K Upholstery shop their parents owned on H Street NE. John and Katherine Ford put their children through Catholic schools by exchanging tuition for upholstering chairs and sofas. Ford grew up hearing Jim Crow stories from his parents, who migrated to Washington from the segregated rural areas of North Carolina and South Carolina in the 1950s. Katherine Ford taught her children that the best way to overcome racism was through hard work and professionalism. "I wanted them to be the best at what they do," she said. "No matter what it was, be the best. No one can stop you if you're the best at what you do."

But trying to be the best can exact a toll. Now four months into his second marriage, Ford admits that his first marriage fell victim to the 18 to 20 hours a day he routinely put in starting Enlightened. Time management still isn't easy. His first son, 8-year-old Antwanye Eric II, was diagnosed with leukemia when he was 3. The disease is in remission, but watching young Antwanye endure years of chemotherapy and steroid treatments inspired Ford to give more to social causes. Every Enlightened employee is required to participate in at least two volunteer efforts a year. Through his wife, Tanya, Ford is stepfather to Jahleel, 10, who talks of opening his own dog-walking business.

Driving past his old haunts, Ford reflects on the economic progress that has rejuvenated some District neighborhoods while skipping others. Most of his childhood buddies are either dead or in prison, he says, victims of the 1980s crack epidemic. Though his heart tells him he can still hang out here because he is a local homeboy, his mind whispers that he no longer belongs here.

"It's just something I think about at times," he says.

Resolution

Ford wasted no time dealing with the headache that caused him to hurl his water bottle across the room. If the District was dissatisfied with Enlightened's work on the $400,000 D.C. inventory project, so was Ford.

He discovered that most of his employees were having the same problem: They would show up to count copying machines or fire trucks and be told that the work had already been done. Unknown to Enlightened's employees, another contractor had a similar assignment. The employees never reported this to their supervisors, and the supervisors never asked.

Immediately, Ford decided that more aggressive supervision was needed and moved one of his senior managers, Colleen Moses, off the project. He shifted two other managers from another assignment to take over. Moses was distraught. She had been in charge of the inventory project for nearly two years; Ford's quick decision stunned her. She sat alone in the conference room, tears streaming down her face. "I just hate that I disappointed him," she said. "I just wish I had the opportunity to fix it."

But her opportunity had passed. "The customer wanted it fixed now," Ford said. "Period."

Within days, Daniels, the D.C. official who hired Enlightened for the inventory project, called to say that everything was back on track. He had heard no further complaints. In appreciation, Ford gave his project workers $25 Chipotle restaurant gift cards.

Soon afterward, Ford received even better news: Enlightened was among four companies chosen for that multimillion-dollar contract updating the computer system used by the Court Services and Offender Supervision Agency. A guaranteed four-year stream of income. Ford gathered everyone for cake to celebrate.

Finally, Ford thought, he was in the room. The relentless hours and tough choices had paid off -- for now. Enlightened could indeed compete with the big boys. Not that Ford would stop worrying about the company's image -- or his own. Worrying, he says, keeps him hungry.

"We have to fight for every job we get," Ford says. "Once you start sitting back, relaxing, you lose the edge."

Conservatives: Keep Gay Marriage Out Of The Courts (NYT)

By David B. Rivkin Jr. And Lee A. Casey

The New York Times, November 17, 2006

CONSERVATIVES have consoled themselves since Election Day with the knowledge that many “conservative” social issues did well — including (and especially) the eight state “marriage amendments” on the ballot — even if the Republican candidates faltered.

These marriage measures, of which only Arizona’s was defeated, generally prevent recognition of gay marriages by defining marriage as a “union between a man and a woman” in the state constitutions. More than half of the states now have such constitutional provisions (some of which would also forbid same-sex civil unions), and conservatives need to reconsider whether that’s really what we want. There are, in fact, some very good reasons conservatives should oppose this approach.

The definition of marriage is, of course, of critical importance to individuals on both sides of the issue and to society at large. But at least since independence, the question of who may marry and under what conditions has been the province of the state legislatures. And it should have remained that way.

The justifications for stripping the legislatures of authority in this area and settling the matter in a state's constitution are wanting. It's true that courts in certain states — for example, Massachusetts — have interposed themselves in this debate, misconstruing "equal protection" guarantees as requiring recognition of gay marriages. But errant or aggressive judges can be corrected by amendments that simply deny the state courts authority over this issue, reserving the definition and regulation of marriage to the legislatures alone.

Moreover, the meaning of marriage, as important as it is, is no more crucial than many other issues of individual autonomy and morality that have also historically been decided by the legislatures. These include adoption and child-welfare laws, as well as a host of criminal and other regulatory measures of the greatest moment.

Indeed, cluttering state constitutions with the disposition of many difficult social issues — and this process will probably go on, and even accelerate, especially if all of the states choose to define marriage in their constitutions — is likely to empower the judiciary more. This paradoxical and unwelcome result would arise because some of the newly enshrined constitutional definitions and guarantees are sure to conflict with one another, leaving the courts the only venue for resolving the tension. Conservatives should find this outcome highly unpalatable.

At the same time, leaving the marriage issue to the state legislatures has many benefits. As Edmund Burke taught, time-tested institutions and practices should be changed only upon the clearest need, and then only to the extent necessary. If the courts in some states have trespassed on the legislatures' traditional and legitimate authority over marriage, they can be checked without altering the otherwise established norm of legislative power in this area.

Also, allowing the issue to be decided by state legislatures would be in the best tradition of American federalism: the states act as laboratories of political change, and remain free to give divergent answers to difficult social questions. Operating within the federalist context, state legislatures are likely to enact different definitions of marriage, some allowing same-sex unions, others banning them. Significantly, the federal Defense of Marriage Act, signed by President Bill Clinton in 1996, already ensures that the choices of one state cannot be imposed on others. If that statute is ultimately found to be ineffective or unconstitutional, additional steps can be considered at the federal level to ensure that individual state choices are respected.

If state legislatures were free to define and re-define marriage, we would have genuinely political solutions to an especially difficult and incendiary issue. Very few people do not hold deep convictions regarding same-sex marriage. To enshrine the definition of marriage in a state's constitution removes the issue from the give-and-take of the normal political process. That process rarely produces an absolute victory for any side, but it also rarely results in absolute defeat. The outcome is never final; the defeated party can rally, regroup and try again.

By contrast, a constitutional amendment resolves a policy issue with a sufficient finality to prompt a more or less permanent sense of injustice and bitterness on the losing side. Conservatives, religious conservatives especially, should understand these dynamics. In Roe v. Wade, the Supreme Court granted victory on constitutional grounds to the abortion-rights position in the abortion debate, and that decision has polarized American politics for nearly two generations. America does not need another such issue. The wave of marriage amendments — at least those that go beyond removing the issue from judicial resolution — should stop.

Pentagon Alters Homosexuality Guidelines (AP)

By Lolita C. Baldor

AP, November 16, 2006

Pentagon guidelines that classified homosexuality as a mental disorder now put it among a list of conditions or "circumstances" that range from bed-wetting to fear of flying.

The new rules are related to the military's retirement practices. The change does not affect the "don't ask, don't tell" policy that prohibits officials from inquiring about the sex lives of service members and requires discharges of those who openly acknowledge being gay.

DOJ_NMG_0095599

The revision came in response to criticism this year when it was discovered that the guidelines listed homosexuality alongside mental retardation and personality disorders.

Mental health professionals said Thursday they were not satisfied by the change.

"We appreciate your good-faith effort to address our concern that the document was not medically accurate," James H. Scully, head of the American Psychiatric Association, wrote David Chu, undersecretary of defense for personnel and readiness. "But we remain concerned because we believe that the revised document lacks the clarity necessary to resolve the issue."

The guidelines outline retirement or other discharge policies for service members with physical disabilities. The rules include sections that describes other specific conditions, circumstances and defects that also could lead to retirement, but are not physical disabilities.

Among the conditions are stammering or stuttering, dyslexia, sleepwalking, motion sickness, obesity, insect venom allergies and homosexuality.

"More than 30 years after the mental health community declassified homosexuality as a mental disorder, it is disappointing that the Pentagon still continues to mischaracterize it as a 'defect,' said Rep. Marty Meehan, D-Mass., a member of the House Armed Services Committee.

Pentagon spokeswoman Cynthia Smith said "homosexuality should not have been characterized as a mental disorder. A clarification has been issued."

The psychiatric association declassified homosexuality as a mental disorder in 1973. Questions about the Pentagon's guidelines were raised in June by a research institute at the University of California at Santa Barbara.

There were 726 military members discharged under the "don't ask, don't tell" policy during the budget year that ended Sept. 30.

Nursing Mom Files Complaint Against Airlines (USAT)

By Emily Bazar And Sam Hemingway

USA Today, November 17, 2006

A clash between a nursing mother and a flight attendant has sparked a discrimination complaint, an airline investigation and a grass-roots protest.

Emily Gillette, her husband, Brad; and their then 22-month-old daughter, River, were removed from an Oct. 13 flight from Burlington, Vt., to New York after a flight attendant asked Gillette to cover up while she was breast-feeding the girl.

Freedom Airlines operated the Delta Airlines flight.

Gillette, 27, filed a complaint against both airlines last week with the Vermont Human Rights Commission alleging that the airlines violated a state law that allows women to breast-feed “in any place of public accommodation.” The airlines have until Nov. 27 to respond, Gillette's attorney, Elizabeth Boepple, says.

In a show of support, about 30 mothers and fathers and dozens of children staged a “nurse-in” protest at Burlington International Airport on Wednesday.

“I've always nursed my children when I'm on a plane,” says Carolyn Beer, 34, of Burlington. “Their ears hurt with the altitude change, and it's a strange environment for them. The alternative is to let your kid scream.”

The Gillettes, of Espanola, N.M., boarded the flight shortly before 10 p.m. They had been in Vermont visiting friends and were headed to New York to see other friends and Emily Gillette's sister.

Gillette took the window seat in the second-to-last row, she says, and her husband took the aisle. She began nursing River, using one hand to hold her shirt closed. “I was not exposed,” she says.

The flight attendant approached, tried to hand her a blanket and asked her to cover herself, she recalls. “You're offending me,” Gillette quotes the woman as saying.

“I'm not doing anything wrong and I will not cover up,” Gillette says she said in response.

Spokesmen for the airlines declined to discuss specifics of the incident.

The flight attendant walked away, Gillette says, and a few minutes later, a ticket agent boarded and said the flight attendant had ordered them removed.

DOJ_NMG_0095600

The airline arranged for a hotel for the family for the night and a flight with a different airline the next morning, but Gillette wasn't satisfied.

“No woman should ever be ashamed of breast-feeding,” she says. She wants “both airlines to create policies that protect a woman from being harassed for feeding her child on an airplane.”

Delta is working with Freedom on an investigation, Delta spokesman Anthony Black says. “Delta supports a mother's right to breast-feed-slash-bottle-feed her babies on our aircraft,” he says.

Freedom spokesman Paul Skellon says breast-feeding on a plane is OK if it's done in a “discreet way.”

Forty-three states have some form of legislation protecting a woman's right to breast-feed, according to Mary Lofton, spokeswoman for La Leche League International, a group that encourages breast-feeding.

Lofton says the league has had a growing number of contacts from women who say they were harassed for breast-feeding on planes.

Sharon Panitch, 37, a massage therapist who organized the Burlington nurse-in, says people who object are “hypocritical.”

“We just want to take care of our children,” Panitch says.

ANTITRUST:

Justice Department Supports AT&T Merger (AP)

By Matt Apuzzo, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 17, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) - The Justice Department's top antitrust official on Thursday defended the agency's unconditional approval of AT&T's $82 billion buyout of BellSouth Corp. as "pretty straightforward" despite criticism from Democratic regulators and lawmakers.

The buyout would further reunite parts of the old Ma Bell phone monopoly, broken up by the government in 1984, and create the largest U.S. provider of telephone, wireless and broadband Internet services.

"We're living a very different world than we were in the 1980s," Assistant Attorney General Thomas O. Barnett said in an interview during an antitrust conference. "The mere size of a company in general doesn't tell you whether a merger is going to harm consumer welfare."

The Federal Communications Commission, the final regulatory hurdle for the deal to be approved, has delayed a final vote three times. Two Democrats on the FCC, Michael Copps and Jonathan Adelstein, have accused the Justice Department of falling down on the job.

Barnett said the agency spent months reviewing documents and interviewing customers and competitors before concluding that the deal probably would save customers money.

Once that conclusion was reached, "it's a pretty straightforward deal for us," he said.

If the deal wins final government approval, the merger would give San Antonio-based AT&T Inc. total control over the nation's largest cellular provider, Cingular Wireless, a joint venture of the two phone companies that serves 57.3 million customers.

Consumer rights groups have criticized the deal as putting too much of the telecommunications infrastructure under the control of one company.

Rep. John Dingell, D-Mich., who is in line to become the next chairman of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, told reporters last week that the FCC should wait until after the first of the year before making a decision. Dingell later backpedaled, saying he was only suggesting the deal should be "looked at and looked into carefully."

Companies Investigated Over Bidding (BLOOM)

By Bloomberg News

Bloomberg, November 17, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0095601

Law enforcement agents seized documents from three brokers and subpoenaed companies including at least two insurers and General Electric in a criminal investigation of whether banks and financial firms conspired to rig bids for investment deals with local governments.

The investigation by the Justice Department centers on guaranteed investment contracts, which municipalities buy to hold bond money until funds are needed to pay for projects.

F.B.I. agents searched CDR Financial Products, a financial adviser and broker in Beverly Hills, Calif., on Wednesday, said Laura Eimiller, a spokeswoman for the F.B.I. in Los Angeles, without providing further details.

Financial Security Assurance Holdings, a unit of the Brussels-based financial services company Dexia, said Wednesday that it was subpoenaed by the Justice Department.

The FGIC Corporation, a New York-based bond insurer, also received a Justice Department subpoena, Brian Moore, a company spokesman, said yesterday. Mr. Moore said FGIC, a former unit of General Electric, had exited the guaranteed investment contract business in 2003 when G.E. sold the company. The outstanding contracts remained with G.E.

G.E. also received a subpoena as part of the investigation, said a spokesman, Russell Wilkerson.

Federal investigators took documents Wednesday from the Investment Management Advisory Group, a broker of guaranteed investment contracts and municipal derivatives adviser based in Pottstown, Pa., said Gene Grabowski, a spokesman for the company.

Yesterday, a third guaranteed investment contract broker, Sound Capital Management, based in Eden Prairie, Minn., said federal investigators seized documents and served a subpoena for more documents.

FBI Seizes Montco Investment Broker's Records (PHI)

By Mark Fazlollah

The Philadelphia Inquirer, November 17, 2006

Federal agents have seized records from a Montgomery County investment broker and a California company in an investigation of whether banks and financial firms conspired to rig bids for investment deals with local governments.

The investigation centers on alleged bid-rigging in guaranteed investment contracts, which cities buy to hold bond money until funds are needed to pay for projects.

Federal agents took documents from Investment Management Advisory Group Inc., a Pottstown broker of guaranteed investment contracts, firm spokesman Gene Grabowski said. Besides seizing boxes of documents, FBI agents copied the hard drives of computers at the firm.

FBI spokeswoman Jerri Williams said agents from New York were assisted by the bureau's Philadelphia office.

"IMAGE received a subpoena from the Antitrust Division of the U.S. Department of Justice, and the company is cooperating fully with the authorities," the company said in a statement. "It is our understanding that subpoenas have been issued to numerous other firms and that the investigation is industry-wide. We are confident that our business practices and employees will be fully vindicated as this investigation continues."

IMAGE has been involved in at least two other recent federal corruption investigations.

Its top executives were among dozens of Philadelphia-area business officials listed on subpoenas issued last month by a federal grand jury in Puerto Rico looking into alleged improper campaign contributions.

A company spokesman said last week that IMAGE advised the Puerto Rican government on a bond deal in 2000.

IMAGE president David Eckhart and executive William Howell gave a total of $11,500 in 2002 to Anibal Acevedo Vila, the governor of Puerto Rico. Acevedo Vila's campaign returned part of the money because it exceeded contribution limits.

City Hall scandal

IMAGE also surfaced in the Philadelphia City Hall corruption investigation in 2004. According to testimony in the City Hall corruption trial, IMAGE provided former Philadelphia City Treasurer Corey Kemp with a $1,700 ticket to special events surrounding the 2002 NBA All-Star Game and a limousine ride to a concert in Scranton in 2003.

Kemp was sentenced to 10 years in prison. IMAGE was not charged with any crime.

DOJ_NMG_0095602

FBI agents also searched CDR Financial Products, of Beverly Hills, Calif., on Wednesday, said Laura Eimiller, a spokeswoman for the FBI in Los Angeles, without providing further details. Allan Ripp, a spokesman for CDR, declined to comment.

CDR - which also gave gifts to Kemp and the late power broker Ron White - had a secret agreement with the provider of a guaranteed investment contract for bonds issued in 1999 by an authority in Gulf Breeze, Fla., Bloomberg News reported on Oct. 4. Bloomberg said the deal allowed CDR to increase its fees if none of $220 million in bond proceeds was used for its intended purpose - affordable housing.

Belgium firm subpoenaed

Financial Security Assurance Holdings Ltd., a unit of Brussels, Belgium-based financial services company Dexia S.A., said Wednesday that it was subpoenaed by the Justice Department.

The actions by the Justice Department show that an investigation into how banks compete for the right to reinvest money raised in the $2 trillion market for tax-exempt bonds has expanded beyond the U.S. Internal Revenue Service. The IRS has been looking into whether brokers awarded the work to favored banks, potentially boosting the cost of the investment agreements and depriving the federal government of tax revenue.

"There's a lack of transparency in the whole market," Dan Veres, executive vice president of Grant Street Group, a Pittsburgh-based firm that conducts guaranteed investment contract auctions on its Web site, told Bloomberg News. "It is ripe for abuse, the whole process."

Justice Department spokeswoman Kathleen Blomquist said the agency was conducting an "investigation of anticompetitive practices in the municipal-bond industry."

The IRS's Office of Tax-Exempt Bonds said in January 2005 that it found pervasive bid-rigging for guaranteed investment contracts.

The IRS is looking into possible improper bidding that may have diverted money to banks and brokers that should have been paid in taxes.

Advisory Firms Raided In FBI Bid-rig Probe (LAT)

By E. Scott Reckard, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, November 17, 2006

A Beverly Hills office is among those searched for evidence of possible collusion in investments sold to public agencies.

The FBI raided financial firms on both coasts, including Beverly Hills-based CDR Financial Products, as part of an investigation into possible bid rigging on investments sold to public agencies, federal authorities and the firms said Thursday.

Federal authorities also seized information from at least one municipal bond insurer in connection with the probe. Another of the companies raided, Investment Management Advisory Group of Pottstown, Pa., said the investigation was industrywide and had resulted in subpoenas to a number of other firms.

CDR Financial and the other companies help cities, counties and public agencies invest money generated by bond sales in guaranteed investment contracts. Such contracts are used to allow the proceeds of bond issues to earn interest until they are spent on public projects.

CDR said it was cooperating with the investigation and remained open for business.

"The firm believes it has acted appropriately in all of the financings under review," CDR said in a statement.

The 20-year-old company, which employs about 25 people nationwide, said it had provided advice on $158 billion in transactions, including deals to invest municipal-bond proceeds.

FBI agents and criminal investigators from the Internal Revenue Service served a search warrant on CDR about 6 a.m. on Wednesday and remained there all day, said Laura Eimiller, an FBI spokeswoman in Los Angeles.

She said details weren't available because a judge had sealed the search documents.

A U.S. Justice Department spokeswoman in Washington, Cynthia Magnuson, said the agency's antitrust department was investigating the possibility of anti-competitive practices in the municipal bond industry. She wouldn't elaborate.

DOJ_NMG_0095603

Statements issued by CDR and several other firms said they had been searched as part of a 3-year-old investigation by federal agencies into suspected collusion in the market for guaranteed investment contracts.

Municipal bond issuers are required to select providers of such contracts through competitive bids, and generally hire brokers to determine which bid is best.

Bidding in any industry can be rigged if one provider submits a realistic offer and the others agree to propose terms so poor that they are certain to be passed over.

In such a scheme, participants typically divvy up the business by taking turns submitting the realistic offer.

Subpoenas in the case have been issued by the Securities and Exchange Commission in addition to the Justice Department and the IRS, said Financial Security Assurance Holdings Ltd., a New York municipal bond insurer that also was searched.

Financial Security, a unit of European financial services group Dexia, said it "is not aware of any specific allegations concerning its own practices."

FBI investigators also seized files and copied computer hard drives at Investment Management Advisory Group. Like CDR, the Pennsylvania firm acts as a broker for municipal bond issuers. It said it was cooperating with the antitrust investigation.

"It is our understanding that subpoenas have been issued to numerous other firms and that the investigation is industrywide," Investment Management said in a statement. "We are confident that our business practices and employees will be fully vindicated as this investigation continues."

2 Men Convicted In Scheme To Fix Concrete Prices (INDYSTAR)

By Kevin Corcoran

The Indianapolis Star, November 17, 2006

Noblesville cousins could face prison, fines; ready-mix company could owe $10 million

A two-year criminal investigation into price-fixing by ready-mix concrete companies in the Indianapolis area ended Thursday when a federal jury convicted two Noblesville men and their company of participating in the scheme.

After hearing 21/2 days of evidence in U.S. District Court, a jury of eight women and four men found cousins Chris A. Beaver, 42, and Ricky J. Beaver, 43, conspired with other ready-mix concrete companies to set prices from July 2000 through May 2004.

Frank J. Vondrak of the U.S. Department of Justice's Antitrust Division would not rule out further charges involving officials of companies serving Marion, Muncie and Bloomington, where trial testimony indicated price-fixing also took place.

Vondrak led a team of lawyers, including Jonathan A. Epstein and Eric L. Schleef, that won Thursday's guilty verdicts after a series of pleas by other participants. Most executives cooperated with the FBI and Justice Department in exchange for lighter sentences or immunity from prosecution.

During the trial, prosecutors repeatedly reminded jurors of guilty pleas made by concrete executives, including four officials of Greenfield-based Irving Materials Inc. That company agreed last year to pay a $29.2 million fine, the largest financial penalty ever in a domestic antitrust case.

"We are pleased that the jury decided to hold accountable these participants in a price-fixing scheme that deprived consumers in Indianapolis of the benefit of a competitive marketplace," Antitrust Division leader Thomas O. Barnett said in a statement.

As a result of the trial, the Beavers face maximum prison terms four times longer than those recommended for the ringleaders. The men face fines of up to $600,000 each. No sentencing date has been set.

Their company, MA-RI-AL Corp., which does business in Noblesville as Beaver Materials, faces a $10 million fine, or nearly as much as the company generated in average yearly sales during the scheme.

Chief Judge Larry J. McKinney will sentence the conspiracy's ringleaders, Gus "Butch" Nuckols III, 46, Fishers, and Scott D. Hughey, 51, Carmel, on Dec. 14.

Nuckols, president and owner of Builder's Concrete & Supply Co., testified under a plea agreement in which prosecutors agreed to recommend a 21-month sentence. Prosecutors have recommended a 24-month sentence for Hughey, who owns Hughey Inc., which does business as Carmel Concrete Products.

Hughey's testimony was critical to tying the Beavers to the conspiracy.

Testimony showed Nuckols and Hughey called a series of secret meetings with competitors to fix ready-mix concrete prices.

Much of the price-fixing involved setting a floor on discounts to already-uniform concrete prices, according to testimony from concrete executives who pleaded guilty or agreed to cooperate with officials.

Nuckols and Hughey also made repeated phone calls and held a series of smaller meetings with competitors to enforce compliance with price-fixing agreements. Testimony indicated the executives often violated these agreements, submitting bids for work that fell below the agreed-upon prices.

"I guess we all -- all the competitors -- were too selfish or too greedy to lose the accounts we had," testified Price C. Irving, 44, an Irving Materials executive who's already served his five-month sentence in a Terre Haute federal prison.

The Beavers' attorney, Jeffrey Lockwood, Anderson, argued that neither man had authority within the company to set prices. Chris Beaver was in charge of operations and was in line to run the company one day. Ricky Beaver was commercial sales manager.

Vondrak told jurors the Beavers' intent was clear: They showed up at several price-fixing meetings and never once objected to discussions about capping discounts to boost profits. Price fixing carries a maximum three-year prison term.

The Beavers also were found guilty of lying to the FBI, which carries up to a five-year sentence.

Family members wept and hugged the defendants as government attorneys, deputy U.S. marshals and the FBI case agent, Steven Schlobohm, stood silently nearby.

3rd Company Convicted Of Concrete Price Fixing (AP)

AP, November 17, 2006

INDIANAPOLIS - A federal jury convicted a Noblesville company and two of its executives on charges of conspiring with central Indiana competitors to fix the price for ready-mix concrete.

Jurors on Thursday found MA-RI-AL Corp., which does business as Beaver Materials, guilty of conspiracy. They also convicted cousins Chris Beaver, 42, and Ricky Beaver, 43, on charges of conspiracy and lying to FBI investigators.

Two other companies have been fined more than $30 million and several company executives have been sentenced to prison for their role in what prosecutors said was a scheme that lasted from January 2000 to May 2004 and resulted in millions of dollars in illegal profits.

Officials from the other companies testified during this week's trial that Chris Beaver, the operations manager for Beaver Materials, and Ricky Beaver, the commercial sales manager, attended meetings during which the firms agreed on prices and discounts and the timing of price increases.

The Beavers and the family owned company were the only ones whom prosecutors tied to the conspiracy that did not admit to their involvement.

Beaver Materials faces a potential fine of $10 million as a result of the verdict, but defense attorney Jeff Lockwood said he did not believe his clients regretted their decision to fight the allegations.

"When you're not guilty it is pretty difficult to make a deal," Lockwood said. "We didn't believe that there was ever any real evidence that they came to an agreement, joined a conspiracy, because no witness testified that they did anything except remain silent at these meetings."

Thomas Barnett, assistant attorney general in charge of the Justice Department's antitrust division, said he was pleased with the verdicts against the Beavers, calling them "participants in a price-fixing scheme that deprived consumers in Indianapolis of the benefit of a competitive marketplace."

DOJ_NMG_0095605

Ready-mixed concrete is made on demand and often delivered to work sites by mixer trucks. Buyers include home owners, building contractors, schools and the government for projects such as sidewalks, patios, driveways, bridges and roads.

The scheme came to light last year when Irving Materials Inc. of Greenfield agreed to pay $29.2 million in fines, which prosecutors said was the largest ever assessed in a domestic antitrust investigation.

A judge in June ordered Builder's Concrete & Supply Co. of Fishers to pay a $4 million fine for its role.

Burlingame Exec To Plead Guilty In Chip Probe (AP)

AP, November 17, 2006

(AP) BURLINGAME A former executive at a computer chip maker is the latest person to agree to plead guilty in a global U.S. Justice Department price-fixing probe, the government said Thursday.

D. James Sogas of Burlingame, ex-vice president of sales for Elpida Memory, agreed to plead guilty to violating the Sherman Act. He agreed to serve a seven-month prison term and pay a $250,000 fine if the plea deal is approved by a federal judge.

To date, the Justice Department has charged four companies and 17 people, and has secured fines totaling more that $731 million in the probe.

Four executives each from Samsung Electronics Ltd., Hynix Semiconductor Inc. and Infineon have pleaded guilty or agreed to do so.

Court papers filed in San Francisco said Sogas conspired to fix the price of DRAM chips from April 2001 to June 2002.

The price of DRAM or dynamic random access memory soared 95 percent in less than two months in late 2001. The six largest DRAM manufacturers control 96 percent of the global market.

DRAM is the most commonly used semiconductor memory product, generating some $25 billion in sales worldwide last year. It provides high-speed storage and retrieval of electronic information for personal computers, laptops, workstations, mobile phones, digital cameras, video recorders, TVs, game consoles and digital music players.

Sogas is charged with discussing with competitors the prices of DRAM to be sold to certain customers and agreeing with competitors to coordinate bids submitted to Sun Microsystems Inc.

The price-fixing scheme affected sales to U.S. computer makers Dell Inc., Hewlett-Packard Co., Compaq, IBM Corp., Apple Computer Inc., Gateway Inc. and Sun Microsystems Inc.

US Executive For Japan Firm Gets Prison In DRAM Probe (AFP-Y)

AFP, November 17, 2006

A former US executive for a Japanese chipmaker agreed to plead guilty and accept a seven-month prison term for participating in a global price-fixing conspiracy, officials said.

The Justice Department said D. James Sogas of Burlingame, California, former vice president for Japan-based Elpida Memory, also agreed to pay a 250,000 dollar criminal fine in the agreement filed in federal court in California.

Including Sogas, US prosecutors have charged four companies and 17 individuals, and have levied fines totaling more that 731 million dollars in the probe into price fixing of dynamic random access memory (DRAM), a widely used memory component in electronics.

"The (Justice Department) antitrust division remains steadfast in its commitment to deter illegal cartel activity and to hold accountable those who participate in price fixing conspiracies," said assistant attorney general for antitrust, Thomas Barnett.

According to the agency, DRAM is the most commonly used semiconductor memory product and is used in variety of computer, telecommunication, and consumer electronic products.

The chips are used in personal computers, mobile phones, digital cameras, video recorders, game consoles and digital music players. There were approximately 25 billion dollars in DRAM sales worldwide in 2005.

Last November, South Korea's Samsung pleaded guilty as a company to charges of price fixing in a deal that came with a fine of 300 million dollars.

US authorities have alleged a conspiracy with Samsung and other producers to fix DRAM computer chip prices between April 1, 1999 and June 15, 2002.

Former Elpida Executive Pleads Guilty To Price-Fixing (Update2) (BLOOM)

By Karen Gullo

Bloomberg, November 17, 2006

Nov. 16 (Bloomberg) -- A former executive at Elpida Memory Inc., Japan's biggest maker of computer memory chips, has agreed to plead guilty to participating in a scheme to fix chip prices, the Justice Department said.

D. James Sogas, a former vice president of sales at Tokyo- based Elpida, conspired with unnamed employees of other chipmakers to fix the prices of dynamic random access memory, or DRAM, chips from April 2001 to June 2002, federal prosecutors said in a statement.

The plea agreement stems from a four-year federal investigation into price fixing in the chip market that has led to claims against four companies and 16 individuals, and fines of $731 million, the U.S. said. Worldwide DRAM sales were $25 billion in 2005, the Justice Department said.

Sogas has agreed to serve a sentence of seven months in prison and pay a $250,000 fine, prosecutors said. He is also cooperating with the federal investigation. Elpida agreed in January to pay $84 million to settle price-fixing charges.

The agreement resolves allegations made against Sogas by federal prosecutors in San Francisco.

DRAM is the most commonly used semiconductor memory product. It's purchased by manufacturers such as Dell Inc. and Hewlett- Packard Co. for use in products including personal computers, laptops, printers, mobile phones, digital cameras and digital music players.

Sogas is the first Elpida Memory executive to agree to a prison sentence in the DRAM investigation, the Justice Department said. Lee Altschuler, Sogas's attorney declined to comment.

The case is U.S. v D. James Sogas, 06-0752, U.S. District Court, Northern District of California (San Francisco).

Banks Aid Buy-out Of Clear Channel (FT)

By James Politi

Financial Times, November 17, 2006

Two buy-out groups and five Wall Street banks on Thursday combined to buy Clear Channel Communications for $18.7bn, taking the largest US radio station chain private after a short but dramatic auction.

The deal, led by Bain Capital and Thomas H. Lee Partners, marks the latest and biggest effort by cash-rich private equity firms to refashion chunks of the traditional media industry challenged by the digital age.

The two firms will control a large outdoor advertising business and 1,200 radio stations accumulated in 30 years of deals by members of the Mays family, who founded Clear Channel in 1972 and will continue to run the company under its new owners.

JCDecaux, the French outdoor advertising company, said it was interested in buying Clear Channel Outdoor and the buyers “are aware of our interest”. Analysts have speculated that any buyer of the radio group would sell the outdoor advertising business to help finance the transaction.

The offer by T.H. Lee and Bain, already joint owners of Warner Music, surprisingly edged out a competing bid by Providence Equity Partners, Blackstone and Kohlberg Kravis Roberts, which had been discussing a deal for months before the company was put up for sale in October.

The chances of Bain and T.H. Lee emerging with the winning bid appeared to be further reduced this week when Texas Pacific Group, a third member of their consortium, pulled out.

But in a sign of how some of the largest banks are aching to participate in the private equity boom, Morgan Stanley, Citigroup, Credit Suisse, Deutsche Bank and Royal Bank of Scotland agreed to contribute about a third of the equity cheque, estimated at more than $5bn, as well as to finance the debt package of more than $21bn.

The deal could attract regulatory scrutiny, given the rising presence of private equity groups in the media industry. The Federal Communications Commission is reviewing whether to loosen media ownership limits.

The Clear Channel auction was controversial because of its short time-frame, which critics saw as preventing the board from attracting the highest offer, and the large pay-out that the Mays family will receive in the deal.

DOJ_NMG_0095607

The Texas-based company responded by allowing the board to solicit higher offers until December 7. In addition, the Mays family agreed to reduce the incentives it was entitled to in a “change of control”.

Clear Channel shareholders will receive $37.60 per share, or $18.7bn, in the buy-out. This values the company at about 12 times next year’s estimated ebitda. The buyers will be taking on about $8bn of its debt.

In A Big Bet On Radio,Private-Equity Group Buys Clear Channel (WSJ)

By Sarah Mcbride And Dennis K. Berman

The Wall Street Journal, November 17, 2006

In an age of intense competition from iPods, satellite radio and other glitzy new media, many investors have given up on the traditional radio industry. With an $18.7 billion buyout of radio giant Clear Channel Communications Inc., a group of private-equity investors is betting that the medium will be able to ride out the current storm much as it weathered past threats from television and other rivals.

A group led by Thomas H. Lee Partners LP and Bain Capital LLC has agreed to acquire Clear Channel for $37.60 a share, plus the assumption of about $8 billion in debt. Thomas Lee and Bain beat out a second group comprising Providence Equity Partners Inc., Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co. and Blackstone Group, which had bid $36.85 a share. Each firm will have about a one-third equity stake, leaving the remaining third divided among a consortium of banks and the Mays family, who will be eligible for an options pool representing 3% to 5% of the new company. Mark Mays, currently chief executive, and Randall Mays, currently president and chief financial officer, will continue in those roles. Founder Lowry Mays may stay on as chairman emeritus.

Separately, Clear Channel said it was selling its 42 television stations and 448 of its radio stations in smaller and medium-size markets. That would still leave the company a radio giant, with more than 700 stations around the country.

The deal is the latest in a string of private-equity transactions in the industry, underscoring the growing attraction of radio to private equity despite stagnant advertising revenue and other problems. The business's steady cash flow and what some see as an opportunity to increase revenue using new technologies such as digital radio have some investors saying the business has been undervalued by Wall Street.

The founding Mays family has a stake of only 7% in the company. Nonetheless, it has continued to be the dominant force even as the company's market value plummeted steeply in recent years because of lackluster ad revenue and the perception that the industry faced steep competition. Lately, advertising at Clear Channel's more than 1,150 radio stations has been trending upward, and its robust outdoor advertising business has been growing.

The Mayses are expected to cash out most of their stake through the transaction. The fact that the Mayses will stay on while also likely receiving a new chunk of equity from the firm's owners led to investor concern that the transaction might unfairly benefit the family more than other shareholders. The board's independent directors, led by Perry J. Lewis, moved to address such concerns by, for example, pressing the Mays family to give up a chunk of their change-of-control benefits as part of the transaction. Those benefits awarded the Mayses payments that are seven times their salaries and bonuses.

It was the willingness of the Mayses to waive more than half of those payments, according to a person familiar with the matter, that helped both the Lee/Bain group and the rival group move their bids higher. And it was additional equity funding from the winning group's banks that helped Bain and Thomas H. Lee pay up after one of their consortium members -- Texas Pacific Group -- dropped from the race.

Those equity backers include banks who don't usually put up their own capital in deals. Consortium lead adviser Morgan Stanley, for instance, is investing $500 million in the transaction, according to people familiar with the matter. Citigroup Inc., Deutsche Bank AG, Credit Suisse Group and Royal Bank of Scotland are also providing equity commitments. In addition, Wachovia Corp. is helping finance the transaction. Law firms Ropes & Gray and Dow Lohnes advised the buy-out consortium.

In an interview, Scott Sperling, co-president of Thomas Lee, and John Connaughton, a managing director at Bain, said they expect annual returns in the 20%-30% range for the company. The firms say they are largely behind the strategy that Mark and Randall Mays are already executing.

The firms plan to step up investments in areas such as cutting-edge radio technology, using the Internet as an extension of the main radio business, and digital billboards, for which advertisers pay higher rates. Clear Channel had already been investing fairly heavily in those areas.

Bain and Thomas Lee already have radio experience through their stakes in Cumulus Media Partners, a group that runs more than 30 stations in big markets like San Francisco and Houston. In addition, Thomas Lee is a member of a group that bought Univision, which has substantial Spanish-language radio assets.

The existing stakes in other media ventures create a potential conflict with the Federal Communications Commission, which imposes limits on the number of stations any one company can own in a market. Lawyers say the companies can get around this by cutting back their involvement in the smaller groups, such as Cumulus, so they no longer have active roles in running those companies. Alternatively, they could sell their stakes in the smaller ventures.

Goldman Sachs Group Inc. and attorneys at Akin Gump Strauss Hauer & Feld advised Clear Channel, with Lazard Ltd. and law firm Sidley Austin advising the company's "special advisory committee."

Clear Channel Sale To End Era (WP)

By Frank Ahrens

The Washington Post, November 17, 2006

Clear Channel Communications Inc. has agreed to sell the company to a consortium of private-equity firms and plans to shear off more than one-third of its 1,150 radio stations, dismantling a giant that dominated the industry and became the bogyman of media consolidation for the past half-decade.

Clear Channel is hard to avoid in Washington. It owns eight local radio stations, including popular rocker DC101, top 40 station Hot 99.5 and sports-talk WTEM-AM. It sells ad space atop hundreds of taxis and on the sides of bus stops and provides traffic updates through its Total Traffic Network unit.

The buyers, led by Bain Capital Partners and Thomas H. Lee Partners, agreed to pay $26.7 billion for the company, which includes the assumption of $8 billion in debt.

In a separate transaction also announced yesterday, Clear Channel said it would seek buyers for all of its television stations and 448 of its smaller radio stations, presumably because the private-equity buyers are not interested in owning television or small-market radio. The stations marked for sale are all outside the nation's top 100 markets, which would exclude Washington, the eighth largest.

The sell-off will mark the end of the consolidation era for the radio industry and its largest player, Clear Channel, and an acknowledgment by the company that it no longer is interested in smaller radio markets.

The predecessor to Clear Channel was founded by L. Lowry Mays and Red McCombs, former owner of the Minnesota Vikings, with the purchase of one San Antonio radio station in 1972. The company went public in 1984 and grew remarkably in the 1990s as the result of favorable Federal Communications Commission rules allowing for radio consolidation. The company topped out at more than 1,200 stations in 2000, just before radio ratings and ad revenue began to flatten as listeners moved elsewhere.

As the company grew, it received unfavorable press for its size and influence on music playlists and artist development. Clear Channel was criticized for homogenizing the sound of FM radio and strong-arming acts into playing company venues in return for airplay. The criticism became so intense that the company posted a "myth vs. facts" section on its Web site to answer charges.

Mays's sons, Randall and Mark, will continue to operate the stations under new ownership. As part of the sale, all three received substantial payouts, the value of which was not disclosed.

Bain and Lee also are bidding for Tribune Co., which owns several newspapers and television stations. That process is ongoing. But now that the two private-equity firms are set to own Clear Channel, an additional purchase of Tribune could force the private-equity firms to sell certain papers and television stations to comply with FCC regulations prohibiting one company from owning a newspaper and radio or television station in the same city.

DOJ_NMG_0095609

Clear Channel stock closed up $1.24 yesterday to close at $35.36. The buyers paid $37.60 per share, the highest price the stock has seen since mid-2004, and a 25 percent premium on its average price in the month ending Oct. 24. Last year, Clear Channel radio reported more than $3.5 billion in revenue, tops among radio groups. CBS Radio was second at $2.1 billion.

It's been all downhill for Clear Channel stock since its high of nearly $100 per share in 2000, and a buyout likely represents the greatest value its owners felt they could get for their shareholders and themselves.

The buyout is a "significant milestone in radio industry history," said BIA Financial Network radio analyst Mark R. Fratrik, noting the move of traditional media from public to private ownership.

"By going private, these companies and their financial backers believe that they can grow in value over the long term without being concerned about investors' quarterly targets," Fratrik said.

Bennett Zier, who managed Washington's Clear Channel stations until January, when he left to launch Daniel M. Snyder's Triple X ESPN Radio venture, said: "We're private, and we love it."

Top Task At Reader's Digest: Revival (WSJ)

By Sarah Ellison And Dennis K. Berman

The Wall Street Journal, November 17, 2006

Private-equity firm Ripplewood Holdings LLC, leading a group that agreed to buy Reader's Digest Association Inc. for $1.6 billion, now faces the tough challenge of turning around the long-declining magazine publisher.

To help do so, Ripplewood plans to integrate its existing media businesses, which include Time Life Books and the Weekly Reader, with Reader's Digest direct-marketing machine. Aside from the pint-sized magazine, Reader's Digest publishes 26 other titles, including faster-growing names such as Every Day with Rachael Ray and Backyard Living.

The deal comes as private-equity firms are bidding on a growing number of media properties struggling to cope with shifts in consumer habits brought on by the Internet and other new media. Reader's Digest, well known to many older Americans and people overseas, has been losing circulation for many years.

Four years ago, under pressure from investors unhappy with the company's performance, the founding Wallace family agreed to eliminate a dual-share voting structure that had allowed them to retain control of the company.

But there's been no improvement in the performance of the business, based in a sprawling colonial complex in Pleasantville, N.Y. Revenue has been flat for the past three years. And the company, which has taken write-downs of book-fair business Books Are Fun, has posted operating losses for the past two years.

Still, the company has been steadily building up other parts of its business, launching 14 magazine titles in the past three years. By taking the company private, Ripplewood and the company's management see an opportunity to invest more heavily in faster-growing properties such as Every Day with Rachael Ray; Taste of Home, a cooking magazine that prints recipes from readers; and the Web site Allrecipes.com.

"One of the big advantages of being private is that you can tolerate failure and make experiments," said Tim Collins, Ripplewood's chief executive officer. Reader's Digest has put "very little money into [celebrity cooking host] Rachael Ray and it is going gangbusters. And we can do more of that by not worrying about next quarter's earnings."

Ripplewood also hopes to push the titles more heavily into the Web. Mr. Collins suggested that readers of Family Handyman magazine, for instance, could ask home-remodeling questions of an editor online, contribute to an online forum, and read electronic advertising related to the project.

Reader's Digest CEO Eric Schrier told employees in a memo yesterday morning that the sale was a "momentous step, but it does not fundamentally change what we are trying to accomplish together."

Ripplewood is paying $17 a share, a 9.6% premium on Reader's Digest's closing stock price Wednesday. Reader's Digest shares were up $1.19 to $16.70, below the offer price, in 4 p.m. New York Stock Exchange composite trading.

Coming after several years of stagnation in the company's stock, the deal pleased some shareholders. "We applaud Reader's Digest Board on the transaction announced today," said Clifton S. Robbins, CEO of Blue Harbour Group, which owned 6.9% of the company as of Sept. 30.

Other shareholders are holding out hope that another bidder will emerge. "We're not hostile towards the announcement but it remains to be seen is if this is the best price available," said Leon Cooperman, chairman and CEO of investment firm Omega Advisors Inc., which owned about four million shares of Reader's Digest, or 4.2% of the company, as of Sept. 30.

Ripplewood has emerged as a somewhat different animal compared with the mass of large-scale buyout firms competing for the likes of Clear Channel Communications Inc. Preferring to work alone and in areas deeply out of favor with other investors, it has scored a number of large successes. The best was a deal shared with former banker J.C. Flowers, in which the two turned a $1 billion investment in a Japanese bank into a stake worth about seven times that amount back in 2004.

Aside from Ripplewood, J. Rothschild Group, GoldenTree Asset Management, GSO Capital Partners, Merrill Lynch Capital Corp. and Magnetar Capital are part of the group purchasing Reader's Digest.

RTL Eyes £5bn Move For ITV Group (FT)

By Andrew Edgecliffe-johnson

Financial Times, November 17, 2006

RTL, Europe's largest broadcaster, is working with private equity backers on a possible £5bn-plus ($9.4bn) offer for ITV, the UK television company that is waiting for NTL, the US-listed cable company, to formalise the bid approach it made last week.

Its plan envisages private equity groups putting up most of the funds needed to acquire ITV, which has a market capitalisation of £4.5bn and almost £1bn in debt.

The structure would allow RTL to acquire a minority stake without calling on Bertelsmann, the German media group that owns 90 per cent of its shares, to fund the deal.

After Bertelsmann bought out its only outside shareholder in May for €4.5bn ($5.8bn), it said its debt load would preclude any large deals until the end of 2007.

RTL would not comment, but the group is understood to be concerned about overpaying, so a steep rise in ITV's share price could yet derail its plans. One media executive cautioned that the plan had just a 50 per cent chance of succeeding.

A formal offer by NTL for ITV could also deter RTL. The chairmen of ITV and NTL have yet to meet, but NTL has already begun lining up financing for the deal, which would greatly increase its debt load, and has approached Michael Jackson, the former Channel 4 chief executive, to run ITV if its offer succeeds.

RTL is thought to be examining alternative purchases in the European television industry at the same time, but its interest in ITV will heighten expectations that ITV's board could find it hard to remain independent.

Gerhard Zeiler, RTL's chief executive, said on Monday that it was not in talks with ITV "at the moment" but would not rule out a deal.

Private equity groups are rumoured to be struggling to value ITV at much above 125p, but valuations will depend on their estimates of when its declining advertising revenues turn round, something Mr Zeiler said on Monday he did not expect to see within a matter of months.

Buying the UK's largest commercial broadcaster would fill an important gap for the Luxembourg-listed group, which owns a smaller UK terrestrial channel, Five, but has market-leading positions in most other European markets.

RTL and Kohlberg Kravis Roberts are understood to have been looking at ITV since the spring, when a private equity team of Apax Partners and Goldman Sachs attempted to gain control of the company for 130p per share. However, KKR is not currently thought to be involved in RTL's pursuit of ITV.

It is expected that RTL would have to sell Five, where it acquired full control last year, for regulatory reasons and to help finance the deal.

J&J To Buy Conor Medsystems For $1.4B (AP)

AP, November 17, 2006

J&J to Acquire Conor Medsystems for About $1.4 Billion Cash, or $33.50 Per Conor Share

DOJ_NMG_0095611

NEW BRUNSWICK, N.J. (AP) -- Johnson & Johnson said late Thursday it will buy cardiac stent maker Conor Medsystems Inc. for $33.50 per share in cash, for a total value of about $1.4 billion. The purchase price represents a 21 percent premium to Conor's Thursday closing stock price.

The company said the deal gives J&J's Cordis unit the controlled drug delivery technology currently used on the CoStar Stent System, a paclitaxel-eluting cobalt chromium stent with a bioabsorbable polymer.

The CoStar Stent is currently sold outside the United States, and enrollment in its U.S. pivotal clinical trial has been completed. The stent is used for the treatment of narrowing of the arteries and the company hopes it will be used as a treatment for heart attacks.

Conor Medsystems' CoStar Stent uses reservoir drug-delivery technology that enables site-specific drug delivery as well as the potential for delivery of multiple drugs that may be useful in the treatment of cardiovascular, peripheral vascular and neurovascular diseases.

The boards of both J&J and Conor have approved the transaction, which is expected to close in the first quarter of 2007, subject to antitrust clearance, Conor stockholder approval and other customary closing conditions.

Menlo Park, Calif.-based Conor Medsystems will operate as part of the Cordis franchise. The company has about 200 employees and posted 2005 sales of $2.3 million.

Upon closing, Johnson & Johnson expects to record a one-time charge of about $600 million to write off in-process research and development costs. Excluding these items, the deal will modestly dilute J&J's earnings per share in 2007.

J&J shares closed earlier down a penny at $66.53 on the NYSE, and slid 13 cents after-hours. Conor shares rose 47 cents to close earlier at $27.52 on the Nasdaq.

FTC Chair: Gasoline Price-gouging Law Is Unneeded But Will Pass (AP)

By Matt Apuzzo, Associated Press

AP, November 17, 2006

WASHINGTON – The head of the Federal Trade Commission predicted Thursday that Congress would pass a gasoline price-gouging law despite her warnings that the country doesn't need one and it might cause fuel shortages.

FTC Chairwoman Deborah Platt Majoras said she has warned Congress publicly and privately about the dangers of such a law.

“We looked vary carefully but didn't see any new legislation needed to protect consumers,” Majoras said at an antitrust conference Thursday. “Will new legislation be passed? I think we will see a price-gouging statute pass, perhaps at the end of this (incoming) Congress.”

With gas prices rising to over $3 per gallon this spring, the House passed a bill permitting large fines and jail time for price gougers. The Senate has not acted on it and Sen. Max Baucus, D-Mont., the incoming Finance Committee chairman, said Thursday, “There's a lot more that has a higher priority.”

Majoras said she understood the public's frustration and concern but said an upcoming FTC report on the price spikes found that consumer demand was up at the time.

“There is a distinction between a market determination you don't like and a market failure,” she said.

Testifying in May before the Senate Commerce Committee, Majoras said retailers might let the gas run out rather than raise prices and risk facing prosecution. She noted the price spikes after Hurricane Katrina last year resulted in more fuel getting to market.

Majoras, who has previously questioned whether a price-gouging law could easily be enforced, said Thursday that despite her concerns, the agency would enforce the law if it passed.

The Justice Department's top antitrust official, Assistant Attorney General Thomas O. Barnett, attended Thursday's conference and said addressing fuel prices was a tricky issue for his agency.

He said that like all cartels, the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries is bad for consumers. But he said any effort to hold OPEC to U.S. competition laws would have to be balanced with national security and diplomatic interests.

Delta Seeks Creditor Help To Fend Off US Airways Bid (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0095612

By Evan Perez And Melanie Trottman

The Wall Street Journal, November 17, 2006

Delta Air Lines began trying to rally support from creditors for its push to fend off an $8.76 billion hostile takeover bid by US Airways, with the Atlanta carrier firmly reiterating its determination to emerge from bankruptcy as a standalone company.

Delta Chief Executive Gerald Grinstein and other executives at the third-largest U.S. airline by traffic held a series of conference calls yesterday with creditors to sift through terms of US Airways' cash-and-stock offer, pressing creditors to back Delta's restructuring plan. The move could give Delta an early advantage in its fight to remain independent, since US Airways hasn't had any face-to-face meetings with Delta's official creditors committee.

US Airways officials were still trying to arrange a meeting with representatives of Delta's official creditors committee. People familiar with the situation said such a meeting could come as early as next week, with Delta officials expected to attend. "We're looking forward to meeting with them. We want to sit with them and show them the value of this deal," said US Airways spokeswoman Andrea Rader.

The Atlanta airline said the executives were reviewing the unsolicited proposal, which seeks to combine US Airways, based in Tempe, Ariz., with its much bigger rival under the Delta name and become the biggest US airline in terms of passenger traffic.

"As we are obligated to, we will continue to work, including with our creditors, to examine the unsolicited proposal from US Airways," said Marshall S. Huebner, of Davis Polk & Wardwell, who has led Delta's restructuring.

Delta faces the burden of proving to creditors that the airline would be more valuable by itself after restructuring than US Airways' bid. US Airways said its offer of $4 billion in cash and 78.5 million of its shares was at least a 25% premium based on where unsecured Delta bonds were trading. Delta's 8.300% coupon bonds maturing Dec. 15, 2029, are up nearly $236 per $1,000 of face value since Tuesday according to data from bond-tracking company MarketAxess. Doug Parker, US Airways CEO, has pointed to the rise in Delta's unsecured bonds as a sign that at least unsecured bondholders thought US Airways offered a better deal.

However, antitrust concerns could squelch a deal or make it less attractive. Also, Delta management has the exclusive right to present restructuring plans through Feb. 15 and could stymie US Airways' efforts to gain financial data necessary to put together a detailed offer to creditors. Delta officials are aiming to exit bankruptcy as early as April, which puts pressure on Mr. Parker to act fast.

US Airways stock continued its post-proposal rally, rising $1.11 to $60.61 as of 4 p.m. in New York Stock Exchange composite trading; the shares are up 19% since Tuesday, the day before the bid was announced.

Meanwhile, Mr. Grinstein continued his defense to employees and creditors of his plan to emerge from bankruptcy as a stand-alone carrier. Mr. Grinstein learned of the proposal from a radio report as he was getting ready for work. He rushed to his Blackberry to find a letter and a voicemail from Mr. Parker.

People familiar with the matter said Mr. Grinstein was steaming from being blindsided. In a message to employees he said "we had no advance warning of any kind." He said his intent was that Delta remain a "standalone company."

One of the biggest hurdles for a successful US Airways-Delta merger will be resistance from US Airways' labor union leaders, who voiced opposition to a proposed deal yesterday. Management must still combine the work forces of its two predecessor airlines, US Airways and America West, and negotiate new pay and benefit contracts.

"If this airline can't successfully put two airlines together, we're very skeptical about their chances of putting three together," said Jack Stephan, chairman of the unit of the Air Line Pilots Association union at US Airways.

Even before the Delta bid surfaced, pilots at US Airways had planned to picket this week at airports in Phoenix and Charlotte. Yesterday nearly 600 of them showed up to protest what they say are substandard contracts with little-to-no improvement in pay or benefits and unreasonable work rules.

Ms. Rader, the US Airways spokeswoman, said the negotiations have had some progress, though it has been on low-hanging issues so far. She disagreed with the union's assertion that the current merger is not working well. "There are a lot of milestones that we are hitting and that we're on track to meet and when we make mistakes we get them fixed," she said.

If Delta Merges: Fares Up, Fewer Seats (CSM)

DOJ_NMG_0095613

By Alexandra Marks

The Christian Science Monitor, November 17, 2006

Whenever a big airline deal is proposed, the first question that arises usually is: What will it mean for the flying public?

In the case of US Airways' announcement this week that it hopes to acquire bankrupt Delta Air Lines for $8 billion, the simple answer is: higher prices.

That's because the merger would cut capacity by about 10 percent - in other words, passengers would have 10 percent fewer seats to choose from when they fly, which usually drives up prices. That would be good for the overall industry's bottom line.

But the dynamics behind this proposed merger, and the still precarious state of the nation's recovering aviation industry in the post-9/11 world, make the ramifications for the public far less clear. Add to that, it's far from a done deal: It still needs approval from the bankruptcy courts and the Justice Department. As a result, analysts have starkly different assessments of "just what this will mean."

One camp thinks it's the best thing to happen to the industry bottom line since jet fuel prices dropped below $70 a barrel. That's because it will cut capacity. "Anytime you take capacity out of the industry, I would view it favorably," says Helane Becker, an analyst at the Benchmark Company in New York.

But a different school of thought says that with planes already flying 80-to-90 percent full, overcapacity in the industry is no longer a major issue. After all, the traditional, so-called legacy carriers are making money even with oil at $60 a barrel.

"Forget the capacity canard: Everything is already full. There's already a resurgence in the industry," says Michael Boyd, president of the Boyd Group, an aviation consulting company in Evergreen, Colo. "If we take another 10 percent capacity out, that means airlines will carry fewer people and charge them more. Congress will just love that."

Then, of course, there's the question of what it will mean for competition. US Airways contends the combined company, which would become the "New Delta," would be more efficient and thus a better competitor in the recovering marketplace. The combined operations would save $1.65 billion a year by doing away with duplication, consolidating information systems, and reducing overhead, it says. And all those efficiencies can be achieved without cutting a single destination that's currently served by either airline, according to Doug Parker, US Airways chairman and chief executive.

"Even with a 10 percent reduction in capacity, all existing U.S. destinations served today by US Airways and Delta will remain part of the new, improved network," Mr. Parker wrote to Delta's chairman in an open letter released Wednesday morning. "Consumers will have the advantages of a larger, full-service airline with the cost structure of a low-fare carrier, and the communities we serve, as well as those Delta serves, will have access to a wider range of network options."

Some analysts like Mr. Boyd doubt those touted savings can be achieved. He also thinks the airlines' route structures - which are similar, particularly in the South and East, where they own the competing Northeast corridor shuttles - could cause problems at the Department of Justice.

"It doesn't make any sense at all. The synergies aren't there like they're claiming," says Boyd. "And the DOJ might turn this down in a heartbeat, because it just decimates competition, particularly in the Deep South."

Other analysts also question whether the cut in capacity brought about by the merger would result in anything but a short-term gain for the industry as a whole, particularly if there's a recession next year. In that case, the majors might start increasing capacity to fend off competition from low-cost carriers, which have continued to expand their market share, says Kevin Mitchell of the Business Travel Coalition in Radnor, Pa.

And then, the industry could find itself right back where it is today: charging prices that are so low it is just barely able to make a profit.

Another question is how easy it will be to make one company from two that have very different corporate cultures. There are seniority lists to merge and very different unionized workforces to integrate. The companies even fly different planes.

"This is not an industry where mergers often go smoothly, even when both parties are willing participants," says Clint Oster, an aviation expert at Indiana University in Bloomington. "It's hard to believe that it's not going to be very difficult to do in this case, particularly because it appears to be more of an equivalent to a hostile takeover."

But other analysts, who believe next year will be a good one for the industry, say the merger will help consolidate what is still a fairly fragmented industry. They also believe that higher prices brought about by a merger not only are necessary, but could be here to stay.

"If you compare by historical standards, we're still flying very cheap," says Ray Neidl of Calyon Securities in New York. "Longer term, if you can continue to get some of the peripheral capacity out of the system, it will give [the majors] even stronger pricing power."

In the end, all the analysis could be academic. US Airways still has to convince Delta's creditors and a bankruptcy judge that a merged company could do better than Delta alone. It also has to win approval from the Department of Justice, which frowned on a merger between US Airways and United just a few years ago.

US Airways, Delta Deal Would Cut Options (USAT)

By Dan Reed And Barbara Hansen

USA Today, November 17, 2006

Travelers in at least two dozen Eastern and Southeastern cities would see their air travel options significantly reduced by a merger between US Airways and Delta Air Lines.

According to a USA TODAY analysis of airline data from Back Aviation Solutions, a merged carrier would have 50% or more of the scheduled capacity in 111 markets in the USA. That's up from 55 markets for US Airways and 31 markets for Delta. Both carriers are strong in the East and South, so not surprisingly, many of the communities that would see the biggest loss of choice are there, too.

The analysis follows a bid Wednesday by US Airways to acquire Delta Air Lines for $4 billion in cash and for stock valued at about $4.7 billion. US Airways is seeking to acquire its bigger rival out of Chapter 11 bankruptcy. If successful, the merged airline would eclipse American as the world's largest.

Delta management has been resistant to any takeover bid, and says it prefers to emerge from bankruptcy reorganization next year as an independent carrier. Delta CEO Gerald Grinstein had previously rejected two private approaches from his counterpart at US Airways, Doug Parker.

The proposed deal would require approval from the bankruptcy court, federal antitrust officials and US Airways shareholders.

The USA TODAY analysis combines the number of seats currently offered by both carriers at airports across the country to identify areas of greatest impact. US Airways officials have said that the “New Delta” would trim current capacity by about 10%. It also plans to divest one of two Boston-New York-Washington, D.C., shuttles operated by US Airways and Delta.

According to the analysis:

•Six Eastern airports that now have competition would be served exclusively by the combined airline: Wilmington and Fayetteville, N.C.; Florence, S.C.; Huntington, W.Va.; Lynchburg, Va.; and Augusta, Ga.

•In 25 Eastern and Southern airports, where neither carrier now provides more than 50% of the service, the combined carrier would become dominant by providing more than half of the capacity. Among them: Asheville and Greensboro, N.C., and Charleston, S.C., Mobile, Ala., and Richmond, Va.

•Travelers in the carriers' respective hub markets in the East wouldn't see their choices diminish much. Delta already has 73% at Atlanta. A merger would nudge up that share by a percentage point. At Charlotte, where US Airways' capacity share is now 88%, the combined carrier would have 90%.

Additionally, US Airways says that “New Delta” would rank as the No. 2 carrier in the Pacific Northwest, No. 3 in the Southwest and California, and No. 4 in the central USA.

It's not clear that the proposed merger would reduce competition enough for the U.S. Justice Department to oppose it on antitrust grounds. In fact, it's not certain that US Airways' bid to buy Delta will even get that far.

If it does, says Mark Schechter, an antitrust attorney at the Howrey firm in Washington, D.C., “I would see a pretty extensive investigation.”

DOJ_NMG_0095615

The last two big reviews of proposed airline combinations were challenged by the Justice Department because of its concerns about market concentration, says Schechter, a top attorney in the antitrust division in the 1980s.

A separate analysis Thursday by JPMorgan analysts Jamie Baker and Mark Streeter identifies six big markets where the merged airline would move from “moderate” to “high” in market concentration under a measure used by antitrust regulators. They are New York/Newark; San Francisco; Washington; Las Vegas; Seattle; and Boston.

US Airways officials began addressing potential concerns about market concentrations right out of the box on Wednesday. CEO Parker, in a conference call with analysts, stressed that last year's acquisition by America West, his old company, of then-bankrupt US Airways led to an average 24% drop in fares.

Chief Executive Of Would-be Delta Buyer No Stranger To Bold Moves (AP)

By HARRY R. WEBER

AP, November 17, 2006

ATLANTA - When JetBlue announced in April it was launching flights to Charlotte, N.C., a major hub city for US Airways, JetBlue's CEO belittled the service passengers in that city had been getting as "substandard."

US Airways' chief executive, Doug Parker, shot back in a letter to his own employees: "US Airways is going to be here long after JetBlue."

Analysts, industry experts and those familiar with Parker's reputation said Thursday the 45-year-old's hostile bid to acquire a bigger rival in Delta Air Lines was not surprising, given bold statements like that one.

"I think anybody has to be feisty to do what he's doing," said Boston University School of Management Professor Allen Michel, referring to the unsolicited offer for Delta launched Wednesday by US Airways. The cash and stock bid to buy Delta once it emerges from bankruptcy is currently valued at $8.8 billion.

Parker's also been described as genial and approachable. Observers say those qualities could help him and his Tempe, Ariz.-based airline win over Delta employees.

"He looks like a guy who runs an airline and works at it very hard," said Fruman Jacobson, a bankruptcy attorney at Sonnenschein Nath and Rosenthal in Chicago. "If you go out for beers, Doug Parker is a guy you'd like to have with you."

Parker, who has held management positions at Northwest Airlines and American Airlines, led America West when it bought US Airways last year and adopted the US Airways name. While he's still integrating the two carriers, he says he's ready to tackle an even bigger challenge in acquiring Delta. This time, the company would keep the Delta name, becoming the nation's largest carrier in terms of revenue.

Delta's chief executive, Gerald Grinstein, said in a memo to employees late Wednesday that the Atlanta-based airline is committed to its plan to emerge from bankruptcy as a standalone carrier.

He also said "the history of mergers in the airline industry is almost always one of failure, with over-promise of synergies and under-delivery of results."

Parker clearly has a different view, that consolidation is the wave of the future in the airline industry. He also knows that the bankruptcy process gives him an opportunity to pitch an alternative plan to Delta's creditors. Whether his bid for Delta works or not, analysts tend to agree with Parker that major carriers need to combine to reduce capacity in the industry.

"I think he's gotten a little bit emboldened by the merger with US Airways," said Jacobson.

Parker, with bankers, investors, creditors, politicians and consultants biding for his time Thursday, did not immediately return calls seeking comment. He said in an interview Wednesday he believes the Delta bid is a fair one. Efforts to reach Delta executives Thursday were not successful. One senior executive, Glen Hauenstein, canceled a lecture at Georgia's Kennesaw State University, according to a school spokesperson.

In an audio message to employees Thursday, Grinstein answered concern from some Delta employees that they learned of US Airways' offer from the media rather than Delta. "We had no advance warning of any kind," Grinstein said.

Michael E. Levine, who was an executive at Eagan, Minn.-based Northwest Airlines Corp. during the same period as Parker, said Parker is aggressive and driven.

DOJ_NMG_0095616

"He takes risks," said Levine, now a senior lecturer at the New York University School of Law. "He ran with the bulls at Pamplona - I wouldn't do a thing like that. He can certainly count. He would like to run a big airline, and apparently this one isn't big enough."

Levine said the only question one might ask about Parker is whether at some point he might bite off more than he could chew.

"I'm not claiming this is that case," Levine said. "Doug is a guy who pushes ahead, and is unlikely to hesitate in the face of obstacles that might daunt other people."

Bernie Han, who has worked with Parker at three different airlines over the past 18 years, said the bold move to buy up Delta doesn't surprise him.

"I've seen him move up about every step of the way in his career," said Han, a former chief financial officer at Northwest and now the CFO at EchoStar Communications Corp. "Every time he gets the bigger job it seems effortless. I think it's clear he's always had the capacity to do more than his current role."

Even so, the bid for Delta poses several challenges. Those include proving to creditors that the offer is superior to what they'd get from the solo bankruptcy reorganization plan Delta plans to file, or a potential rival bid prompted by the US Airways offer. Parker also needs to nail down an agreement soon, as Delta has said it plans to emerge from Chapter 11 in the first half of next year.

US Airways also still has the America West integration to deal with. Its pilots pressed their case for a consolidated contract by taking to the picket line at the company's Phoenix and Charlotte hubs on Thursday.

"It's a question of, do you think an independent restructuring can create that kind of value or is the roll-up a more compelling structure because you can get revenue synergies and force out additional costs," aviation consultant Robert Mann said about how creditors would view the Delta deal.

News of the proposed US Airways buyout has also caught the attention of the Justice Department' top antitrust official. At a conference on antitrust law Thursday, Assistant Attorney General Thomas O. Barnett discussed his agency's priorities, then added: "I strongly suspect we may be spending some time in the airline industry as well."

After a big run-up in its stock Wednesday that added to the initial $8 billion value of its bid for Delta, shares of US Airways Group Inc. rose another $1.11, or 1.9 percent, to $60.61 in trading Thursday on the New York Stock Exchange. Delta Air Lines Inc. shares are traded over the counter.

AP Business Writers Joshua Freed in Minneapolis, Vinnee Tong in New York and Matt Apuzzo in Washington contributed to this report.

Flying High In The Busy Skies (NYT)

The New York Times, November 17, 2006

US Airways' $8 billion offer for Delta Air Lines could kick off a wave of consolidation in the airline industry. The question for regulators is whether the result is a leaner, meaner industry with lower costs or just a case of less competition driving prices higher. Without allowing a free-for-all to break out, there is clearly some room for combining operations in this changing industry.

Even with high fuel prices and strong demand for tickets, the fierce competition between airlines has helped hold prices down on many routes, keeping consumers happy. Low-cost carriers like JetBlue Airways and Southwest Airlines have put particular pressure on older full-service carriers like Delta. US Airways went through bankruptcy twice in the last four years, before merging with the discount carrier America West Airlines.

According to US Airways, if it succeeds in its bid for Delta the combined company would save $1.65 billion a year by eliminating redundancies. The fact that the two airlines offer competing shuttle service between Boston, New York and Washington raises a big concern: that all these savings could come about as a result of dampened competition and thus at the expense of consumers.

But the carriers clearly aren't just crying wolf. No one could have missed the fact that oil prices have been sky high. The low-cost airlines are a high-profile presence, all over the airwaves touting their competitive advantages. If the Justice Department is aggressive about keeping competition by demanding that airlines divest part of their business on individual routes like the shuttle, some sensible consolidation could take place.

Domestic carriers should take care when it comes to raising fares. There are plenty of foreign carriers that would love to gain access to the United States domestic market. If the locals get lazy and expensive, they could compel Congress to open the door to outside competition. It wouldn't be a bad idea to re-examine the idea now, before the merger wave has crested.

Grupo Mexico To Fight Antitrust Ruling (AP)

AP, November 17, 2006

MEXICO CITY --Mexican mining and railroad company Grupo Mexico said Thursday it will fight the federal antitrust commission's decision to uphold a previous ruling that blocked the company's plans to merge two railways.

The company "will take all legal means at its disposal" to fight the ruling, Grupo Mexico said in a filing with the Mexican stock exchange.

In November 2005, Grupo Mexico said it would merge its Ferromex unit with Ferrosur, controlled by multibillionaire Carlos Slim. The antitrust commission rejected the proposed merger in June, and Grupo Mexico appealed.

The commission rejected the appeal on Wednesday, arguing that a merger would have led to excessive concentration in the railroad industry to the detriment of consumers and competitors.

Grupo Mexico has argued it must expand in order to compete with U.S.-based railroad Kansas City Southern.

Kansas City Southern last year gained full control of local railway TFM, which runs through the heart of Mexico's industrial region to the border town of Nuevo Laredo from the Pacific port of Lazaro Cardenas.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Natural Political Gas (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 17, 2006

Congress will return for one more lame-duck go-round after Thanksgiving, and if it wants an easy victory for the U.S. economy it'll whip through the offshore drilling bill that has passed the Senate and awaits action in conference.

The Gulf of Mexico Energy Security Act, crafted by New Mexico's Pete Domenici, would open 8.3 million acres of the Outer Continental Shelf to oil and natural gas drilling. The bill doesn't go nearly as far as we or many in the House would like, but it's the best opportunity for new U.S. energy exploration in years.

While this Gulf acreage is known to hold oil reserves, the real significance is its bonanza of natural gas. Unlike the global oil market, most natural gas is produced regionally. Short supplies and high prices are punishing American industry, causing plant closures and job flight overseas. It is one of the larger economic messes in recent history, yet the political class barely mentions it -- perhaps because the politicians have done more than anyone to cause it.

As recently as 1995, the average cost for natural gas in the U.S. was about $1.70 per million British Thermal Units; by 2002 it was $3.54. It had climbed by 400% by last year, when it ranged from $11 to $14.50 per million BTUs. Japan, China, India and most of the rest of the world pay far less, putting U.S.-based companies at a huge global disadvantage.

Hardest hit has been chemical manufacturing, which in 2004 shuttered more than 70 U.S. facilities and marked an additional 40 for closure, resulting in a loss of 100,000 jobs. Did someone say "outsourcing"? Of the 120 chemical plants with $1 billion price tags being built around the world, only one is in the U.S. Dow Chemical CEO Andrew Liveris says his firm has shut down more than 30 factories in North America in the past several years, and he blames it on energy.

Natural gas is also a component of many everyday consumer goods, from plastic cups to carpets to semiconductors. Many of these manufacturers have faced shortages or steep price hikes, including Simmons (bedding), Goodyear (tires) and Newell Rubbermaid (packaging/containers). Massachusetts-based Union Products, originator of the famous pink plastic flamingos, recently closed its doors because of rising costs for plastic resin (made from natural gas) and electricity. The company's workers should thank Senator John Kerry and other Democrats who have blocked offshore drilling for gas and liquified natural gas imports.

The fertilizer industry, which relies heavily on natural gas, has lost more than 36% of its domestic capacity since 2002. The U.S. forest products industry has seen energy costs rise 50% for pulp and paper mills in three years; it has closed 232 mills and lost 182,000 jobs since 2000. The National Association of Manufacturers estimates that 3.1 million high-wage manufacturing jobs have been lost since 2000 largely due to inadequate supplies of natural gas. The next time Democrats wail over lost manufacturing jobs and try to blame it on "free trade," tell them to start drilling for the truth.

All of this is reason for Congress to act now. Gulf Coast Democrats are supporting this Senate bill, largely because it offers their states a cut of the royalties. The House has passed a much stronger bill, and in a better world would prevail. But with coastal, anti-drilling Democrats set to run Congress next year, now is the time for the House to swallow its pride, pass the Senate version without amendment to avoid a conference, and send it to President Bush.

The 8.3 million acres to be opened in the Senate bill would conservatively yield 5.8 trillion cubic feet of natural gas -- a significant amount under any measure. Moreover, drilling in the Gulf has typically yielded three to five times more oil and gas than originally estimated. With any luck, the money that would start flowing to the Gulf states under revenue-sharing with the feds might also encourage other states to demand their own coastal exploration.

That should continue to be the long-term policy goal, as the outer shelf is estimated to hold an extraordinary 420 trillion cubic feet of natural gas, enough to keep the U.S. in affordable energy for decades. It's a disgrace that Congress has locked up that supply and driven high-paying jobs overseas. Passing this drilling bill would make a lame-duck Congress a little less lame.

Congress Seen Passing Price-gouging Law (AP)

By Matt Apuzzo

AP, November 16, 2006

WASHINGTON — The head of the Federal Trade Commission predicted Thursday that Congress would pass a gasoline price-gouging law despite her warnings that the country doesn't need one and it might cause fuel shortages.

FTC Chairwoman Deborah Platt Majoras said she has warned Congress publicly and privately about the dangers of such a law.

"We looked vary carefully but didn't see any new legislation needed to protect consumers," Majoras said at an antitrust conference Thursday. "Will new legislation be passed? I think we will see a price-gouging statute pass, perhaps at the end of this (incoming) Congress."

With gas prices rising to over $3 per gallon this spring, the House passed a bill permitting large fines and jail time for price gougers. The Senate has not acted on it and Sen. Max Baucus, D-Mont., the incoming Finance Committee chairman, said Thursday, "There's a lot more that has a higher priority."

Majoras said she understood the public's frustration and concern but said an upcoming FTC report on the price spikes found that consumer demand was up at the time.

"There is a distinction between a market determination you don't like and a market failure," she said.

Testifying in May before the Senate Commerce Committee, Majoras said retailers might let the gas run out rather than raise prices and risk facing prosecution. She noted the price spikes after Hurricane Katrina last year resulted in more fuel getting to market.

Majoras, who has previously questioned whether a price-gouging law could easily be enforced, said Thursday that despite her concerns, the agency would enforce the law if it passed.

The Justice Department's top antitrust official, Assistant Attorney General Thomas O. Barnett, attended Thursday's conference and said addressing fuel prices was a tricky issue for his agency.

He said that like all cartels, the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries is bad for consumers. But he said any effort to hold OPEC to U.S. competition laws would have to be balanced with national security and diplomatic interests.

California Plots Greenhouse-Gas Strategy (WSJ)

By John J. Fialka

The Wall Street Journal, November 17, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0095619

SACRAMENTO, Calif. -- On a smog-free day, from his office on the 25th floor of California's Environmental Protection Agency, Robert Sawyer can see his problem: cars moving in slow procession on distant freeways, emitting carbon dioxide that is believed to be warming the atmosphere -- hastening the melting of the snow that caps the mountains to the east.

The soft-spoken mechanical and aeronautical engineer is chairman of California's Air Resources Board, a semi-independent agency that has been given the job of drawing up the nation's first regulatory program intended to reduce greenhouse-gas emissions by all sectors of the economy.

To accomplish this, Dr. Sawyer and his agency, which is known outside California as CARB, will likely face fierce lobbying by industries and consumer groups, and difficult political questions that haven't yet been answered in the U.S. But California regulations have shaped national legislation in the past, and CARB's efforts will be closely watched by other states and by the new Democratic Congress in Washington, where emissions reduction is likely to get increased traction.

The change will be most dramatic in the Senate, where Barbara Boxer, a California Democrat, will succeed James Inhofe, an Oklahoma Republican, as chairman of the Committee on Environment and Public Works. Mr. Inhofe refused to consider regulations on carbon dioxide, calling global warming "the most media-hyped environmental issue of all time." Ms. Boxer, who believes "global warming could reshape the world as we know it," says she will introduce federal legislation that is similar to California's.

CARB, the nation's largest and most influential state environmental regulatory agency, has about 1,000 employees, including scientists and engineers who, working there in the 1960s, helped design the nation's pioneering antismog program. The agency enjoys enough bipartisan political support that when Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger announced in August that California would impose the nation's first broad cap on greenhouse-gas emissions, the state Legislature simply set deadlines for reducing emissions and left it mostly up to CARB to figure out how to do it, telling the agency to prepare regulations by 2012. California's goal is to cut emissions by about 25% by 2020.

To flesh out California's law, Dr. Sawyer, who was appointed by Mr. Schwarzenegger in December, says he will push every approach that is cost-effective. He plans to send staff members to the United Kingdom and Japan to see how their pioneering regulatory programs work. He plans to hire 100 experts, including economists who will develop computer models of the state's past and future emissions. He is also looking for specialists who can design an emissions-trading program tailored to California's economy.

The U.S. Environmental Protection Agency has successfully used emissions trading to get coal-fired utilities to curb sulfur-dioxide emissions, which cause acid rain. The government puts a cap on allowable sulfur-dioxide emissions, issuing credits needed for each ton of pollutants. In emissions trading, a company that reduces emissions below its assigned cap can finance its efforts by selling excess credits to companies that may need them to cover their own emissions.

California's legislature has left it up to CARB to determine whether and how to use emissions trading; Dr. Sawyer says it is a tool he wants to use, designed in a way that makes trading possible beyond the state's borders. "It is essential that what we do will be compatible with other states, nationally and internationally," he explains. "We definitely anticipate trading across boundaries. California can't solve this alone."

Making reductions in California won't come cheaply or easily, says Andrew Ertel, president of Evolution Markets Inc., a White Plains, N.Y., brokerage firm that specializes in emissions trading. The state's tough air-pollution laws have already driven out coal-fired utilities and other dirty industries where big cuts could be made. To meet California's target in reducing emissions, Mr. Ertel says CARB will have to focus on the transportation sector, which has roughly double the traffic of most states and produces 41% of the state's total emissions.

Among other approaches, CARB could recommend taxes or other incentives to reduce gasoline consumption. On this subject, Mr. Ertel predicts, the agency will experience "some heavy-duty lobbying" before its program emerges.

Jason Grumet, staff director of the bipartisan National Commission on Energy Policy in Washington, says CARB's struggles will be closely watched by national industrial groups. He believes industries opposed to federal regulations may soon swing around to support them -- as they did with the Clean Air Act of 1970, which had its seeds in California -- to get Congress to pre-empt a "patchwork" of conflicting state regulations from evolving.

Mr. Grumet notes that the political forces that shape California's climate-change regulations will be somewhat different from those that will emerge when the issue comes before the Democratic-controlled Congress. The influence of coal-fired utilities, the coal-mining industry and car makers, he explains, is much stronger in Washington than in Sacramento, where the biggest players will include oil companies, the state Chamber of Commerce and agricultural interests.

Environmental groups are also stronger in California and have used successful state programs in the past to sell environmental proposals to Congress. As a result, California's antismog regulations and appliance-efficiency standards made it into national law.

But some of CARB's most ambitious regulations haven't worked as advertised. On many fall days, when Dr. Sawyer gazes out of his office windows, he sees a dirty brown haze, and the distant mountains aren't visible. That is because California, while it has the nation's most stringent air-pollution regulations, hasn't even met weaker federal standards.

New Game A Pheasant Boom Lifts Farm Fortunes On Great Plains (WSJ)

By Joseph T. Hallinan

The Wall Street Journal, November 17, 2006

VIVIAN, S.D. -- For nearly 100 years, LeRoy "Frenchy" Authier's family has ranched and farmed along the banks of a slender stream known as Medicine Creek.

They grew wheat and raised cattle. But farms got bigger and prices got lower and after a while, the money didn't add up the way it used to. So nine years ago Mr. Authier's 46-year-old son, Mike, and his wife, Katherine, sold off the last of the cattle and turned to a new crop: pheasants.

Today, they have four separate lodges on their land, including a converted barn and granary, that can accommodate up to 35 guests a day. Called the Medicine Creek Pheasant Ranch, about 30 miles south of the state capital of Pierre, it draws hunters from across the country.

Thanks to a federal program that pays farmers to idle millions of acres, the once-decimated pheasant is making a comeback. Many states in the nation's midsection are reporting their biggest populations of the game bird in nearly a half century. Hunters are also turning out in force, willing to pay people like the Authiers thousands of dollars a week to shoot the birds.

One result is an unexpected boom that is raising land values, propping up farms and generating new businesses in many parts of the Great Plains. In a good year the Authiers' pheasant operation will gross six times what the farm did, allowing them to raise their children in the house where Frenchy was born.

"Pheasant hunting is a good way to keep the farm in the family and the family on the farm," says Katherine Authier, who helps cook the meals for Medicine Creek's hunters.

The pheasant phenomenon has created an unusual alliance of farmers, hunters and environmentalists bent on preserving the program that pays farmers to leave some lands idle. For them, the biggest threat to the bird's well-being today isn't coyotes. It's corn, which is used to make ethanol -- the other big growth industry on the Plains. High oil prices have created intense interest in ethanol, an alternative fuel usually mixed with gasoline. As Congress prepares to write next year's farm bill, some want to see a portion of idled cropland planted with corn for ethanol production.

"There are other ways to conserve land," says Kendell Keith, president of the National Grain and Feed Association, whose members include ethanol producers. The outcome of the land debate could help shape the economy of the Great Plains, a dry spine of land that flanks the Rocky Mountains from North Dakota to Texas. Pheasant hunting, soaring land values and tourism have helped prop up local coffers here. Although the past two years have seen "unprecedented income creation," according to the Department of Agriculture, a drought this year has taken its toll on many farms and ranches. As a result, many welcome the new revenue from pheasant hunters.

In Iowa, for example, officials estimate that pheasant hunting brings between $170 million and $250 million to the state. That's a small part of the state's $113.6 billion economy, but a big number in a state of three million people. In South Dakota, pheasant hunters spent an estimated $153 million, according to the state Department of Game, Fish and Parks. And Minnesota, which last year recorded its highest pheasant harvest in 40 years, is developing a long-range plan to increase bird numbers. It pegs annual pheasant-hunter spending at about $63 million.

"This is just great," says Larry Spiegel, moments after a pheasant he shot from high overhead tumbles into a field of milo. He sells financial products to retirees in Las Vegas and is affectionately known around the Authiers' place as Las Vegas Larry. He's been coming to Medicine Creek since it opened. Each year he spends about a month hunting its hills and sloughs behind his dogs, G.G. and Bliss. He is such a regular that Mike Authier even named one of the ranch's buildings "Larry's Lodge."

The pheasant has long been the iconic game bird of the Midwest, featured on collector plates and tavern signs. In the postwar years, pheasants were everywhere, and returning GIs hunted the tasty bird in record numbers. A male, or cock, pheasant weighs about three pounds and can fly at speeds exceeding 45 miles an hour, making it a challenge to shoot. Hunting them often turned into a social occasion, drawing in friends and family from far away.

In the '50s and '60s, hyper-efficient farming practices, and the sacrificing of trees and grasses for cropland, destroyed much of the pheasant's habitat. The birds nearly vanished. According to state records, hunters in North Dakota bagged nearly 500,000 pheasants in 1963. By 1965, the number plunged to just 58,000. The following year, the state closed the season.

The U.S. government reignited the pheasant boom two decades ago with a new land-idling program intended to rein in American farmers' tendency to generate price-depressing gluts of subsidized grain. Under the Conservation Reserve Program, or CRP, Uncle Sam enters into long-term contracts that pay farmers nearly $49 an acre on average not to grow crops on roughly 36 million acres -- an area larger than New York and New Jersey combined. This year, CRP payments equal $4,143 per participating farm, or $1.76 billion altogether. Freed from the plow, these lands are reverting to grasslands and once again generating armies of wildlife.

South Dakota Gov. Mike Rounds says he strongly supports continued CRP funding as part of the farm bill. "I'm just convinced that the more CRP we can get in, the better off we're going to be," he says.

Some groups, like the National Grain and Feed Association, want the program to allow more acres to be farmed. Such a change would benefit many of its members, which range from ethanol producers to operators of grain elevators. With the recent shift in control of both congressional houses, it remains unclear which side will prevail.

The ethanol boom is already transforming much of the Plains, where steam-belching new plants are replacing grain elevators as the tallest structures on this flat expanse. The plants have sucked in not only natural resources, like water and grain, but a vast pool of investors' money as well. Ethanol is the hottest investment play across the Farm Belt, attracting billions of dollars from everyone from Main Street merchants to Wall Street financiers.

Ethanol boosters say their product is helping reduce America's dependence on foreign oil and sparking the rural economy. As idled land is pulled back into production, they say, sales are likely to grow for companies that make everything from tractors and combines to fertilizer and seeds. The ethanol industry's enormous appetite for corn has already raised the price of the nation's largest crop to its highest price in a decade, brightening prospects for thousands of growers, potentially reducing the cost of government subsidies.

Land is the single largest asset and source of collateral for farmers on the Plains. Increasing land values are making the farmers wealthier at the same time that they are making the region's banks more financially solid. Last year, according to the U.S. Department of Agriculture, the value of farm real estate, which accounts for 86% of farm-sector assets, gained 16.3%. Farm bank profits before taxes and extraordinary items jumped 8.2% last year, according to the American Bankers Association, boosted by strong farm incomes and appreciating farmland values.

Investors are snapping up land for pheasant hunting in places like South Dakota's McPherson County. Ten years ago, land around here sold for between $350 and $400 an acre. Now, the going rate is $1,000 or more. The real-estate boom even extends to the cheapest grade of land, which usually is too hilly or wooded for grain production, because birds thrive there.

Merchants in South Dakota have come to count on the 11-week hunting season, which brings in visitors to a part of the country that typically doesn't see many strangers.

At Tubby's Kwik Stop, a convenience store in Bowdle, where shotgun shells and hunting licenses can be bought with a morning coffee, "our sales probably double for the first two weeks of the season," says Lanny Stiklestad, the owner.

DOJ_NMG_0095622

A few blocks away, at the Triple C Steakhouse bed-and-breakfast, the basement dining room was packed on opening weekend last month . Burly men in blaze orange, the traditional hunting-safety color, sat elbow to elbow, joking and watching a ballgame on TV.

Candice Williamson and her sister Cindy Lowens bought the town's long-abandoned hospital to open the place about 10 years ago. Now, it is typically booked solid months before the start of the season. On busy nights, says Ms. Lowens, the dining room will serve 120 people, a big crowd for a town whose population is just over 500.

In 2002, out-of-state pheasant hunters in South Dakota outnumbered residents for the first time since the state began keeping statistics in 1919. The gap is only widening. Nonresident pheasant hunters now provide more than $108 million a year to the state, according to South Dakota Game, Fish and Parks Department. That's about $140 for every man, woman and child in South Dakota.

In 2003, North Dakota hunters persuaded their state officials to give them exclusive shooting rights on certain lands during the first week of the bird season. The Minnesota Attorney General sued the state of North Dakota in federal court, alleging the plan infringed on interstate commerce. In August, a federal appeals court sided with North Dakota.

Last year, South Dakota alone counted nearly 10 million of the birds, its highest pheasant population since 1963. It also licensed a record 95,000 out-of-state hunters.

The Friday before the opening day of pheasant season is the busiest day of the year at the Sioux Falls Airport, says airport manager Mike Marnach, surpassing even Christmas and Thanksgiving. About 2,000 people will arrive, twice the normal daily total. Disembarking hunters are greeted by local merchants in booths bearing cookies and coffee.

"We used to have the Hooters gals," says Mr. Marnach, and they would hand out free beer to the arriving hunters. "But that didn't work out so good," he says, noting the line of hunters trying to rent cars with beer on their breath. One local pheasant operation, he says, now sends stretch Hummers to pick up its guests, who come from across the country.

Pheasant money goes a long way in small towns on the Plains, where there are few extra ways to pick up spare income. Curt Honeyman's family has farmed in this area for years. But come pheasant season, he works for Cannonball Co., in Regent, N.D., one of the largest commercial pheasant-hunting outfits in the state. He guides 55 days a year, the first 40 without a day off.

"That brings in, oh, six, seven grand that I wouldn't normally have," he says. "For that short a time, that's not bad."

Making a living out here has never been easy. "'33 was dry. '34, the grasshoppers ate everything," says Frenchy Authier. He is 83 now and widowed, but still gets around the place, pointing out fence lines still buried from the Dust Bowl. For reasons lost to history, the opening days of pheasant hunting in South Dakota generally don't begin until noon. That is just fine with Frenchy because it gives him time to watch his favorite TV show, "The Price is Right." Then he fires up a Ford pickup and trundles hunters out into the fields of his youth.

Gun Lake Land To Be Taken Into Trust (ICT)

By Gale Courey Toensing, Indian Country Today

Indian Country Today, November 17, 2006

BRADLEY, Mich. - The Match-E-Be-Nash-She-Wish Band of Pottawatomi's planned casino and entertainment center took a great leap forward recently when the federal government announced it would take land into trust for the project early next year.

The Interior Department will take 146 acres in Allegan County into trust for the tribe, which is known as the Gun Lake Tribe, on Jan. 5, 2007, according to an Oct. 27 Justice Department filing in the U.S. District Court in Washington, D.C., and with Michigan Gambling Opposition (MichGO), an anti-Indian casino group.

"This is another very significant step forward for our tribe. We applaud the actions of the federal government in their efforts to provide relief to the tribe and the local communities that are eager for the thousands of jobs and economic growth the casino will provide," Chairman D.K. Sprague said.

The tribe expects to begin construction next spring, Sprague said.

DOJ_NMG_0095623

MichGO has until Jan. 5 to file an injunction against Interior, a legal step the group will take, spokesman John Helmholdt said.

"MichGO will be filing the preliminary motion for injunction and we're going to continue to cooperate and work with the court in a timely manner and leave it up to the court to decide," Helmholdt said.

The 300-member Gun Lake Tribe was federally acknowledged in 1999, but its effort to take land into trust have been snarled in court and at Interior since then.

Interior granted final approval to the tribe's land into trust application in May 2005. MichGO immediately challenged Interior in a lawsuit that is pending in the Washington federal court.

Last January, the tribe and the Justice Department filed for a summary judgment of MichGO's lawsuit, but the court has not acted since then. Around the same time, a federal appeals court dismissed an identical lawsuit that sought to delay the Pokagon Band of Potawatomi from developing Four Winds Casino Resort in southwestern Michigan. The dismissal set a precedent for MichGo's action against Gun Lake.

Helmholdt said the latest decision "is a very heavy-handed legal maneuver by the federal government and tribe in an attempt to force the court to take action. We believe due process should be allowed and we should be given a fair hearing in court before the tribe is allowed to take any action."

But Justice reminded MichGO that it already had turned down an offer to expedite matters.

"The Gun Lake Tribe has demonstrated to the Department that it may suffer irreparable harm should the trust acquisition be delayed any further. In light of this, the United States requested that MichGO join the United States in requesting expedited hearing on the summary judgment motions before the District Court. MichGO rejected this request and proposed instead that the United States prepare an Environmental Impact Statement. The United States does not believe an EIS is warranted in this case," Gina Allery, a trial attorney for the Justice Department, said in an Oct. 27 letter to MichGO.

Interior's final land into trust approval last May followed an unexplained 14-month delay after it had issued a preliminary approval with a "Finding of No Significant Impact" document in February 2004.

Helmholdt said MichGO's continuing request for an EIS - a more rigorous analysis than an Environmental Assessment - is "a central part of our legal argument."

But Justice may see the request as a replay of a tactic used by former lobbyist Jack Abramoff, who was indicted on corruption and fraud charges earlier this year. During its investigation, Justice found that Abramoff tried to get Interior to require an EIS in order to block the Gun Lake casino, because he believed it would threaten the market share of a nearby casino operated by one of his clients.

"MichGO's irresponsible decision to continue to pursue its flawed lawsuit to block our casino has wasted millions of taxpayer dollars and caused irreparable damage to the tribe and West Michigan's economy," Sprague said.

Sprague said the tribe continues to seek a gaming compact with the state and is pursuing an agreement, similar to others in the state, that would provide 8 percent of slot machine revenues to the state and two percent to local governments.

But Gun Lake plans to go forward with a Class III gaming facility with or without a compact, Sprague said. He cited a recent Interior decision to authorize Class III gaming for the Seminole Tribe in Florida without a tribal/state compact unless the two sovereigns negotiate a compact within 60 days. Without a compact, the state does not receive any gaming revenues and has no regulatory oversight role.

"A Class III compact would be best for the tribe, the state and surrounding communities. We are hopeful the Michigan Legislature and governor understand that for the benefit of Michigan and its residents, the time has come to sign the Gun Lake Casino compact," Sprague said.

Liz Boyd, spokesman for Michigan Gov. Jennifer Granholm, acknowledged the argument for a compact that would provide revenues for the state and municipal governments.

"We are having discussions with the tribe. Our former govenor, John Engler, perhaps said it best when he said, 'One way or another that tribe will have gaming, so the question is with or without a compact.' So the governor is really weighing the question very carefully and no decisions have been made yet," Boyd said.

American Trrack Coach Graham Pleads Innocent In BALCO Probe (FINDLAW/AP)

By David Kravets, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 17, 2006

(AP) - SAN FRANCISCO-Elite track coach Trevor Graham pleaded not guilty Thursday to accusations he hindered a continuing government steroids probe targeting high-profile athletes.

Graham, who has trained Justin Gatlin, Marion Jones and Tim Montgomery, is charged with three counts of making false statements to federal agents in an indictment issued Nov. 1 by the grand jury investigating performance-enhancing drugs in professional sports.

Graham was freed on US$25,000 bond after appearing before U.S. Magistrate Edwin Chen.

His attorney entered the plea on Graham's behalf.

Graham operates Raleigh, North Carolina-based Sprint Capitol USA, a team of about 10 athletes that includes Gatlin, the 100-meter co-world record holder who tested positive for testosterone and other steroids in April.

Graham also coached Jones, a sprinter who won five medals at the 2000 Sydney Games, and her former boyfriend Montgomery, formerly the world's fastest man who was suspended from competition for two years for doping.

Track Coach Pleads Not Guilty To Hindering BALCO Probe (WP)

The Washington Post, November 17, 2006

Track coach Trevor Graham pleaded not guilty yesterday to federal charges of lying to investigators and hindering the very steroids probe he ignited three years ago when he turned in a syringe full of steroids to investigators.

Graham, who faces three counts of making false statements about his relationship with an admitted steroid dealer, appeared in front of U.S. Magistrate Edwin Chen in San Francisco with his attorney, Gail Shifman, who entered the plea on his behalf. Graham was released on $25,000 unsecured bond.

Graham, who has coached track stars Marion Jones, Tim Montgomery and Justin Gatlin at his Raleigh, N.C.-based camp, faces as much as 15 years in prison and $750,000 in fines. He began the massive steroids probe now known as BALCO (Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative) , which has resulted in four criminal convictions but combined sentences of less than a year in prison.

Shifman said the lack of substantive results in the probe have led U.S. Attorney Kevin V. Ryan to target Graham.

"It's an unfortunate manipulation of the criminal justice system that an embattled U.S. attorney would turn on the person who brought the whole Balco investigation to the forefront," Shifman said by phone from San Francisco. "Trevor Graham is looking forward to the trial in this case. When the full story comes out, he will be vindicated."

A trial date could be set today during Graham's first appearance before Susan Illston, the federal judge who has presided over the BALCO probe.

Track Coach Trevor Graham Pleads Innocent In Steroid Probe (BLOOM)

By Karen Gullo

Bloomberg, November 16, 2006

Nov. 16 (Bloomberg) -- Track coach Trevor Graham, who helped spark a U.S. government inquiry into steroid use by athletes, pleaded innocent to charges he lied to federal agents in the probe.

Graham, coach to Olympic sprinters Marion Jones and Justin Gatlin, was released today on a $25,000 bond by U.S. Magistrate Edward Chen in San Francisco. He was charged Nov. 2 with three counts of making false statements.

``He'll be vindicated," Gail Shifman, Graham's attorney, said after today's hearing.

Graham was a witness in a federal investigation into Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative, a Burlingame, California, lab known as Balco, the U.S. Attorney said. The lab's founder and four others, including Greg Anderson, trainer to baseball player Barry Bonds, have pleaded guilty to distributing steroids. No athletes have been charged and Bonds has denied using steroids.

Graham obtained illegal performance-enhancing drugs from an unidentified source and lied about it to U.S. Internal Revenue Service agents who interviewed him in June 2004, according to the U.S. Attorney's office in San Francisco. Graham also lied about his contacts with the supplier, the statement said.

The charges each carry a maximum penalty of five years in prison and a $250,000 fine. Graham, who is based in North Carolina, wasn't charged with distributing steroids.

Olympic Ban

The U.S. Olympic Committee banned Graham from its training centers Aug. 3, the first time the organization has levied such a penalty, after Olympic 100-meters champion Gatlin tested positive for testosterone at a meet in April.

Gatlin faces an eight-year ban after failing a second drug test in August. Jones was cleared of using banned substances. Graham also is being investigated by the International Association of Athletics Federations. Graham is fighting the Olympic ban and Gatlin has denied wrongdoing.

Graham has also trained twins Alvin and Calvin Harrison, Jerome Young, Michelle Collins and Tim Montgomery, who all received doping suspensions.

The San Francisco U.S. Attorney's Office launched an investigation three years ago into steroid use by athletes. The probe was sparked in part by Graham, who anonymously mailed a syringe containing a sample of tetrahydrogestrinone, known as THG or the Clear, a synthetic ``designer steroid'' that was once undetectable and is banned in baseball.

``I was just a coach doing the right thing at the time,'' Graham said in a 2004 interview with the Associated Press.

Graham had been granted immunity from prosecution before his interviews with the IRS. The agreement didn't include immunity from prosecutor for making false statements, prosecutors said.

The case is U.S. v Trevor Graham, 06-0725, U.S. District Court, San Francisco.

Anderson Still Won't Discuss Bonds, Heads Back To Jail (WP)

The Washington Post, November 17, 2006

A federal appeals court in San Francisco ruled yesterday that Barry Bonds's personal trainer must return to prison for refusing to testify before a grand jury investigating performance-enhancing drugs in professional sports.

Greg Anderson, 40, already has served two other brief prison stints for refusing to testify whether his boyhood friend lied when he said he never knowingly used steroids. Both times, Anderson, held in contempt of court, was released on procedural grounds.

Anderson could serve more than a year behind bars unless he agrees to tell the grand jury what he knows about Bonds's alleged steroids use.

The Giants slugger told a 2003 grand jury that he believed Anderson had provided him flaxseed oil and arthritic balm, not steroids.

Appeals Court Orders Bonds' Trainer To Jail (LAT)

By Lance Pugmire, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, November 17, 2006

Anderson is told to return to prison in contempt case involving BALCO. Also, track coach Graham pleads not guilty to lying.

Barry Bonds' personal trainer was ordered Thursday to report back to federal prison by noon Monday, after a federal appeals court affirmed a prior federal court ruling that prosecutors did not taint a grand jury with information gathered from a disputed tape recording.

In another BALCO-related court event, track coach Trevor Graham pleaded not guilty to charges he lied to federal investigators.

DOJ_NMG_0095626

Bonds' trainer, Greg Anderson, 40, has been imprisoned twice previously for contempt of court for refusing to fully testify about whether the free-agent San Francisco Giants slugger lied when he told a prior federal grand jury that he never knowingly used steroids.

"Greg is as strong and resolute as I've ever heard him," said Anderson's attorney, Mark Geragos, who said he would continue appealing for Anderson's release, possibly to the U.S. Supreme Court.

Anderson has served more than 50 days in prison in the contempt case. He served 15 days in July before an earlier grand jury's term expired. He was sent back to prison for 37 more days but ordered released in October by the U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals.

Geragos argued that Anderson shouldn't testify because prosecutors are relying on information that they gained in an illegally obtained recording of Anderson discussing steroids in 2004.

Prosecutors counter that their questions to Anderson are based on a search they conducted of Anderson's home, along with other athletes' secret testimony.

The 9th Circuit ruled Thursday that "the government's questions were not tainted by the … recording. … The material was not provided to [the] grand jury, in either recorded or transcript form."

Anderson is subject to spending more than 13 months in prison as the current grand jury term continues, his attorney said.

"But we have many other options," Geragos said.

Meanwhile, track coach Graham pleaded not guilty to three counts of making false statements to federal agents. He was indicted Nov. 1.

Graham helped start the ongoing federal investigation of the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative in Burlingame, Calif., by anonymously mailing a vial of the then-undetectable steroid "the clear" to the U.S. Anti-Doping Agency.

Graham, who has trained U.S. sprinters Justin Gatlin, Marion Jones and Tim Montgomery, allegedly lied to federal agents when he said he didn't supply athletes with performance-enhancing drugs or tell them where to purchase the drugs.

Graham would face a maximum 15 years in prison if he is convicted.

The Associated Press contributed to this report.

Track Coach Enters Plea; Trainer Sent To Prison (AP)

AP, November 16, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO, (AP) — Olympic track coach Trevor Graham pleaded not guilty to hindering a grand jury's probe of performance-enhancing drugs in sports on Thursday, the same day Barry Bonds's personal trainer was ordered back to prison for refusing to cooperate with the investigation.

Graham remained free on a $25,000 bond, but a three-judge panel of the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit ordered Bonds's trainer, Greg Anderson, back to federal prison. He was directed to report by noon Monday.

Anderson's lawyer, Mark Geragos, said he was considering asking a 15-judge panel of the San Francisco-based appeals court, or even the Supreme Court, to consider Anderson's plight.

Outside his arraignment in federal district court, Graham, who trained the track stars Justin Gatlin, Marion Jones and Tim Montgomery, did not comment after his lawyer, Gail Shifman, entered the plea on his behalf.

"He'll be vindicated," Shifman said.

Anderson, 40, has already been behind bars twice after being held in contempt of court for his refusal to testify to a grand jury investigating Bonds on allegations of perjury and tax evasion. Both times, the prison stints were cut short because of legal technicalities.

Now, he could serve more than a year in prison unless he agrees to tell the grand jury what he knows about alleged steroids use by Bonds.

On Nov. 1, the same grand jury indicted Graham on three counts of making false statements to federal agents investigating the use of steroids in professional sports. If convicted, Graham faces a maximum 15 years in prison and $750,000 fine.

Graham's lawyer declined to answer a reporter's questions about whether Graham supplied athletes with performance-enhancing drugs or told athletes where to get them, as the indictment alleged.

Drug Dealer Pleads Guilty In Fentanyl Case (DN)

Detroit News, November 16, 2006

A Detroit drug dealer faces more than 24 years in prison after he admitted today to distributing heroin laced with the painkiller fentanyl that killed two people.

U.S. District Judge Lawrence P. Zatkoff will sentence James Edgar Coleman, 36, on Feb. 6 on two counts of distributing a controlled substance causing death.

Coleman admitted to selling the fentanyl-laced heroin that killed Lauren Jolly, a 17-year-old Bloomfield Township high school student, and Daniel McElmurry, 30, of Madison Heights, earlier this year.

Coleman told Zatkoff he sold about 50 small packets of heroin to a drug house on Keating Street in Detroit, some of which was later purchased by Jolly and McElmurry, killing them in separate incidents. He said he did not know the heroin contained fentanyl.

"If you're in the business, you don't want to kill your customers," Coleman's lawyer Warren Harris of Southfield said outside court.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Kathryn McCarthy told Zatkoff Coleman did not have to know exactly what was inside the fatal mixture for him to be guilty of the crimes, which each carry a minimum 20-year prison sentence.

Under a deal reached with prosecutors, Coleman is expected to be sentenced to between 24 and 30 years in prison and will lose his right to appeal.

Harris said outside court that because Coleman has previous drug offences on his record, he would have faced life in prison if found guilty of selling heroin. That's why the plea deal made sense, he said.

It's the first charge related to deaths caused by fentanyl-laced heroin and cocaine that killed an estimated 133 people in Metro Detroit in 2005-06.

Detroit Man Pleads Guilty In Fentanyl Deaths (FREEP)

By Jim Schaefer, Free Press Staff Writer

Detroit Free Press, November 16, 2006

A 36-year-old Detroit man pleaded guilty today to providing the fentanyl-laced heroin that killed Birmingham high school junior Lauren Jolly and another man last spring.

James Edgar Coleman told Judge Lawrence Zatkoff in U.S. District Court that he was unaware that the heroin he supplied to a drug house on Detroit's east side also contained fentanyl, a drug that is 50 to 100 times more powerful. Fentanyl was blamed for dozens of deaths in the tri-county area from late 2005 through May 2006.

Jolly, 17, a student at Birmingham Groves, and Daniel McElmurry, 30, of Madison Heights, both purchased the drugs that killed them from a house on Keating that Coleman said he supplied with narcotics.

As part of a plea deal, Coleman would be sentenced to 24 1/3 years to nearly 30 ½ years. Coleman's lawyer, Warren Harris, said his client was sorry and took the deal because he could have gotten life in prison on other charges the government issued.

Zatkoff set a sentencing date of Feb. 6.

Detroit Man Pleads Guilty In Fentanyl-Laced Heroin Deaths (DFP/AP)

Detroit Free Press/AP, November 16, 2006

A Detroit man has pleaded guilty in the deaths of two people for giving them heroin laced with the painkiller fentanyl.

That combination is blamed in the deaths of more than 100 drug users in southeast Michigan over the past year.

Thirty-six-year-old James E. Coleman entered the plea to two counts of delivery of a controlled substance resulting in death.

Sentencing was set for February.

Coleman was charged in the deaths of 17-year-old Lauren Jolly of Oakland County's Bloomfield Township and 30-year-old Daniel McElmurry of Madison Heights.

Judge Rejects County Challenge To Medical Marijuana Laws (SDUT)

By Jeff Mcdonald, Union-tribune Staff Writer

The San Diego Union-Tribune, November 16, 2006

SAN DIEGO – A Superior Court judge rejected an argument Thursday from San Diego County that the state medical marijuana laws are illegal because they conflict with federal drug prohibitions.

In a tentative ruling, Judge William R. Nevitt Jr., said California laws permitting chronically ill patients to grow and smoke marijuana are voluntary, and as such do not automatically conflict with federals laws banning pot.

Attorneys for both sides are scheduled to make oral arguments in the case later Thursday afternoon. It is unclear whether Nevitt will issue a formal ruling from the bench or take the case under submission.

San Diego County sued the state of California earlier this year to try to overturn Proposition 215, which allowed for the medical use of marijuana. The issue has been hotly debated in the ten years since voters approved that initiative.

Many California counties have been slow to implement the law. San Bernardino and Merced counties joined the San Diego case earlier this year.

Judge Rejects San Diego County Medical Marijuana Challenge (NCT)

North County Times, November 16, 2006

SAN DIEGO ---- A Superior Court judge issued a tentative ruling today rejecting the County of San Diego's argument that California's medical marijuana law should be overturned.

Judge William R. Nevitt, who is scheduled to hear arguments in the controversial case at 1:30 p.m. today, issued a tentative ruling at 11 a.m.

Nevitt's ruling rejected the county's argument that California's decade-old, voter-approved law should be overturned because it conflicted with federal law.

San Diego County supervisors filed a lawsuit in state court in December 2005 after refusing to comply with state orders to create an identification card and registration program for medical marijuana users.

California is one of 11 states where voters have said seriously-ill people should be allowed to legally use marijuana to ease their suffering if they have a doctor's recommendation.

Federal law says marijuana has no medicinal value and is illegal for anyone to use.

The county argued that the California law should be "pre-empted" by federal law, which says all marijuana use is illegal, under the U.S. Constitution's "Supremacy Clause," which says federal laws should be "supreme" over state laws.

Nevitt, however, said in his tentative ruling that the county's argument ignored the corollary to the Supremacy Clause that held in matters where states traditionally legislate, state law is considered pre-eminent.

Nevitt also ruled out the county's argument that the state's order for counties to issue identification cards for medical marijuana users should be overturned.

Counties Take On State On Medical Pot (AP)

AP, November 16, 2006

SAN DIEGO - Attorneys for San Diego County argued Thursday before a state court judge that the federal ban on marijuana use precludes states from exempting people who use the drug for medical purposes.

San Diego County sued California and its health services director in February over the state's decade-old law permitting use of the drug with a physician's approval. The county says it should not be bound to act to uphold state laws that conflict with federal statutes.

"California has authorized the exact same conduct that federal law has prohibited," argued Thomas Bunton, a senior deputy county counsel. "That's clearly an obstacle to the objective of Congress to prevent drug abuse."

Two other California counties, San Bernardino and Merced, joined San Diego as plaintiffs. All three counties have refused to comply with a state requirement that counties issue identification cards for medical marijuana users and maintain a registry of people who apply for the cards.

Earlier Thursday, Superior Court Judge William R. Nevitt, Jr., issued a tentative ruling rejecting the county's suit.

Nevitt did not indicate when a final ruling would be issued but set a Dec. 1 deadline for additional briefs on issues related to the case.

In his tentative ruling, Nevitt agreed with attorneys for the state, who argued that California is entitled to pass its own drug laws and legislate programs that allow marijuana use for medical purposes.

"The counties are not being forced to do anything that would be in violation of federal law," said Leslie Lopez, a deputy state attorney general. "They're simply being asked to carry out state law."

Five California patients and caregivers, represented by the American Civil Liberties Union, Americans for Safe Access and other advocacy groups, joined the case on the side of the state. A sixth patient, Pamela Sakuda, who suffered from rectal cancer, died last Friday, said William Dolphin, a spokesman for ASA.

About 30 medical marijuana users gathered in the courtroom to hear the arguments, many loudly tut-tutting as Bunton and other county attorneys argued that making marijuana available to the ill can enable recreational drug abuse.

County officials said they have not decided whether they will appeal if Nevitt stands by his initial ruling.

"All we wanted was guidance telling us where we're at so we don't break any rules and lose any funding," said San Diego County Supervisor Bill Horn.

Supporters of the law said they were prepared for a fight.

"It will go as far as the counties want to take it," said Adam Wolf, an attorney for the ACLU Drug Law Reform Project who argued part of the case.

California's law allows people suffering AIDS, cancer, anorexia, chronic pain, arthritis and migraine and "any other illness for which marijuana provides relief" to grow or possess small amounts of marijuana with a doctor's recommendation.

Judge Issues Ruling Upholding Medical Marijuana Law (KGTV)

KGTV-TV, November 16, 2006

SAN DIEGO -- A San Diego judge Thursday issued a tentative ruling upholding California's medical marijuana law, finding against San Diego and two other counties that challenged voter-passed Proposition 215.

However, after hearing oral arguments, Superior Court Judge William Nevitt declined to issue a final decision in the lawsuit brought by San Diego, San Bernardino and Merced counties.

Passed by California voters in 1996, the so-called Compassionate Use Act allows the use of marijuana for pain treatment and other medical reasons.

The counties' lawsuit, filed in February, claims federal law banning marijuana use and possession supercedes state law that allows the medical use of marijuana.

The suit was filed against the local chapter of the National Organization for the Reform of Marijuana Laws, or NORML, after the San Diego County Board of Supervisors refused to implement part of the state law requiring officials to issue identification cards to medical marijuana users to protect them from prosecution.

The American Civil Liberties Union, Americans for Safe Access and Drug Policy Alliance joined San Diego NORML in fighting the suit.

Thomas Bunton, the chief deputy counsel for San Diego County, told the judge that the federal Controlled Substances Act of 1970 contains a provision that overrides state drug laws.

"Authorizing anyone to use marijuana undercuts the objective of federal laws," Bunton said.

Federal law does not recognize the medical use of marijuana, the lawyer contended.

The ACLU's lawyer, Adam Wolf, said the medical marijuana law only bars state police from enforcing federal drug statutes.

"We're not saying federal law can't be enforced," Wolf said. "All we're saying is the state doesn't have to be an active partner with federal law enforcement."

Joseph Elford, an attorney for Americans for Safe Access, told the judge that there is no conflict between Proposition 215 and federal law.

Even with marijuana use allowed for medical purposes, California is "90 percent of the way" toward compliance with federal anti-drug statutes, Elford said.

The judge did not indicate when he would release his final ruling. He did ask lawyers to file briefs by Dec. 1.

Wolf said he would try to reach out-of-court agreements with the counties so that the judge would not have to issue an injunction.

Top Supplier Of West Pot Pleads Guilty; Terms Sealed (KNOXNS)

By Jamie Satterfield

Knoxville News Sentinel (TN), November 17, 2006

Arizona defendant gets cap placed on amount of drugs he will be responsible for

He's just pleaded guilty in open court to being the chief supplier in one of Knoxville's most high-profile drug conspiracy cases, but could you keep that under wraps?

Assistant U.S. Attorney Hugh Ward on Thursday laid bare in U.S. District Court the details of Arizona drug supplier Phillip Arthur Apodaca's role in the marijuana-peddling conspiracy case involving Market Square businessman Scott West and his brother.

Apodaca, 36, admitted those details as he pleaded guilty to charges of conspiring to push more than a ton of marijuana and plotting to launder at least $2.5 million in drug money.

Despite his very public confession, Apodaca's Arizona-based attorney, Rudy Valenzuela, asked U.S. District Judge Thomas Phillips to place under seal the terms of Apodaca's plea deal and a document that outlines his crimes.

It's still not clear why, but it's not an entirely uncommon move. Most defendants who take a plea deal in federal court will wind up working as snitches in hopes of earning sentencing breaks, and that's not exactly something one wants to advertise.

Since Apodaca's plea agreement is now shrouded in secrecy, whether he has garnered a promise of a break for telling tales on others is unknown. His opportunities would seem, at least on the surface, to be limited.

After all, the man Apodaca has been selling thousands of pounds of marijuana to since 2001 - Mike West - already has struck his own deal with prosecutors Ward and David Jennings. Scott West also has pleaded guilty.

Charges are still pending, however, against Mark Anthony Cort, who was the alleged go-between for Mike West and Apodaca as well as a father and son accused of serving as couriers for Mike West.

Ward told Phillips at Thursday's hearing that Apodaca was living in Arizona when he took over as Mike West's "primary source" of marijuana. Mike West, records show, has been dealing drugs for more than a decade.

Apodaca routinely lined up 1,000-pound shipments of marijuana for Mike West, who rented at least two houses in Arizona to serve as "stash houses" for drugs and money, Ward said.

Although court records suggest that the West pot pipeline has funneled tons upon tons of marijuana into states including Georgia, North Carolina and Tennessee, Apodaca has locked into place as part of his plea deal a cap on how much of those drugs he will be held responsible for when sentenced.

"The defendant will be responsible for at least 1,000 kilograms but less than 3,000 kilograms" of marijuana, Ward said.

DOJ_NMG_0095631

Those figures are key, because penalty ranges in federal cases are determined, in part, by how much dope a dealer peddled. Apodaca already faces a boost in his basic penalty range because the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, which toppled the West conspiracy, found guns in the supplier's possession when he was nabbed, Ward said.

Phillips set a March 5 sentencing hearing for Apodaca. Scott West is expected to be the first of his conspirators to face sentencing, with a hearing currently scheduled for December. Hearings for his brother and sister-in-law were recently bumped to January.

Detroit Police Search For Suspects; 5 People Are Shot, 2 Fatally (AP)

By Ron Vample

AP, November 17, 2006

DETROIT - Police arrested a man suspected in a series of shootings Thursday that left two people dead and three others wounded within a span of 10 minutes.

The shootings took place shortly after 6 a.m. in a three- to four-block area on the city's west side, Detroit police spokesman James Tate said.

Killed were Arthur James Smith, 49, and Othelia Fry, 58, both of Detroit, said Yvette Walker, a Detroit police spokeswoman. The wounded men - Elton Ash, 51, Dennis Anderson, 49, and James L. Brown, 50 - were treated at Henry Ford Hospital and released, hospital spokeswoman Synthia Bryant said.

Police arrested the suspect Thursday afternoon at a house about a half-mile from where the shootings occurred, The Detroit News reported on its Web site.

Investigators received a tip from a woman who told them the suspect told her he had shot five people in the morning. The woman led police to the man, the newspaper said.

A search of the house did not find a weapon or the clothes the suspect was believed to have been wearing during the shootings. But the man fit the descriptions given by witnesses, police said.

Tate said earlier that investigators believed there were two gunmen, but police told the Detroit Free Press late Thursday that witness accounts may have been wrong and one man may have been responsible.

Messages left for police by The Associated Press on Thursday night were not immediately returned.

Police said the victims apparently were chosen at random.

One gunman said something to the victims, Tate told The News without giving details. "Right now we have not established a motive," he said.

Fry was shot inside a vehicle in front of the Angel Land Child & Parent Center, a day care facility on Linwood Street, Tate said. There were no children at the day care at the time, and the shooting didn't appear to be related to the facility, he said.

Smith and Ash were shot minutes later about a block away. Shortly afterward, Anderson was wounded in his backyard and Brown also was shot, the Free Press reported on its Web site.

Police recovered shell casings from a handgun.

Linwood is a busy, four-lane street that runs through blocks of old homes. The area around the shooting scene is lined with liquor stores, empty lots, a church, gas stations and abandoned buildings.

Fry had been a cook at the child care center for five years and "really loved that job," said her husband, Bauford Carmichael, 65. She also was president of her block club and active with her neighborhood watch, he told the Free Press.

The U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives was offering a $10,000 reward for information leading to the arrest and conviction of those responsible for the shootings.

"The magnitude of the violence, coupled with a gunman - or gunmen - at large precipitated our offer of assistance to the Detroit Police Department and our involvement in the manhunt," said Valerie J. Goddard, the agent in charge of the ATF's Detroit office.

IMMIGRATION:

Feds: Border Security Costs Could Soar (AP)

The AP, November 16, 2006

Electronic monitoring and other steps for enhancing surveillance along the southwestern border could cost 15 times the initial $2 billion estimate, the Homeland Security Department's inspector general says.

"Early forecasts and estimates of the program's value range from $8 billion to $30 billion," Richard L. Skinner said in an audit report.

The estimate raised new questions about the viability of efforts by President Bush and Congress to revamp immigration policies. The Republican-led Congress demanded that a first step include efforts to improve security along the U.S. borders.

The contract for a "virtual fence" of new cameras, surveillance technology and revamped procedures for border agents was awarded in September to the Boeing Co. The first phase of the program is planned for a 28-mile stretch along the Arizona border near Tucson and is due to be completed in June.

The figures exclude the costs of about 700 miles of additional physical border fencing that Bush signed into law in September.

Homeland Security Department spokesman Russ Knocke said only the money for the Tucson-area phase of the project, $67 million, has been set aside from agency funds so far.

"I'm not sure where his numbers are coming from," Knocke said of Skinner's estimate. He said the agency was open to listening to Skinner's ideas on how to strengthen oversight of the program.

"We've been very clear from the very beginning," Knocke said. "We were going to build a little and prove it before we build more."

"The bottom line is there isn't a number," said Rep. Mark Souder, R-Ind. He was critical of how the contract was awarded and the program is being managed. He noted that estimates can change, but that Boeing must have had a cost estimate when it bid on the contract.

Souder said the plan to go ahead with just the 28-mile stretch near Tucson without a clearer overall plan was like building a house without a plan or cost estimate while saying, "we're getting along really well with the downstairs bathroom."

A Boeing spokeswoman noted that the company is "on a contract for $67 million at this time," with three one-year options. She declined to answer other questions.

Rep. Bennie Thompson, D-Miss., in line to become chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee next year, said he is "troubled that we have not seen a detailed rendering of the department's strategy."

Bush and Congress have approved $1.2 billion for the border security program, but $950 million of that cannot be tapped until the department provides Congress with a report on how it will spend the money, Knocke said.

On Wednesday, Skinner told the House Homeland Security Committee's management subcommittee that the type of contract awarded to Boeing for the border program creates additional risks that, "unless properly managed, threaten achievement of cost, schedule, performance, and, ultimately, mission objectives."

Minuteman Spending Outstrips Donations, Fees (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, November 17, 2006

The Minuteman Civil Defense Corps, under fire for a lack of financial accountability, spent nearly $450,000 last year for volunteers to patrol the U.S.-Mexico border -- about $31,000 more than it collected in donations and registration fees -- according to a report released yesterday.

The organization's first Internal Revenue Service Form 990 filing as a 501(c)4 tax-exempt charitable trust showed nearly $285,000 in MCDC contributions, or roughly 63 percent, were used to pay for program management and operating expenses, such as travel expenditures, salaries, educational materials and office expenses.

Another $145,000, about 32 percent, went for MCDC's fundraising programs.

According to the report, about $20,000, or 5 percent, was spent on field supplies, meals, fuel and background checks for the claimed 8,500 Minuteman volunteers, who last year staffed observation posts at selected points along the Mexican border from California to Texas in April and October.

While the IRS papers document MCDC collections and expenditures through Dec. 31, a reported donation total of $418,493 is significantly less than the $1.6 million MCDC President Chris Simcox told The Washington Times in July that the group had collected in donations since its April 2005 creation. That figure was said to include $1 million in direct MCDC contributions and $600,000 toward the construction of a $55 million border fence.

At the time, Mr. Simcox said MCDC had spent $160,000 for two border vigils in April 2005 and October 2005, supplying volunteers with equipment, including computers, satellite phones, food and trailers.

He also said the organization spent another $36,000 for monthly, three-day musters by MCDC in the four border states.

MCDC officials declined to discuss the Form 990 report with The Washington Times, but Mr. Simcox said in a statement posted on the organization's Web site, "We are releasing our organizational IRS Form 990 and the additional audited financial statements on deadline, as promised, when promised."

He also said that the group's board of directors, which he heads, had decided that "this year and this year only" it would make public the organization's financial statements -- citing what he called "outright malicious lies about the status of MCDC finances."

In July, several MCDC leaders and volunteers questioned the whereabouts of hundreds of thousands, perhaps millions, of dollars in donations the organization had collected.

Several of the group's top lieutenants either quit or threatened to quit, saying requests to Mr. Simcox for a financial accounting have been ignored. Others said money promised for supplies never reached volunteers at the border.

Mr. Simcox, during the July interview, denied the accusations, describing his critics as "known racialists, anti-Semites and a small handful of disgruntled people who have been terminated from staff or from leadership involvement with the Minuteman Civil Defense Corps over a year ago because they could not meet MCDC standards or adhere to our strict field standard operational procedures."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Sends Congress A Partisan Agenda (MCT)

By Steven Thomma

McClatchy Newspapers, November 17, 2006

WASHINGTON - President Bush made nice with the Democrats for the television cameras after they won control of Congress, complete with pictures filled with handshakes, smiles and vows of working together. He even tossed Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld over the side, making many people think that maybe he was going to move more toward the center and reach out for bipartisan openings.

But the agenda he's sent to Congress since then is full of Republican proposals that have no chance of winning bipartisan approval, enrage Democrats, rally his conservative base and appear to be intended to paint Democrats as obstructionist.

Bush has resubmitted several judicial nominations that had been blocked even before last week's elections. He's asked again that the Senate confirm John Bolton as ambassador to the United Nations. And he's urged approval of warrantless eavesdropping on suspected terrorists without any accommodation to Democrats' demands that a court sign off on the spying.

None of these proposals is expected to win approval in the lame-duck session of the Republican Congress, and all are assured of defeat when the Democrats take over in January.

Bush's proposals could be simply his opening bid in what would be a tough round of negotiations with the Democrats. Or they could be a political gambit designed to frame the Democrats early on as obstructionists while rallying a conservative base dispirited by last week's election losses.

Either way, they contradict the initial post-election image that indicated that Bush was ready to reach out to Democrats.

DOJ_NMG_0095634

"I intend to work with the new Congress in a bipartisan way," he said the day after the election. "The message yesterday was clear: The American people want their leaders in Washington to set aside partisan differences, conduct ourselves in an ethical manner and work together to address the challenges facing our nation."

Then this week Bush sent to the Senate four appellate-court nominations that waved a red flag before Democratic bulls. They included:

-U.S. District Judge Terrence Boyle of North Carolina, who's been blocked for years by Democrats who accuse him of being hostile to civil rights and often overruled by higher courts.

-William G. Haynes, a former Pentagon general counsel to Rumsfeld, who's been assailed by Democrats for his role in crafting Bush administration policies on detentions and treatment of suspected enemy combatants.

-Michael B. Wallace, a private-practice attorney from Mississippi who was rated unqualified by the American Bar Association and who's been criticized by Democrats as being hostile to civil rights and to the poor.

-William G. Myers, a mining lobbyist from Idaho who's opposed by environmentalists.

"Barely a week after the president promised to change course by working in a bipartisan and cooperative way with Congress, it is disappointing that he has decided to stay the course on judicial nominees," said Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., who'll chair the Senate Judiciary Committee when the Democrats take over in January.

If Democrats think Bush's in-your-face moves will anger voters, at least one Republican strategist countered that they'll be applauded as overdue by conservatives.

"To the party's detriment, we did not run on the issue of judges as much as we should have. It's a winning issue for us," said strategist Keith Appell, who added that Bolton also is popular with conservatives.

"There is a real question as to how enthusiastic the Republican leadership was last year on these nominations. Now there is an opportunity for the Republican leadership in the Senate to re-establish itself with the conservative grassroots by fighting for these nominees."

Even if Bush loses, he wouldn't only rally the party base, Appell said, but a loss would also allow him to argue that Democrats were obstructionists.

"It forces the Democrats to violate their promise of bipartisanship," he said.

Bush also is pushing Congress to ratify his warrantless eavesdropping without any hint of accommodation to Democrats, who want the spying to continue but with court oversight.

White House spokesman Tony Snow defined bipartisanship in that case as the Democrats supporting the president's plan because both parties now share power - and the responsibility to protect the country against terrorists. On Bush's terms.

Bruce Buchanan, a political scientist at the University of Texas, said he doubts that either side would be successfully or permanently scarred as obstructionist or face a backlash from voters at this early stage, still two years from the next election. Thus, he said, "Bush probably thinks it's too soon to sing Kumbaya with the Democrats."

MORE ON THE JUDICIAL NOMINEES:

-William G. Haynes, nominated to the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Richmond, Va., was assailed by Democrats during his hearings for his role in crafting Bush administration policies on enemy detentions and treatment. He served as general counsel for Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld.

-Michael B. Wallace is an accomplished private-practice attorney from Mississippi and a nominee to the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in New Orleans. He was rated unqualified, though, by the American Bar Association - in part because the organization found that he lacked a "commitment to equal justice." Democrats seized on the report as proof that Wallace would be hostile to civil rights and to the poor.

-Federal District Judge Terrence Boyle of North Carolina technically has been waiting more than 15 years to get a seat on the 4th Circuit bench in Richmond. He was nominated by the first President Bush, but never got a hearing. He was re-nominated by the current President Bush in 2001 but was initially blocked by North Carolina Sen. John Edwards, who thought the bench needed more African-Americans.

Boyle has been accused of being hostile to civil rights, and Democrats have vowed to filibuster him. The closest he's come to confirmation was a committee vote a year ago. His nomination expired before a floor vote, so he'd need another nod from the committee before a confirmation vote could take place.

-William G. Myers is a mining lobbyist from Idaho, nominated to the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco. Democrats have portrayed him as hostile to environmental interests, a key issue in the Western states covered by the court to which he's nominated. He hasn't gotten a committee vote yet.

-Norman Randy Smith, nominated to the 9th Circuit, and Peter D. Keisler, nominated to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia, have been opposed for less partisan reasons, but they'll still likely face opposition.

Smith, a federal district judge from Idaho, was nominated to a seat on the appeals court that Californians traditionally have held. Democrats have opposed him for that reason.

Keisler, a former clerk for Judge Robert Bork and Supreme Court Justice Anthony Kennedy, is opposed by Democrats who complain that his resume offers few clues as to what kind of judge he'd be. Some activist groups also criticize his nomination to the D.C. Circuit because he'd occupy a controversial new seat - one that Senate Republicans denied to Harvard Law School Dean Elena Kagan during the Clinton years.

Bush Choice For Family-Planning Post Criticized (WP)

By Christopher Lee

The Washington Post, November 17, 2006

The Bush administration has appointed a new chief of family-planning programs at the Department of Health and Human Services who worked at a Christian pregnancy-counseling organization that regards the distribution of contraceptives as "demeaning to women."

Eric Keroack, medical director for A Woman's Concern, a nonprofit group based in Dorchester, Mass., will become deputy assistant secretary for population affairs in the next two weeks, department spokeswoman Christina Pearson said yesterday.

Keroack, an obstetrician-gynecologist, will advise Secretary Mike Leavitt on matters such as reproductive health and adolescent pregnancy. He will oversee $283 million in annual family-planning grants that, according to HHS, are "designed to provide access to contraceptive supplies and information to all who want and need them with priority given to low-income persons."

The appointment, which does not require Senate confirmation, was the latest provocative personnel move by the White House since Democrats won control of Congress in this month's midterm elections. President Bush last week pushed the Senate to confirm John R. Bolton as ambassador to the United Nations and this week renominated six candidates for appellate court judgeships who have previously been blocked by lawmakers. Democrats said the moves belie Bush's post-election promises of bipartisanship.

The Keroack appointment angered many family-planning advocates, who noted that A Woman's Concern supports sexual abstinence until marriage, opposes contraception and does not distribute information promoting birth control at its six centers in eastern Massachusetts.

"A Woman's Concern is persuaded that the crass commercialization and distribution of birth control is demeaning to women, degrading of human sexuality and adverse to human health and happiness," the group's Web site says.

Keroack was traveling and could not be reached for comment. John O. Agwunobi, assistant secretary for health, said Keroack "is highly qualified and a well-respected physician . . . working primarily with women and girls in crisis."

Mark Conrad, president of A Woman's Concern, said Keroack would be able to make the transition to leading a federal program in which provision of birth control is an integral part. "I don't think it's going to be an issue for him," he said.

The group helps women in unplanned pregnancies but discourages abortions, Conrad said. He said the decision is the woman's but "we do want to give her the opportunity to have all the information and the support necessary to choose life."

Marilyn Keefe, interim president of the National Family Planning and Reproductive Health Association, which represents 4,000 family-planning clinics, said Keroack's work "seems to really be geared toward furthering anti-choice, anti-contraception policies." She added that despite the congressional election results, the appointment "goes to show you the importance of controlling the White House and how important federal agencies are in the delivery of health services."

The federal family-planning program, created in 1970, supports a network of 4,600 family-planning clinics that provide information and counseling to 5 million people each year. Services include patient education and counseling, breast and pelvic exams, pregnancy diagnosis and counseling, and screenings for cervical cancer, sexually transmitted diseases and HIV.

Cecile Richards, president of the Planned Parenthood Federation of America, called Keroack's appointment "striking proof that the Bush administration remains dramatically out of step with the nation's priorities."

Taken together, Keroack's appointment, the Bolton push and the judicial renominations suggest that although Bush may work for consensus with Democrats on selected issues, he does not plan to avoid decisions simply because lawmakers will disagree, and he may in fact seek fights in some instances when he feels they may be useful politically.

Confirmation of Bolton and the judicial nominees are popular causes with Bush's conservative base, and a family-planning chief from an organization that opposes contraceptives may appeal to disaffected social conservatives.

White House spokeswoman Dana M. Perino cautioned against reading a larger pattern into the recent moves, saying, "You have to look at these things in isolation."

She added: "The president has said we will look to reach common ground where we can find it. However, he's not going to compromise on his principles."

Family-planning Head Leads Anti-contraceptive Group (LAT)

By Christopher Lee

The Los Angeles Times, November 17, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Bush administration has appointed a new chief of family-planning programs at the Department of Health and Human Services who helps lead a Christian pregnancy counseling organization that regards the distribution of contraceptives as "demeaning to women."

Dr. Eric Keroack, medical director for A Woman's Concern, a nonprofit group based in Dorchester, Mass., will become deputy assistant secretary for population affairs in the next two weeks, department spokeswoman Christina Pearson said Thursday.

Keroack, an obstetrician-gynecologist, will advise Secretary Mike Leavitt on matters such as reproductive health and adolescent pregnancy. He will oversee $283 million in annual family-planning grants that, according to the department, are "designed to provide access to contraceptive supplies and information to all who want and need them with priority given to low-income persons."

The appointment does not require Senate confirmation.

The Keroack appointment has angered many family-planning advocates, who note that A Woman's Concern supports sexual abstinence until marriage, opposes contraception and does not distribute information promoting birth control at its six pregnancy service centers in eastern Massachusetts.

"A Woman's Concern is persuaded that the crass commercialization and distribution of birth control is demeaning to women, degrading of human sexuality and adverse to human health and happiness," the group's policy statement on contraception says.

Keroack could not be reached for comment.

John O. Agwunobi, assistant secretary for health, said Keroack was "highly qualified and a well-respected physician … working primarily with women and girls in crisis."

A Woman's Concern President Mark Conrad said Keroack would be able to make the transition to leading a federal program in which the provision of birth control is an integral part. "I don't think it's going to be an issue for him," Conrad said.

The group helps women in unplanned pregnancies but discourages abortions, Conrad said. He said the decision was a woman's but "we do want to give her the opportunity to have all the information and the support necessary to choose life."

DOJ_NMG_0095637

Marilyn Keefe, interim president of the National Family Planning and Reproductive Health Assn., which represents 4,000 family-planning clinics, said Keroack's work seemed "to really be geared toward furthering anti-choice, anti-contraception policies."

The federal family-planning program, created in 1970, supports a network of 4,600 family-planning clinics that provide information and counseling to 5 million people a year. Services include patient education and counseling, breast and pelvic exams, pregnancy diagnosis and counseling, and screenings for cervical cancer, sexually transmitted diseases and HIV.

Cecile Richards, president of Planned Parenthood Federation of America, said in a statement that Keroack's appointment was "striking proof that the Bush administration remains dramatically out of step with the nation's priorities."

Still Waiting For Bipartisanship (NYT)

The New York Times, November 17, 2006

The voters sent a clear message last week that they do not want the far right of the Republican Party calling the shots in Washington. But President Bush has ignored the message, resubmitting a group of archconservative, underqualified judicial nominees that Senate Democrats have already said are unacceptable. With the Democrats about to take control of the Senate, it is highly unlikely that these men will be confirmed. But the renominations suggest that when it comes to filling judgeships, Mr. Bush is still not looking for either excellence or common ground.

The four most controversial nominees that President Bush resubmitted are ideological in the extreme. William Myers III, a longtime lobbyist for mining and timber interests, would no doubt use his position on the San Francisco-based United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit to gut environmental laws. William Haynes II, who helped develop the administration's torture and "enemy combatant" policies as the top lawyer for the Pentagon, could be counted on to undermine both civil liberties and reasonable limits on executive power.

Terrence Boyle, a district court judge in North Carolina and a former aide to Senator Jesse Helms, has a long record of insensitivity to victims of race and disability discrimination. He would be able to pull the law in the wrong direction in these areas if he became an appeals court judge. Michael Wallace, a former lawyer for Senator Trent Lott, Republican of Mississippi, has a bad civil rights record, including arguing in favor of letting Bob Jones University, which discriminated on the basis of race, keep its tax-exempt status.

Beyond their ideology, these nominees embody values that the American people rejected in the midterm elections. The voters were angry about the influence of lobbyists and special interests. But Mr. Myers would bring that influence onto a powerful appeals court. The voters were upset about the incompetence this administration has shown on everything from Iraq to Hurricane Katrina. But Mr. Wallace is the very rare appeals court nominee to receive a unanimous "not qualified" rating from the American Bar Association.

A fifth appeals court nominee, Peter Keisler, is likely to face stiff opposition for well-founded procedural reasons. When President Clinton tried to fill this seat on the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, Republican senators blocked him, saying the court needed only 10 judges. Since then, the court's caseload has decreased. It is unlikely that Democratic senators will allow the Republicans to fill the seat now.

President Bush's decision to resubmit these names could be a final sop to his far-right base. Perhaps, once this slate fails one more time, he will make more reasonable choices. Mr. Bush may have no other choice, if he wants to get any nominees confirmed in the next two years. Senator Charles Schumer, Democrat of New York, has said that "the days of hard-right judges" are over, and when Democrats take over in the Senate, he will be in a position to see that they are.

A Symbolic Step On Judges (WP)

The Washington Post, November 17, 2006

GIVEN HIS PLEDGES of bipartisanship after this month's elections, President Bush's decision to resubmit a crop of his most controversial judicial nominations strikes a discordant note. Democrats have opposed most of these nominees for good reasons. Mr. Bush has next to no chance of getting them confirmed in the lame-duck session, still less of one when Democrats take over in January. Renominating them now, therefore, smacks of GOP chest-thumping and a gratuitous thumbing of the nose at bipartisanship. To be sure, Mr. Bush, like his predecessor, has a legitimate gripe about the manner in which the Senate has treated his judicial nominees, some of whom have had to wait unduly long periods without receiving the courtesy of a vote. Mr. Bush is clearly trying to emphasize that the Senate owes the presidency and its nominees timely and reasonable consideration. But insisting on nominations that the other side regards as unsuitable when they have no prospect of success is hardly the way to make this point.

The real test of Mr. Bush's commitment to a more bipartisan approach to nominations will come in January, when he confronts the new Congress and its Democratic-led Senate Judiciary Committee. At that point, he should decline to renominate four of the current group of nominees. Democrats have valid objections on the merits to William J. Haynes II, William G. Myers III, Terrence W. Boyle Jr. and Michael B. Wallace -- all nominees to federal appeals courts. Mr. Haynes, the Pentagon's general counsel, has been a key player in the military's policies on detentions and interrogations in the war on terrorism. Mr. Myers has a dreadful record of anti-environmental activism. Judge Boyle, who serves on the U.S. District Court in North Carolina, has a troubling history in civil rights cases. And the American Bar Association unanimously rated Mr. Wallace "unqualified" for service on the bench.

With these four nominees, Mr. Bush has a simple choice: He can subject them, and himself, to likely defeat by votes in the committee or on the Senate floor, or he can work to find nominees for these seats who satisfy his criteria and can win broad support on both sides of the aisle. Failure to do the latter will provoke needless confrontation even while perpetuating vacancies on the bench.

The harder question is what to do about Peter D. Keisler, Mr. Bush's highly qualified nominee to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit. Mr. Keisler certainly warrants confirmation. Yet like a string of qualified nominees to the same court before him, he is caught up in a dispute over how many seats the court should have. It has 10 sitting judges; many people believe its two empty seats are unnecessary given its workload, and Republican senators blocked President Bill Clinton's nominees to the seats on that basis. More recently, Democrats have turned the tables. On the merits, the complaint may be right. But it has been grossly unfair to nominees of both parties to decide this policy dispute in the context of evaluating their confirmations. The number ought to be decided before Mr. Bush subjects Mr. Keisler or anyone else to a tempestuous fight having little to do with their qualifications.

Democrats Prepare To Raise Minimum Wage (AP-Y)

By Kevin Freking, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 17, 2006

It looks like full steam ahead for a significant boost to the federal minimum wage when Democrats assume control of Congress in January.

Sen. Edward Kennedy of Massachusetts said Thursday that increasing the federal minimum wage from $5.15 to $7.25 would be his top priority as chairman of the Senate Committee on Health, Education, Labor and Pensions.

On the House side, incoming Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., already has listed an increase in the minimum wage as one of the issues that would be taken up during the first 100 hours of the next Congress.

"Americans are working harder than ever, but millions of hardworking men and women across the country aren't getting their fair share," Kennedy said during a speech outlining his legislative agenda for next year. "We're not rewarding work fairly anymore, and working families are falling behind."

President Bush signaled readiness last week to consider some Democratic priorities such as a minimum-wage increase, overhauling immigration policy and finding compromise on renewing the No Child Left Behind education law.

Critics of boosting the minimum wage say it kills job creation as employers hire fewer entry-level workers to compensate for the higher wage expenses. Kennedy said the minimum wage has remained at $5.15 an hour for nearly 10 years.

Most states have their own minimum wages laws, with some states having rates the same as the federal minimum wage and some with rates higher than the federal minimum.

Kennedy noted that ballot initiatives establishing or raising the minimum wage in six states all passed in this month's election.

DOJ_NMG_0095639

"If there is one message from this election that emerged loud and clear, it's that no one who works for a living should have to live in poverty," Kennedy said.

Kennedy also said he would seek to expand federal support for research on stem cells coming from embryos, which Congress approved last year, but Bush vetoed. The issue won't go away, he promised.

On education, Kennedy said he would seek to make college more affordable by increasing the size of Pell Grants from $4,050 to $5,100, and by cutting interest rates on student loans.

"It is more important than ever for our citizens to have a college education so they can compete in the global economy and have a fair chance at the American dream," he said.

On health care, Kennedy said the Senate's HELP committee would expand a health insurance program that now provides health coverage for about 4 million children. He also would look for ways to expand coverage to other populations too, he said, but he did not provide specifics, such as how to pay for that coverage.

Kennedy Sets Sights On Child Health Care (WT)

By Amy Fagan

The Washington Times, November 17, 2006

The soon-to-be chairman of the Senate health panel said yesterday his ultimate goal is to have the government provide health care coverage for all Americans.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat, said he knows it will take awhile to gain support for the idea, so he will focus in the meantime on extending coverage to different groups, starting with covering more children under the existing Children's Health Insurance Program (CHIP) -- something he thinks there is "a lot of sentiment for."

But Mr. Kennedy, who yesterday laid out his agenda for the Health Education Labor and Workforce Committee, said universal health care is the goal.

"We want to continue the progress in terms of coverage," he said. "We will have to take a longer period of time ... developing the support for that."

Mr. Kennedy argued that covering everyone is possible because his home state did it.

"We proved that people from all parts of the political spectrum can come together to provide health care for all," he said. "So this, too, is one of our top goals for the coming year."

Also, at the top of the "to-do" list provided by his staff is an initiative titled "Medicare for All," which would expand federal Medicare coverage to Americans younger than 65 years old. The expansion would be done in phases -- first to the 55- to 65-year-old age group and then to children younger than 20. The proposal is designed to be the starting point for discussions on universal coverage.

The rest of Mr. Kennedy's agenda for the committee includes increasing the minimum wage, allowing Medicare to negotiate directly with drug companies for lower drug prices, expanding federal support for embryonic-stem-cell research, helping college students by increasing Pell Grants, capping college loan payments and cutting student-loan interest rates -- goals that Rep. Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat, has said she, too, will tackle soon after she takes the reins as House speaker in January.

Mr. Kennedy's Medicare-for-all proposal is co-sponsored by Rep. John D. Dingell, Michigan Democrat, and would provide comprehensive coverage, including prescription drugs. According to a summary from Mr. Kennedy's office, initial estimates put the proposal in the neighborhood of $600 billion per year in terms of cost, but it would generate $380 billion a year in savings, and costs would be covered by payroll taxes and general revenues.

Mr. Kennedy and others say it's past time for such a change because skyrocketing health care costs burden society and business.

Democrats also will focus on improving CHIP, which covers 4 million low-income children and is administered by the states. Many states are facing steep funding shortfalls for the program, and incoming Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat, said recently "the first thing we must do is address these shortfalls so these children do not lose their existing coverage, and work to improve this vitally successful program as we reauthorize it next year."

Ending Hunger (WP)

The Washington Post, November 17, 2006

THE AGRICULTURE Department has taken what you might call the Scarlett O'Hara approach to Americans without enough to eat: It will never call them hungry again. Rumbling stomachs? Malnourishment? That's not hunger, the department says. It's experiencing "very low food security."

Maybe there's some scientific basis for this Orwellian recasting. The lead author of the annual report on Americans' access to food told The Post's Elizabeth Williamson that "hungry" is "not a scientifically accurate term for the specific phenomenon being measured." The bland phrase "food insecurity" has been used for years to describe households that have problems putting enough food on the table -- though until this year they were divided into two groups: "food insecurity without hunger" and, for those in the most desperate straits, "food insecurity with hunger." This latter group is being renamed "very low food security," meaning those in it show "multiple indications of disrupted eating patterns and reduced food intake." In other words, they're hungry.

Whatever the intention, this linguistic airbrushing diminishes the shame of the problem, its persistence and its scope. That 11 million Americans reported going hun -- sorry, reported disrupted eating patterns -- is a national embarrassment. In this group, 96 percent said they cut the size of meals or skipped meals because they didn't have enough money. The same percentage said their food did not last and they did not have enough money to get more.

At least the USDA doesn't have jurisdiction over national monuments. Otherwise, just imagine it going after the inscription on the Statue of Liberty next: "Give me your energy-deficient, your financially challenged, your space-impaired masses yearning to breathe free."

Pelosi Makes History As Female Speaker (AP-Y)

By David Espo, Ap Special Correspondent

AP, November 17, 2006

Democrats embraced Rep. Nancy Pelosi as the first woman House speaker in history on Thursday, then quickly snubbed her, selecting Steny Hoyer of Maryland as majority leader against her wishes.

"Let the healing begin," Pelosi, D-Calif., said after Hoyer had eased past her preferred candidate, Rep. John Murtha, a prominent opponent of the war in Iraq. The secret-ballot vote for Hoyer was 149-86. She was chosen by acclamation.

Added Hoyer, a 25-year veteran of Congress: "The Republicans need to know, the president needs to know and the country needs to know our caucus is unified today."

Hoyer, Murtha and several other Democrats predicted there would be no lingering effects from the bruising leadership campaign as the party looks ahead to taking control of the House in January after a dozen years in the minority.

Not everyone sounded convinced, though. "It created these tensions that we now have to work on," said Rep. Jose Serrano of New York, a Hoyer supporter.

Rep. Jim Moran, D-Va., who backed Murtha, said some members of the rank-and-file had told both rival camps to count them as supporters. "We know who they are," he said, although he later added that many of them were lawmakers whose victories on Nov. 7 gave Democrats their majority.

"If they're freshmen, they get a pass on this one," he said.

Democrats chose their leaders for the next two years as lawmakers in both houses labored to wrap up work for the expiring 109th Congress and look ahead to the 110th, which convenes on Jan. 4.

House Republicans hold elections on Friday, with a two-way race for minority leader.

Rep. John Boehner of Ohio, the current majority leader, faces a challenge from Rep. Mike Pence of Indiana. A third contender, Rep. Joe Barton of Texas, dropped out of the race and endorsed Boehner.

Missouri Rep. Roy Blunt, the incumbent GOP whip, also drew an opponent, Rep. John Shadegg of Arizona.

Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., has decided to step down from leadership in the wake of his party's election defeat.

Pelosi, 66, faced neither challenger nor controversy in her own race to become the Democrats' choice for speaker — and the first woman in history — after four years as party leader.

DOJ_NMG_0095641

Her ascension awaits a vote by the full House on Jan. 4, the opening day of the new Congress.

"We made history and now we will make progress for the American people," the Californian told fellow Democrats moments after her selection in the closed meeting, according to officials familiar with her remarks.

She pledged that after 12 years in the minority, "we will not be dazzled by money and special interests."

A veteran of nearly two decades in Congress, Pelosi raised more than $50 million for the party's candidates and committees over the past two years. In her time as minority leader, she was credited with molding an often-fractious rank-and-file into a unified force opposing the conservative agenda advanced by President Bush and congressional Republicans.

The race between Hoyer and Murtha was tinged with the residue of a leadership election five years ago. Pelosi defeated Hoyer then to become the party's whip, with Murtha as her campaign manager.

Hoyer, 67, was the front-runner from the start in the current race for majority leader after having served as second-ranking in the leadership for four years. Like Pelosi, he campaigned widely and raised millions for fellow Democrats in the run-up to the congressional elections.

On Sunday Pelosi stepped forcefully into the race — out of loyalty to Murtha, her allies said. She issued a letter of support for him, praising him for having called a year ago for an end to the U.S. military presence in Iraq.

"I salute your courageous leadership that changed the national debate and helped make Iraq the central issue of this historic election," she wrote.

Four days later, behind closed doors, she lauded Murtha for having altered the course of the campaign debate on the war and said it was in part responsible for the Democrats' electoral victories. She urged fellow Democrats to elect him majority leader to help her change the course of the war.

Hoyer countered with nominating speeches from three lawmakers from Pelosi's state of California, Reps. Henry Waxman, Lucille Roybal-Allard and Dennis Cardoza.

Cardoza, who earlier had made a nominating speech for Pelosi, then urged fellow Democrats to pick Hoyer despite her wishes to the contrary. He said the two had been a team and would continue to be a team, and he added, "Have the courage to do what you know is right."

Murtha is a former Marine, widely respected for his knowledge of defense issues and now in line to become chairman of the subcommittee with control over the Pentagon budget. His bid for the leadership led critics to recall the Abscam bribery scandal of 1980, an FBI sting operation that sent some lawmakers to jail. Murtha was never charged in the case, despite a videotape that showed him being offered $50,000. "I'm not interested ... at this point," he said.

On Thursday, Rep. Jerrold Nadler of New York said Hoyer's victory was due in part to gratitude lawmakers felt at his campaign efforts. "Along with Nancy and Rahm, Steny deserves a lot of credit for getting us here." Rep. Rahm Emanuel of Illinois served as chairman of the party's House campaign committee and was rewarded Thursday with the caucus chair post, the No. 4 position.

The Democrats also selected James Clyburn of South Carolina as majority whip, their No. 3 post. He is the second black lawmaker in history to reach as high as a party whip. William Gray of Pennsylvania held the same title 1989-91.

Other Democrats evaluated Pelosi's decision to take sides.

"She's a very smart woman who made an error in judgment," said Rep. Barney Frank, D-Mass.

Rep. David Obey of Wisconsin added, "She's gutsy as hell and she's willing to take a chance."

Democrats Pick Hoyer Over Murtha (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman And Lois Romano

The Washington Post, November 17, 2006

House Democrats elected Rep. Steny H. Hoyer (Md.) the new majority leader yesterday over strong opposition from Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi (Calif.), exposing a deep political divide even before the party takes control.

The 149 to 86 vote for Hoyer over Rep. John P. Murtha (Pa.) was viewed by many in the party as a repudiation of Pelosi's strong-arm tactics and a recognition of Hoyer's tireless work to elect a Democratic majority for the first time in 12 years. If the

Hoyer camp's head count was correct going into yesterday's secret balloting, Pelosi and her allies may not have swayed a single vote for Murtha, a close associate.

Pelosi, 66, was formally chosen by the Democratic caucus as the first female House speaker in history. In a show of unity after the closed-door meeting in a House office building, she and Hoyer smiled and embraced. But the two longtime rivals must now try to pick up the pieces after a bitter intraparty fight and prepare for a new Congress in January, when the Democrats must be ready to pass a new domestic agenda and challenge President Bush on the Iraq war and foreign policy.

A buoyant Hoyer vowed to work closely with Pelosi and Murtha to force Bush to change his Iraq policy and begin withdrawing troops. Pelosi had strongly backed Murtha, 74, for majority leader largely because of his early call for a troop withdrawal, which she said helped galvanize the party and win the Nov. 7 midterm elections.

The Murtha camp accused Hoyer, 67, a moderate, of a "stay the course" mentality on Iraq. Hoyer said that charge did not accurately reflect his call for a phased redeployment of U.S. troops. Yesterday, Hoyer pledged to work for the adoption of a new agenda that "is going to reach across to the president of the United States and say, 'Mr. President, we need to make a transition in Iraq; it is not working; we need to change the policy, not stay the course.' "

Both Hoyer and Murtha claimed to have a majority of votes going into yesterday's showdown, but even Pelosi had to concede that Hoyer's final margin was "a stunning victory."

Pelosi had made it clear for months that she favored Murtha over Hoyer. But on Sunday, she shocked even her staff by directly intervening in the contest by issuing a letter throwing her support to Murtha, a former Marine and the ranking Democrat on the House Appropriations subcommittee on defense.

Pelosi's aggressive, last-minute campaign for Murtha in the face of overwhelming support for Hoyer left many Democrats worried that she has become too reliant on a tight inner circle, too reluctant to listen to the broader Democratic caucus and mistakenly convinced that she can dictate the direction the caucus must take.

"Basically, she got spanked," said a House Democrat close to both Pelosi and Hoyer, who spoke on the condition of anonymity for fear of repercussions. "She got taken to the woodshed. If she doesn't get it, this is going to be a big problem over the long run."

"Maybe it will help Nancy understand the use of power, the time and place for it," said a senior Democrat with close ties to Capitol Hill.

But others think the dust-up may have been useful in clearing the air between Pelosi and Hoyer. "Here's the deal -- she's apparently been irritated by a perception that Steny has been undermining her, and it's an incorrect perception," said Rep. Barney Frank (D-Mass.). "Look, someone told me she hasn't liked him since 1963, and it has had zero effect on how well they have worked together. We don't have to guess at this. We have seen it. They can and will work well together as we move forward."

After the party elections yesterday, Pelosi and Hoyer emerged from the caucus room beaming and grabbed each other's hands. Behind them was a grim-looking Murtha, with his hands in his pockets and his eyes cast down.

"We've had our debates. We've had our disagreements in that room, and now that is over. As I said to my colleagues . . . let there be peace on Earth, and let it begin with us. Let the healing begin," Pelosi said.

Later, Hoyer held private conversations with Murtha and Rep. George Miller (D-Calif.), a Pelosi confidant who led the charge for Murtha's election. All the players pledged to unify behind the new Democratic team, which will include House Majority Whip-elect James E. Clyburn (D-S.C.), House Democratic Caucus Chairman Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.) and House Democratic Caucus Vice Chairman John B. Larson (D-Conn.).

"We may have . . . differences from time to time," Hoyer said. "But the Republicans need to know, the president needs to know and the country needs to know our caucus is unified today."

But the top of the ticket has considerable mending to do. Pelosi expressed no regrets for her efforts on Murtha's behalf. On the contrary, she stood by her choice for majority leader, despite the avalanche of negative reactions that raised questions about Murtha's ethics and commitment to changing the role of lobbying and money in the House.

"I stand very, very proudly behind my endorsement of Mr. Murtha," she told reporters after the vote.

DOJ_NMG_0095643

Emanuel said the Democratic caucus will come together as members sit down to flesh out their legislative agenda. The outlines of that agenda were put together this year through painstaking consultation with the liberal, moderate and conservative wings of the party. That process will continue to unify Democrats as the details are worked out, Emanuel said.

But yesterday, Murtha's supporters were still smarting. Miller, who angered many Democrats with his aggressive tactics on Murtha's behalf, blamed "Swift-boating" for Murtha's defeat and the resurgence of stories questioning Murtha's ethics. He said Democrats missed an opportunity to elevate a stronger, unimpeachable voice on Iraq -- the issue that brought them to power.

Hoyer, like Murtha, has signed Democratic letters calling for a phased troop withdrawal from Iraq. But last year, just after both Murtha and Pelosi said U.S. troops should be withdrawn in six months, Hoyer suggested that "a precipitous withdrawal of American forces in Iraq could lead to disaster."

Murtha allies conceded that he managed to undermine his own campaign, particularly when he told a gathering of conservative Democrats on Tuesday night that Pelosi's ethics package was "total crap."

The "Blue Dog" Democrats at that gathering said Murtha also made a critical mistake that night when he put himself forward as Pelosi's loyal lieutenant, ready to do whatever she asked of him even if he personally disagreed. Many of them had been savaged in their campaigns by Republicans who predicted that they would be rubber stamps for Pelosi, a "San Francisco liberal," and they had vowed to be independent voices in conservative-leaning districts.

Ultimately, it was Hoyer who secured his own victory, by working in the trenches for years to raise money for Democratic candidates, recruit reluctant combatants and offer advice to those just wading into the political arena.

"He had been doing the tough work," said Rep. Stephen Lynch (D-Mass.). "It's just mind-numbing -- all those fundraisers, the travel, sleeping in hotel rooms. It needs to be rewarded."

In contrast to Murtha, with his gruff demeanor and straight talk, Hoyer is a well-practiced politician with a breadth of policy knowledge who plays to the news media. Yesterday, after Pelosi gave reporters a cursory statement of support for D.C. voting rights, Hoyer jumped in with a more voluble response.

"We who live in the Washington metropolitan area believe that the country ought to take it as a moral cause to ensure the fact that every citizen of the District of Columbia has a vote in the Congress of the United States," Hoyer said. "It is the only capital in the free world that I know of whose citizens are disenfranchised."

Pelosi's Early Setback Has Her Party On Alert (LAT)

By Janet Hook And Richard Simon

The Los Angeles Times, November 17, 2006

WASHINGTON — Rep. Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco) was elevated to the pinnacle of congressional power Thursday as fellow Democrats formally made her their choice as the next House speaker. But the same colleagues gave Pelosi a brusque lesson in the limits of her power when they rejected her choice for second in command.

In a battle that many felt Pelosi made unnecessarily bitter, House Democrats turned aside her personal pleas and arm-twisting and elected a Pelosi rival, Rep. Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.), to be House majority leader over Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.).

Hoyer didn't merely defeat Murtha, Pelosi's strong preference, but trounced him in a 149-86 vote as House Democrats met to choose leaders in the wake of a midterm election that gave their party control of the House and Senate for the first time since 1994.

Democrats selected her as their choice for speaker, but she will not assume the post until the new Congress convenes in January and takes a formal vote.

Pelosi's failed effort to anoint her own chief lieutenant fueled doubts among critics about the political skills she brings to leading her fractious party. It also sent a clear signal of what kind of leader she is: an old-style politician who puts a premium on personal loyalty, even at the risk of high-profile defeat.

Still buoyed by their election day victories, some Democrats were left wondering why Pelosi had injected herself into a bitter leadership battle with her last-minute support of Murtha over Hoyer, who had long been on track to claim the No. 2 job.

Rep. Barney Frank (D-Mass.) said a lot of members are wondering, "How did someone as good and as smart as she make this one mistake?"

DOJ_NMG_0095644

Though Frank said he thought the episode would blow over, others saw it as a blunder that called for some serious fence-mending.

"The caucus is fractured in a way because of her involvement" in the leadership race, said Rep. Allen Boyd (D-Fla.). "Her big challenge, starting from this moment, is to figure out how to wrap her arms around the caucus. It was a mistake for her to get involved."

A big factor in Murtha's loss was the concern about ethics problems in his past and his reputation as a backroom dealer who is cozy with lobbyists — a profile that critics said would undercut the anti-corruption message that Pelosi broadcast in the midterm campaign.

Some fear that Pelosi's handling of the situation is a warning sign that her reliance on a close-knit circle of advisors sometimes blinds her to potential problems, such as the backlash against Murtha for his perceived ethics problems. Murtha was named an unindicted co-conspirator in the 1980 Abscam bribery scandal.

"It raises questions about her judgment," said Thomas Mann, a Brookings Institution expert on Congress. "She did a good job helping Democrats back into the majority, then takes a stand that seems to weaken those very members who got elected by campaigning against corruption."

Another challenge faces Pelosi in the coming weeks, when she is to choose a new intelligence committee chair. Rep. Alcee L. Hastings (D-Fla.) is in line, but some Democrats fear that he, like Murtha, will come under fire for past ethics lapses. Hastings was impeached as a federal judge in the 1980s.

People close to Pelosi say there is a one-word explanation for why she took the unusual step of weighing in on Murtha's behalf: loyalty.

The daughter of a Baltimore mayor who practiced old-school machine politics, Pelosi is a strong believer in rewarding those who are loyal to her, through thick and thin. Five years ago, for example, she stood by then-Rep. Gary Condit (D-Ceres) when he was fighting for reelection amid allegations that he had had an affair with an intern who had mysteriously disappeared and was eventually found slain.

Though other Democratic leaders endorsed Condit's primary opponent, Pelosi endorsed Condit, who had backed her in a hard-fought 2001 campaign against Hoyer to become minority whip.

That bitter leadership battle was also the root of the tensions between Pelosi and Hoyer — and of her lasting alliance with Murtha, who managed her campaign for whip and helped her, a liberal, overcome the suspicions of more conservative Democrats.

When Murtha announced this year that he would challenge Hoyer for majority leader if Democrats won control of the House, Pelosi did not stop him.

Last November, Pelosi followed Murtha's lead after the longtime hawk dropped his support for the war in Iraq and called for a U.S. withdrawal, a position that put both of them at odds with Hoyer. Pelosi believed Murtha's leadership on Iraq helped change the national debate and contributed mightily to the Democrats' victory on election day.

As Murtha campaigned for the majority leader post, hardly anyone doubted that Pelosi would back him. But it was not clear how far she would go with her support, or how publicly. Hoyer had been gathering chits for years. When Murtha's vote count last week showed him far behind, he asked Pelosi to go public with her support, according to an aide close to the Murtha campaign.

Pelosi wrote a letter of support last weekend while she was in New York with her daughter, who was about to have a baby. Hoyer supporters were hoping the letter would just be a proforma endorsement for an old friend, but it turned out to be the beginning of much more.

Pelosi provided a powerful voice for Murtha in a group that was crucial to the outcome of the election: the 40-odd newly elected Democratic freshmen.

Hoyer was thought to have a leg up with that group, because he had been active in recruiting many as candidates. But Pelosi had another claim on their loyalty, as she had campaigned for many of them.

When those new members came to her to discuss their committee assignments, over which she will have control, she made a point of telling them she wanted Murtha to be majority leader. Some interpreted that as a threat of second-rate assignments if they voted for Hoyer. Pelosi aides said no threats were intended.

DOJ_NMG_0095645

Pelosi understood that it was risky to stick her neck out, aides said: Win or lose, she would probably leave Hoyer and his allies embittered.

"She always says, 'I'm a risk taker. I'm loyal to my friends, and I stick with them in difficult times,' " said a Pelosi aide, who, like other staff members, asked to remain unnamed in order to discuss the internal workings of the Democratic caucus.

The incoming House speaker apparently did not anticipate that Murtha's past ethics problems would become an issue, assuming that it was ancient history.

But the past was resurrected by Murtha's critics, and cable networks began to play decades-old Abscam videotapes that showed Murtha rejecting a bribe in a way that seemed less than definite.

Pelosi said after the vote that she had no regrets.

"I stand very, very proudly behind my endorsement of Mr. Murtha," she said. "As I said in my letter to members on Sunday, I believe the biggest ethical challenge facing our country is the war in Iraq."

Some Democrats said that the setback could send a message to Pelosi that rank-and-file members want her to reach beyond her inner circle and not try to run the party with top-down leadership.

"Loyalty can be blinding," said a former House Democratic leader who did not want to be named for fear of offending Pelosi. "You can't force somebody on people if they don't want them."

Others said the episode showed a side of Pelosi's leadership that might be welcome when it came to battling the Bush administration.

"She's gutsy as hell, and she's willing to take chances," said Rep. David R. Obey (D-Wis.). "She will push the envelope."

Party Gets A Rocky Start (LAT)

By Richard Simon

The Los Angeles Times, November 17, 2006

WASHINGTON— The Democrats put on their best faces after Thursday's testy leadership fight.

"As we say in church, let there be peace on Earth, and let it begin with us," Speaker-designate Nancy Pelosi said after her choice for the No. 2 job in the House was soundly defeated. "Let the healing begin."

But several admitted that the episode — which saw Rep. Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland defeat Rep. John P. Murtha of Pennsylvania for House majority leader — was a poor way to kick off their tenure as the party in control of the new Congress.

"These aren't the headlines we wanted to generate," said a Democratic lawmaker who spoke on condition that he not be named for fear of retribution from the leadership.

Pelosi's backing of Murtha rankled many of her colleagues. It also ensured that as the party takes control of the House in January for the first time in 12 years, all eyes will be on any sign of friction between her and Hoyer.

Their ability to work together is critical. As second in command to the speaker, the majority leader "keeps the legislative trains running on time and the workers toiling at their posts," as former Speaker Newt Gingrich put it.

The speaker — second in line to the presidency — is responsible for the workings of the entire chamber and plays the lead role in shaping the ruling party's legislative agenda and political strategy.

Pelosi was unchallenged for the job.

Also elected to the leadership team Thursday was Rep. James E. Clyburn (D-S.C.), a former head of the Congressional Black Caucus, who will become majority whip.

Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.), architect of the House Democratic election victory, will chair the Democratic caucus.

Hoyer, 67, whose first name was his parents' adaptation of the Danish name Steen, won his House seat in a special election in 1981. He worked his way up the Democratic leadership ranks, but lost the whip job in 2001 to Pelosi. Many Democrats believe Hoyer's decision to wage that race was the genesis of her opposition to him now.

Hoyer became minority whip in 2002, after Pelosi succeeded Richard A. Gephardt of Missouri as minority leader; the two have held those posts since then.

DOJ_NMG_0095646

In Thursday's contest, Hoyer enjoyed the backing of a diverse group, from liberals to members of the Blue Dogs, a coalition of moderate and conservative Democrats.

Several Democrats said they voted for Hoyer because he already held the No. 2 job among them.

"I saw it as Steny's turn," said Rep. Mike Ross (D-Ark.).

House Republicans choose their leaders today. The key race pits Reps. John A. Boehner (R-Ohio), the current majority leader, against Mike Pence (R-Ind.), a leader of House conservatives, for minority leader.

At least one Republican couldn't resist weighing in on the Democrats' selections.

"Hoyer winning is a slap in Pelosi's face — and I must confess, it makes me smile," said Rep. Patrick T. McHenry (R-N.C.).

House Democrats Choose Hoyer As Majority Leader (MCT)

By Margaret Talev

McClatchy Newspapers, November 17, 2006

WASHINGTON - In an early check on the power of incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi of California, her own Democratic caucus on Thursday rejected the anti-war leader she wanted as her top deputy and instead chose a Maryland moderate considered less polarizing.

Rep. Steny Hoyer defeated Rep. Jack Murtha of Pennsylvania in a lopsided 149-86 secret-ballot vote to become House majority leader. It was a show of loyalty to Hoyer, who's spent years recruiting Democratic candidates and building bridges across the ideological spectrum. Hoyer also has worked cooperatively with Pelosi as her second-in-command since he lost a leadership challenge to her five years ago, something she's never forgotten.

Thursday's vote also reflected a widespread concern among House Democrats that Murtha's ethical baggage and reputation for bullying outweighed his claim to a reward for helping Democrats win back Congress this year through his outspoken advocacy of withdrawing U.S. troops from Iraq. Murtha, a Pennsylvania steel-country conservative and ex-Marine, is a longtime Pelosi loyalist, but that wasn't enough.

In the end, most political analysts said, the dust-up came early enough in Pelosi's leadership that she can afford to lose the battle, mend fences and secure her position.

But one moderate Democratic congressman, who spoke on condition of anonymity for fear of retribution, said Pelosi's backing of Murtha made her look petty and shook some members' faith in her leadership.

"She owes Murtha a lot; she owes the caucus more," he said. "A good leader knows when she has to tell a member no, even when it's your friend.

"She'll either get it and lead differently," the congressman said, "or she won't lead long."

Speaking after the vote, Pelosi, Hoyer and Murtha all pledged to drop their rivalries and unite to pass legislation and pressure President Bush to change course in Iraq.

Pelosi, smiling tensely, insisted that she had no regrets about intervening on Murtha's behalf. "I thought that would be the best way to bring an end to the war in Iraq," she said.

She called Hoyer's victory "stunning" and said, "we've had our debates, we've had our disagreements in that room, and now that is over. . . let the healing begin."

Hoyer congratulated Pelosi on her pending January election as the first female Speaker of the House of Representatives. He called her "a person of deep values, keen intellect and extraordinary political ability." As for Murtha, Hoyer said: "In my opinion, it was not that somebody was rejected today. It was that a team that had been successful was asked to continue to do that job on behalf of the American people."

Murtha, fighting a grimace, congratulated Hoyer and said he'll return to the House subcommittee on defense appropriations, where he'll become chairman.

Pelosi has pledged to wipe out corruption and curb special-interest spending after a string of Republican scandals. But Murtha is a master of pork-barrel spending who was caught on video in the 1980 Abscam corruption probe rejecting a bribe but suggesting that he might consider a future deal if there was a benefit to his district.

DOJ_NMG_0095647

"I don't know how we move forward on ethical reform in Congress, which is desperately needed, when you've got this cloud hanging over Jack," said Rep.-elect Baron Hill, D-Ind., before the secret-ballot voting.

Paul Herrnson, the director of the Center for American Politics and Citizenship at the University of Maryland, said that Pelosi would've faced criticism if she'd abandoned her longtime ally.

"Politicians take loyalty very seriously, and if she had not displayed it, people would have seen that as a sign as well," he said. "Now that it's done I think (Pelosi and Hoyer) will find a way to work together. If they don't, there will be hell to pay. The congressional Democrats will have a very hard time."

Pelosi Rebuffed Over Her Choice For House Post (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, November 17, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 16 — House Democrats chose Representative Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland as their new majority leader on Thursday, rejecting the choice of the incoming speaker, Nancy Pelosi, and straining the unity of the new majority party.

In an indication that rank-and-file members would be willing to break from Ms. Pelosi, Democrats chose Mr. Hoyer over Representative John P. Murtha of Pennsylvania by a decisive vote of 149 to 86. Mr. Hoyer overcame a concerted push by Ms. Pelosi on behalf of Mr. Murtha, a combat veteran who became an influential spokesman against the Iraq war.

Despite the internal acrimony that has clouded the Democratic victory celebration of last week, the leadership team that will take control of the House in January left their closed meeting in the Cannon House Office Building, joined hands and pledged to work together in the months ahead.

“Let the healing begin,” said Ms. Pelosi, whom Democrats chose unanimously to be their candidate for speaker and who would be the first woman to hold that office. The speaker is elected by the full House.

Crediting Mr. Murtha with changing the political dynamic on the war, Ms. Pelosi sought to oust Mr. Hoyer from his position as the No. 2 Democrat. Mr. Hoyer lost a 2001 leadership battle to Ms. Pelosi. Mr. Murtha managed that 2001 fight on Ms. Pelosi’s behalf, and in backing him for majority leader, Ms. Pelosi signaled that she put a premium on loyalty.

But Democrat after Democrat said the outcome of the leadership fight was a reflection that a clear majority of the party believed that Ms. Pelosi and Mr. Hoyer had been a winning combination, despite the strains between them, and that there was no reason to make an abrupt change. In the view of many Democrats, Ms. Pelosi’s liberal reputation is offset by Mr. Hoyer’s moderate image, and she is freed to concentrate on the party’s broader message because of his floor management and vote-counting abilities, which were sharply illustrated by his victory on Thursday. [Man in the News, Page A26.]

“It is a great leadership team,” Representative Henry A. Waxman of California said in nominating Mr. Hoyer, according to notes taken by aides. “Let’s keep it in place.”

Ms. Pelosi’s push on behalf of Mr. Murtha was cheered by some liberal Democratic activists who saw it is a recognition of the war’s importance in the past election. In that sense, her support of him, even if unsuccessful, could be seen as an effort on Ms. Pelosi’s part to acknowledge the political clout of her party’s antiwar wing.

Other Democrats portrayed her decision to inject herself into the race as a miscalculation that elevated the battle into an unnecessary early test of her power and ended up giving more influence to Mr. Hoyer. But they said they did not expect hard feelings to linger.

“She is a very smart woman who made a mistake in judgment,” said Representative Barney Frank, Democrat of Massachusetts and the likely chairman of the Financial Services Committee. “I honestly don’t believe you are going to see any problems.”

Not everyone was willing to put aside the fight so quickly. Some supporters of Mr. Murtha, a longtime member of the Appropriations Committee whose candidacy was dogged by questions about his ethics record, were disgruntled and said they were trying to identify lawmakers who had broken pledges to support him.

“We won’t trust them on issues like this the next time,” said Representative James P. Moran, a Murtha ally from Virginia who said Mr. Murtha had been betrayed.

DOJ_NMG_0095648

Mr. Hoyer, on the other hand, appeared to hold all the pledges he had from members, which is not always the case in volatile secret-ballot leadership elections, and he promised to work in concert with Ms. Pelosi.

"In my opinion, it was not that somebody was rejected today," he said after the vote. "It was that a team that had been successful was asked to continue to do that job on behalf of the American people."

The House majority leader typically sets the floor schedule and decides what legislation will be brought up for a vote while also overseeing the party's strategy in advancing its agenda. The speaker is the party's top figure in the House, but that position also carries a broader role as a constitutional officer charged with representing the interests of the full chamber.

Some Democrats said that the distracting turmoil and an uneven performance by Mr. Murtha in recent days had cemented support for Mr. Hoyer. They said many lawmakers had concluded that the best chance of limiting any bitterness was to install Mr. Hoyer and, in effect, save Ms. Pelosi from what they characterized as a flawed decision.

In addition to the top two leaders, Democrats selected Representative James E. Clyburn of South Carolina as the majority whip and Representative Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, who directed the party's campaign operation, as chairman of the party caucus. A potentially wrenching fight between those two was averted when Mr. Emanuel took the chairman's post with the expectation that he would be given greater responsibilities in that role.

Until last June, Mr. Hoyer seemed to be on an easy path to majority leader if Democrats won control of the House. But Mr. Murtha, a longtime behind-the-scenes power, surprised his colleagues by announcing that he would seek the post as well. In seeking support, he emphasized his opposition to the war in Iraq and his military credentials.

Mr. Hoyer, a liberal to moderate lawmaker with close ties to the business community and a history of strong support for the federal installations in suburban Washington, had political credentials of his own. Since joining the leadership in 2002, he had been devoted to recapturing the majority, tirelessly raising money and traveling to assist fledgling Democratic candidates who were appreciative of any attention from Washington.

Mr. Murtha was also hampered by ethical questions that date back to the 1980 Abscam scandal. And he has resisted new ethics rules even though Democrats hammered Republicans on corruption in the midterms.

Mr. Murtha was visibly disappointed after the vote and said he intended to "go back to my small subcommittee that I have on appropriations," eliciting laughter since the panel handles billions of dollars in military spending.

And he once again pointed to his outspokenness on Iraq, saying, "Nancy asked me to set a policy for the Democratic Party, most of the Democrats signed on to it, and I think the Bush administration is beginning to get the word."

Allies of Ms. Pelosi said she had been drawn into the fight at Mr. Murtha's request and probably started her public campaign on his behalf too late. She began her effort with a letter on Sunday, with many members already committed to Mr. Hoyer and reluctant to reverse course. Ms. Pelosi's allies rejected the contention that she had been seriously weakened by the loss even before she took over the House.

"It does not diminish her as leader," said Representative Jan Schakowsky, Democrat of Illinois. "A vote for Steny Hoyer is not a vote against Nancy Pelosi."

Others agreed. "I thought what she did was pretty gutsy," said Representative James P. McGovern, Democrat of Massachusetts. "I think a lot of people in the room respect what she did."

Mr. Emanuel and others said the vote was also a vivid display of the independence of Democrats, which he contrasted with the tight control the Republican leadership has exerted over its membership for much of the past six years. "This is the strength of diversity and people speaking their minds," he said.

Ms. Pelosi's party problems are not all behind her, as she faces a tough decision on selecting a chairman of the Intelligence Committee.

On the one hand, she is under pressure from black lawmakers to promote a committee veteran, Alcee L. Hastings of Florida, a federal judge who was removed from the bench by Congress after a bribery charge in 1989, though he was acquitted in a criminal case.

At the same time, some more conservative Democrats who supported Mr. Hoyer have been stepping up their campaign for Representative Jane Harman of California, who is the senior Democrat on the panel but has clashed with Ms. Pelosi.

Crowning Majority Leader, Democrats Are All Smiles And Bile (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, November 17, 2006

At 10:30 yesterday morning, Nancy Pelosi was chosen by acclamation to become speaker of the House. Ninety minutes later, she experienced her first smackdown.

Pelosi had only herself to blame for this briefest of honeymoons. Just five days after the Democrats' election victory, she shattered party unity Sunday by urging House Democrats to reject her longtime deputy, Rep. Steny Hoyer (D-Md.), in favor of antiwar firebrand Rep. Jack Murtha (D-Abscam), who proceeded to brand House ethics reforms "total crap."

Yesterday, rank-and-file Democrats told Pelosi her endorsement was total crap: They overwhelmingly chose Hoyer to be majority leader.

"We've had our debates. We've had our disagreements in that room," Pelosi acknowledged as she left the Cannon caucus room to face more than 200 reporters and cameras. "And now," she added hopefully, "that is over. . . . Let there be peace on Earth, and let it begin with us. Let the healing begin."

But over Pelosi's shoulder stood the hulking Murtha, hands in pockets, his face in a perma-frown. He offered perfunctory applause for his colleagues. When they joined hands overhead in the unity photo op, he turned and lumbered away.

One of his chief supporters, James Moran (Va.), stayed behind to give voice to Murtha's frustrations. "There are a number of members who can't be trusted," Moran said of Murtha's 149 to 86 defeat, minutes after a Murtha aide claimed he had the votes to win. Moran threatened that Murtha foes "will be damaged by this."

But how, if it was a secret ballot? "Oh, we have a pretty good idea," Moran said.

Nearby, Hoyer supporter Maxine Waters (Calif.) was holding forth on the impact of Pelosi's letter Sunday endorsing Murtha. "People just said 'I wonder why' and kept on moving and voted for Mr. Hoyer." It's true: Hoyer wound up with about as many votes as he forecast before Pelosi's endorsement of Murtha.

Walking through the tunnel back to the Capitol, Hoyer savored the lopsided vote that made him majority leader. "We were pretty close to being on the nose," the majority leader said, already shifting to the first-person plural.

For Pelosi, who led Democrats back to a majority in the House after 12 years, yesterday should have been a coronation for the first woman to be speaker. Instead, her party had plunged into fratricide, and cable news was running nonstop clips of Murtha talking with FBI agents posing as sheiks in the Abscam sting.

Was this a great moment for Democrats, or "total crap"? "The latter," Pelosi spokeswoman Jennifer Crider had to admit as she surveyed the melee outside the caucus room.

Before the vote, dueling staffers, wearing buttons proclaiming "Majority Leader Steny Hoyer" or "Jack," kept tabs on attendance. Capitol police struggled to keep a path clear through the media throng. Aides came out to calibrate expectations.

"We've got the votes, and we are going to win it," announced Andrew Koneschusky, a press guy Murtha borrowed for the occasion. Protesting that some outlets had reported that Murtha had conceded, he said, "Any reports of concession are false." Would he say the reports are total you-know-what?

"These rumors are total crap," Koneschusky affirmed.

Outside, a tornado watch was in effect, and reporters were plotting ways to work the cheap metaphor into their stories. Pelosi aides, seeking to reduce the vortex, decided to put out more flags. There were already seven outside the caucus room, but staffers brought in two more and arranged a star-spangled gantlet for the leaders.

Pelosi and Hoyer emerged together and clasped hands in an exaggerated show of camaraderie. Behind them, Murtha wore a miserable expression, even when Pelosi hailed his "magnificent contribution." She continued: "I was proud to support him for majority leader, because I thought that would be the best way to bring an end to the war in Iraq." Now it was Hoyer's turn for discomfort; he listened slightly agape.

The gracious Hoyer spoke fondly of Pelosi and the "good team" they make; they indulged in another showy handshake, albeit with minimal eye contact. Murtha, granted a turn at the microphone, offered a pithy postmortem: "I didn't have enough votes." Frowning, he returned to his place in the back and stuffed his hands back in his pockets.

DOJ_NMG_0095650

The awkwardness continued. Pelosi described Rahm Emanuel (Ill.), the incoming caucus chairman, as "coldblooded." Emanuel promised the "strongest ethical package," prompting Murtha to stare at his shoes. At another point, Pelosi appeared to undermine her rank and file, noting that she had promised to "do everything possible" to end the Iraq war. "The caucus thought differently," she added.

The first questioner, Fox News's Major Garrett, took the opportunity to remind Pelosi that "nearly 60 percent of House Democrats defied your call to vote for John Murtha" and asked: "In retrospect, what does that say about the wisdom of that endorsement and your clout within the Democratic Party?"

Actually, Garrett understated the rejection -- 63 percent of Democrats defied her. "I stand very, very proudly behind my endorsement of Mr. Murtha," she maintained, even if the caucus "thought otherwise."

"Any regrets?" Garrett pressed. "No," Pelosi answered. "I'm not a person that has regrets."

Hoyer's Selection To Lead Majority Will Test Pelosi (WSJ)

By David Rogers And Sarah Lueck

The Wall Street Journal, November 17, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Maryland Rep. Steny Hoyer emerged as the new House Majority Leader but not before a Democratic fight that showed the political dangers of Rep. Nancy Pelosi's risk-taking leadership style as the incoming speaker.

Defying the odds, the California Democrat interceded personally on behalf of Pennsylvania Rep. John Murtha, Mr. Hoyer's challenger, who had helped galvanize public support for his party in the midterm elections by speaking out against the Iraq war.

Mr. Hoyer was always the safer choice for the caucus as the current No. 2 in the Democratic leadership. But the size of his 149-86 victory yesterday is a blow to Mrs. Pelosi, who must redouble her efforts to prepare the party to take over House control in January.

As speaker, Mrs. Pelosi will have enormous influence over the assignment of members to committees, what amendments are permitted and the timing of when bills are called to the floor. But as majority leader, Mr. Hoyer will be the party's public face and floor manager, and the two leaders must overcome their personal differences to succeed with the Democratic agenda after 12 years of Republican control. "We've got to put things together," said Michigan Rep. John Dingell, the House's senior Democrat.

"I think the caucus is fractured because of this majority-leader race and her involvement in the race," said Rep. Allen Boyd (D., Fla.), a Hoyer supporter. "And I believe her biggest challenge from this moment on is to figure out how to wrap her arms around all of the caucus, bring them in, make sure they feel included."

Mrs. Pelosi expressed no regrets for taking such an active role on behalf of Mr. Murtha. After Hoyer supporters had spent days questioning Mr. Murtha's ethics, she said pointedly that the "biggest ethical challenge facing our country is the war in Iraq ...It must be stopped. And I thought that Mr. Murtha's elevation to a leadership position would serve that purpose."

The episode reflects the risk-taking approach of a politician who isn't only the first woman to rise so high in the House, but who joined the leadership only five years ago. By siding with Mr. Murtha, who is a veteran backroom deal maker but also outside the leadership, Mrs. Pelosi went against the natural inertia of her caucus.

"Incumbents don't like challengers to incumbents...Steny was the incumbent," said Rep. Barney Frank (D., Mass.).

Yesterday's caucus vote followed a pattern this week in Congress as both parties embraced familiar faces after an election in which voters called for change. In the Senate, Sen. Trent Lott (R., Miss.) returned to the No. 2 spot in the Republican leadership. Even after losing control, House Republicans are expected to re-elect Rep. John Boehner (R., Ohio) as their leader this morning.

"In January at her swearing in, what happened today will be a distant memory," predicted Rep. Ed Markey (D. Mass.). "Look up the word 'resilient' in the dictionary and her picture is next to it."

But Mrs. Pelosi is dogged by criticism that she is too sensitive to dissent, and at one level, the Murtha candidacy was seen as a power play to oust an old rival, Mr. Hoyer, and replace him with a strong ally and friend. Hoyer allies complained that Mrs. Pelosi was pressing freshmen to side with Mr. Murtha if they wanted to get good committee assignments.

DOJ_NMG_0095651

Since the ballots were secret, Mr. Frank, a Pelosi ally who backed Mr. Hoyer, dismissed such suggestions as more a "videogame" than anything real. But he said Mrs. Pelosi's involvement was clearly "an exception" and an error for her as a leader. "The general sense is, how did someone as smart as she make this one mistake?" he said.

Mr. Hoyer was gracious in victory. He and Mrs. Pelosi embraced after the meeting, and she later attended his victory party. "The Republicans need to know, the president needs to know, our caucus is unified today," Mr. Hoyer said.

He signaled his commitment to pressing hard for a change in the Bush administration's war strategy in Iraq, an issue where Mr. Murtha, a Vietnam veteran with close ties to the Pentagon, and Mrs. Pelosi have been more aggressive than he in pressing for troop withdrawals. Even in defeat, Mr. Murtha will have a powerful post as chairman of the House defense-appropriations panel that oversees war spending.

"Everybody in this leadership is a pro," said Rep. George Miller (D., Calif.), who was part of a cadre of Pelosi lieutenants who sought to help Mr. Murtha.

Murtha Loses Bid For Majority Leader (USAT)

By Andrea Stone And Bill Nichols

USA Today, November 17, 2006

WASHINGTON — The next speaker of the House lost her first test Thursday even before she takes office.

The decision by House Democrats to choose Maryland Rep. Steny Hoyer to be majority leader over Pennsylvania Rep. John Murtha, despite Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi's decision to back Murtha, dampened what until now had been a jubilant time for their party.

Hoyer's victory, in a 149-86 secret vote, came moments after Pelosi was unanimously backed by her caucus to become the first female House speaker. The full House will formally vote on Pelosi in January.

“We've had our differences; … and now that is over,” said Pelosi, of California, after Hoyer's election. “As we say in church, let there be peace on Earth and let it begin with us. Let the healing begin.”

In their first news conference together, the new Democratic leaders vowed, as Pelosi said, to work together “in a very unified way.” But their body language was telling. Pelosi smiled awkwardly as Hoyer threw his arm around her shoulder while Murtha scowled behind them.

Many, though not all, observers viewed the defeat of Pelosi's handpicked candidate as a blow to her credibility.

“She's a very smart woman who made an error in judgment,” said Rep. Barney Frank, D-Mass., a Hoyer supporter.

“This puts her on notice that she is not solely in charge, that there are different factions within her caucus that are willing to be independent of her,” said Mike Franc, a congressional expert at the Heritage Foundation, a Washington think tank.

University of South Florida political scientist Susan MacManus said Pelosi's support of Murtha, a leading critic of the Iraq war, demonstrated her loyalty to allies and was designed “to show she is responsive to the loud message that was sent on Iraq. She can't just ignore those people and be effective as a leader.”

Hoyer, 67, is a 25-year House veteran who had lined up support from most of the incoming committee chairmen as well as a majority of new members. One freshman, Nancy Boyda of Kansas, said she supported Hoyer out of “loyalty” after he stumped for her campaign.

Hoyer had been favored to win the leadership slot until Pelosi openly voiced her support for Murtha on Sunday, prompting days of intraparty tension. Pelosi and Hoyer ran against each other in 2001 in a battle to be House minority whip that Pelosi won. Despite reports of tension since then, Hoyer said Thursday the two have “worked hand in glove” to keep Democrats unified.

“My pledge to my caucus and my pledge to the country is that I will work as hard as I can,” Hoyer said.

Murtha, 74, was one of the first members of Congress to call for U.S. troops to begin leaving Iraq — a policy change that resonated with voters during the recent midterm elections. Pelosi said she supported Murtha “because I thought that would be the best way to bring an end to the war in Iraq.”

Yet Murtha's decision to run also revived questions about his ties to the 1980 Abscam bribery sting at a time of voter disgust over a recent spate of congressional scandals.

DOJ_NMG_0095652

In Abscam, FBI agents pretending to represent an Arab sheik offered bribes to several lawmakers. When offered $50,000, Murtha was recorded as saying, "I'm not interested … at this point." A grand jury declined to indict Murtha, and the House ethics committee issued no findings against him.

Murtha, who will chair the powerful panel that oversees defense spending, said of his defeat, "I didn't have enough votes so I'll go back to my small subcommittee."

Hoyer is not free of ethics questions, either. The watchdog group Taxpayers for Common Sense has questioned his use of "earmarks" — language in a bill that directs funds or tax benefits to a business, project or institution — for contractors that have contributed to his political action committee.

In Rebuff To Pelosi, Democrats Elect Hoyer As Majority Leader (CQ)

By Susan Ferrechio

Congressional Quarterly, November 17, 2006

In a stunning push back against incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., House Democrats on Thursday elected Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland as majority leader for the 110th Congress.

By a vote of 149-86, Hoyer defeated John P. Murtha of Pennsylvania, whom Pelosi had endorsed Nov. 12 and lobbied for vigorously.

That leaves Pelosi locked in an uneasy partnership with her leading rival, a man she considers disloyal. Hoyer, a 25-year House veteran, has served as minority whip for the past four years, and Pelosi has resented his occasional departures from the party line she was attempting to lay down.

The unexpectedly bruising contest could leave deep scars. It fractured the caucus just as Democrats prepare to take control of the House for the first time in a dozen years. Many members were unhappy at being strong-armed by Pelosi and her lieutenants, and she may find it harder to go to them for favors in the future.

Some Democrats sought to play down that possibility.

"This is not going to be a problem. We're going to pick a majority leader, and then it's going to melt away," said Barney Frank, D-Mass.

Murtha had startled his colleagues in June when he first announced he would seek the No. 2 leadership post if Democrats managed to capture control of the House Nov. 7. Pelosi did not endorse him at the time, but on Nov. 12 she publicly threw her support behind Murtha.

She and her supporters spent all week ferociously lobbying other Democrats to back the 74-year-old decorated Marine Corps veteran who transformed the political debate over Iraq last year when he called for a speedy withdrawal of U.S. troops.

But Hoyer had worked for months to solidify his support within the caucus. He also had campaigned tirelessly for Democratic candidates, contributing more than $1 million through his political action committee during the 2006 election cycle, according to CQ's Political MoneyLine. That was substantially more than Murtha distributed.

Both Murtha and Hoyer voted for the 2002 resolution authorizing President Bush to go to war in Iraq, while Pelosi voted against it. But Murtha's call for a troop withdrawal carried special weight because of his reputation as a defense hawk. He has served as his party's top-ranking member on the Defense Appropriations Subcommittee and will become its chairman in the 110th Congress.

Pelosi delivered the first nominating speech for Murtha, followed by Kendrick B. Meeks of Florida and Dennis J. Kucinich of Ohio.

Henry A. Waxman of California spoke for Hoyer, along with fellow Democrats Lucille Roybal-Allard of California, Elijah E. Cummings of Maryland and Rep.-elect Brad Ellsworth of Indiana . Other Leaders

Before Democrats voted on the hotly contested majority leader's race, they unanimously nominated Pelosi to serve as Speaker in the new Congress. Her selection will not become official until the full House votes Jan. 4, the opening day of the 110th Congress. With Democrats in firm control of the chamber, that vote is a formality.

The caucus also unanimously elected James E. Clyburn of South Carolina as majority whip and Rahm Emanuel of Illinois as chairman of the Democratic Caucus. John B. Larson of Connecticut was re-elected as caucus vice chairman.

Clyburn, currently chairman of the Democratic Caucus, has served as Pelosi's bridge to several party factions, among them evangelical Christians and the Congressional Black Caucus, which he once led. He will be the second African American to serve as Democratic whip, after William H. Gray III of Pennsylvania, who left Congress in 1991.

Emanuel, who succeeds Clyburn as caucus chairman, initially considered opposing him for the whip's job. But he pulled back after Pelosi promised to enlarge his role as caucus chairman. As chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee during the 2006 election cycle, Emanuel was given much of the credit for the party's House takeover.

Hoyer Elected Majority Leader (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, November 17, 2006

House Democrats yesterday overwhelmingly rejected Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi's choice for majority leader.

Rep. John P. Murtha, Pennsylvania Democrat and Pelosi ally, lost a lopsided 149-86 vote to Rep. Steny H. Hoyer, the Maryland Democrat who has been a longtime political rival of Mrs. Pelosi's.

Mrs. Pelosi, who campaigned openly and aggressively for Mr. Murtha, tried patching up differences immediately after the secret vote held behind closed doors.

"We've had our differences in our party," she said, with a grinning Mr. Hoyer beside her and a glum-looking Mr. Murtha behind her. "We have come together."

But before turning the microphone over to Mr. Hoyer, Mrs. Pelosi once again talked about why she strongly backed Mr. Murtha for the No. 2 post.

"I thank him for his courage in stepping forward one year ago to speak truth to power, to change the debate in this country in a way that I think gave us this majority in this November," she said in reference to Mr. Murtha's early calls for withdrawing the troops from Iraq.

"I was proud to support him for majority leader because I thought that would be the best way to bring an end to the war in Iraq," she said. "I know that he will continue to take the lead on that issue for our caucus, for this Congress, for our country."

Mr. Hoyer, who never went negative in the leadership race even as Mr. Murtha publicly accused him of supporting President Bush's war policy, was gracious in victory, saluting Mrs. Pelosi for being elected the first female House speaker in U.S. history.

"She is not the first speaker because she's a woman," he said. "She is the first woman speaker because she is a person of deep values, keen intellect and extraordinary political ability."

Despite the show of unity before the cameras, yesterday's vote showed that nearly two-thirds of the new Democratic majority in the House was willing to defy Mrs. Pelosi's demand that they vote for Mr. Murtha.

Since gaining 29 seats in the Nov. 7 election, House Democrats have privately expressed deep concern over Mr. Murtha and say Mrs. Pelosi blundered by backing him so forcefully.

Some Democrats said that an ally like Mr. Murtha in the No. 2 spot would give Mrs. Pelosi unchecked power.

But most Democrats said they opposed Mr. Murtha because they had run campaigns on a promise to clean up corruption in Washington, and Mr. Murtha is one of the most scandal-tainted members of Congress. He was implicated a quarter-century ago in the so-called Abscam bribery scandal.

Some wondered why Mrs. Pelosi stuck her neck out so far so early on Mr. Murtha's behalf.

But Rep. James P. Moran, Virginia Democrat, said that in the aftermath, "No one would question her loyalty."

Others speculated that Mrs. Pelosi urged Mr. Murtha to run for Mr. Hoyer's No. 2 position in order to focus attention on a Hoyer-Murtha showdown -- thus preventing a possible challenge by Mr. Hoyer against Mrs. Pelosi for the speaker's job.

Mr. Murtha said yesterday he would return to the "small subcommittee that I have on Appropriations," a joking reference to the powerful Defense Appropriations subcommittee.

Mr. Murtha himself may not have been entirely surprised by the loss of his bid for a leadership spot. A video recording that showed him negotiating for 54 minutes with undercover FBI agents more than two decades ago included Mr. Murtha's explanation of why one of his fellow congressmen was accepting a $50,000 bribe but Mr. Murtha was declining it.

DOJ_NMG_0095654

"He doesn't expect to be in leadership," Mr. Murtha told the disguised FBI agents. "I have to be more careful. That's what it amounts to. I expect to be in the ... leadership of the House, and you have anything said against you, then you've got a problem."

Democrats Split Over Pelosi's Deputy Pick (FT)

By Holly Yeager

Financial Times, November 17, 2006

Nancy Pelosi, incoming speaker of the House, suffered an early defeat on Thursday when Democrats rejected her candidate for the number two job in the party leadership.

The unexpectedly bruising battle just days after Democrats took control of the House raised questions about party unity and Mrs Pelosi's commitment to ethics re-form and dampened celebrations of their new majority.

After a three-hour closed-door meeting, Democrats voted 149-to-86 to name Steny Hoyer, a long-time rival of Mrs Pelosi, to be majority leader when the new Congress convenes in January. He defeated John Murtha, the outspoken critic of the war in Iraq, whom she had backed in the race.

Throughout the mid-term election campaign, Mrs Pelosi pledged that the first act of a Democratic-controlled Congress would be a tough package of rules and ethics reform, following a series of mostly Republican scandals. But she raised eyebrows this week with her endorsement of Mr Murtha, who has been called "ethically challenged" by government watchdogs.

Mr Murtha has faced allegations that he abused his position as a member of the defence appropriations sub-committee by favouring a lobbying company of a former long-term staffer and clients of Robert "Kit" Murtha, his brother.

He has also been criticised for taking advantage of earmarking, the practice of appropriating funds for specific government projects that benefit individual lawmakers' constituents. Mr Murtha was also named as a co-conspirator in the 1980 Abscam bribery probe but not indicted in the case.

But Mr Murtha and Mrs Pelosi have long been allies in the Capitol and veteran lawmakers said her support for him was a sign of her loyalty. Others saw a vote for him as a way to thank him for his leadership on the war, a stance that played a large part in their victory.

The result will force Mrs Pelosi and Mr Hoyer, her current deputy, to continue to work together. Both natives of Maryland, they have known each other for 40 years and have sparred frequently.

Republicans in the House are set to choose their new leadership team today. Dennis Hastert, the outgoing speaker, will not be a candidate for a top party post.

John Boehner, who became Republican majority leader after Tom DeLay resigned his leadership job amid allegations of campaign finance violations, is the front- running candidate to be minority leader.

Political Pragmatism Carried Hoyer To The Top (WP)

By Shailagh Murray

The Washington Post, November 17, 2006

Steny H. Hoyer is a practical moderate and Nancy Pelosi is a liberal idealist, and for more than 40 years they have competed like siblings, all the way to the pinnacle of politics.

Hoyer's rout yesterday of Rep. John P. Murtha (Pa.), Pelosi's handpicked candidate for majority leader, validated the methodical, no-frills approach that the congressman from Maryland has taken throughout his long career, from his rapid ascent in state politics to his somewhat bumpier climb through the House.

As a number of Hoyer supporters put it, there was simply no good reason to deny him the job. Even Pelosi had to concede that the result was convincing. "Steny came out a big winner today," she declared after the 149 to 86 vote. "It was a stunning victory for him."

Congenial and diligent, Hoyer scored big points with his colleagues by laboring in the trenches throughout the 2006 campaign season. He raised money, helped recruit candidates and appeared at events across the country. When Congress was in session, he was a fixture on the House floor as the Democratic whip, cajoling colleagues to stick together on tough votes. And when Democrats won a House majority last week, Hoyer received a large share of the credit.

"He's worked hard for a very long time," said Rep. Mike Ross (Ark.).

DOJ_NMG_0095655

"He's very, very effective," said Rep. Jerrold Nadler (N.Y.).

"We've never had a whip operation like this one," said Rep. David E. Price (N.C.). "He's just been a model leader, and people appreciate that."

One of Hoyer's assets is that he has worked successfully alongside Pelosi. "There was a consensus in the caucus that the team is working, and they wanted to keep it, by a very large margin," Hoyer explained. Given the duo's strong record, many House Democrats questioned why Pelosi would turn to Murtha, a veteran Appropriations Committee member who had not shown much interest in House leadership before he emerged as a prominent Democratic war critic a year ago.

By rejecting Hoyer, Pelosi may unwittingly have elevated him, particularly among moderate members who are nervous about her liberal views, particularly on social issues. Now, even before the Democrats take over in January, they can claim to have bucked the boss, by voting against Pelosi's candidate for her second-in-command. That may prove particularly useful for freshman Democrats who won in conservative districts and will presumably have to fend off tough challenges in two short years.

"They campaigned on a theme of independence," said Rep. Allen Boyd Jr. (Fla.). A vote for Hoyer, he said, "will help them to demonstrate it."

Hoyer, 67, was elected to the Maryland Senate 40 years ago, becoming the youngest Senate president in state history during the mid-1970s. In 1981, when Rep. Gladys Noon Spellman (D), who represented Maryland's 5th District, fell into a coma, Hoyer battled through a primary against her husband and then beat a better-financed Republican opponent in the general election. He was called the "boy wonder" of Maryland politics.

The congressman won a coveted seat on the Appropriations Committee and became a champion purveyor of funding for his Prince George's County-based district.

Just this August, Hoyer appeared at a celebration marking the completion of a jetty project in Deale. "This is pork," Hoyer told the crowd. "But there is good pork and bad pork. Good investment and bad investment. This is a good investment."

Known as a business-friendly Democrat, Hoyer is a free-trader and a balanced-budget proponent, with strong ties to lobbyists. He champions many liberal causes and was a leading sponsor of the Americans With Disabilities Act. Hoyer is widely liked around Washington, regarded as funny and considerate.

For years he served as a senior member of the Administration Committee, a little-known favor bank that oversees the day-to-day operations of the House. Hoyer also has good relations with some senior Republicans. When Congress is in session, he has a monthly lunch with GOP Whip Roy Blunt (Mo.), another pragmatic insider.

Why exactly Pelosi sought to oust Hoyer remains something of a mystery, even to the congressman. The two Maryland natives first met in the 1960s, while serving as interns in the office of Sen. Daniel B. Brewster (D-Md.). Pelosi helped Hoyer in his race for majority whip against David E. Bonior (Mich.) in 1991. Ten years later, Bonior gave up his post, and Hoyer's competition was Pelosi.

The race was long and bitter. Hoyer ran as the more moderate and experienced candidate, while Pelosi portrayed herself as forward-thinking and progressive.

Hoyer saw the race as an election for a leadership job, not a blood feud. "I ran for whip, she ran for whip," as he describes it. He calls her support for Murtha a show of loyalty toward an old friend. "Mr. Murtha asked her to do this, and because she's loyal, she did," Hoyer said. "And we've got to move on."

Steny H. Hoyer, A Cultivator Of Loyalties (NYT)

By Kate Zernike

The New York Times, November 17, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 16 — If you placed an order for a congressman, chances are you would get Steny Hoyer. There is the immovable silver hair and the gleaming smile, the assiduous courting of colleagues, supporters and lobbyists, even the requisite life-changing encounter with John F. Kennedy.

In his early political career in Maryland, Mr. Hoyer was known as a machine politician. Here, he is “the members’ member.” It is a label applied by his champions, who admire him as an institutionalist, as well as his detractors, who sneer at him as a pol.

DOJ_NMG_0095656

But both agreed Thursday that this quality allowed him to become majority leader of the new Democratic-led House of Representatives.

The biggest test of Mr. Hoyer's political skills comes now, as he tries to lead a caucus under a new speaker, Nancy Pelosi of California, who has long been his rival in leadership and who strongly supported his opponent for the majority leader's job.

Mr. Hoyer, 67, has been running for some sort of political office since his 20's, when he worked alongside a young Nancy D'Alesandro — later Nancy Pelosi — for a Maryland senator, then entered the State Senate, becoming at 35 the youngest Senate president in Maryland history.

During the past several election cycles, he campaigned early for Democratic challengers, earning loyalty that ultimately paid off in the leadership election. Many freshman lawmakers said they respected the stand his rival, Representative John P. Murtha of Pennsylvania, had taken opposing the Iraq war, but that they had committed to Mr. Hoyer early, as he had to them.

"He was out for me before anyone thought I had a race," said Chris Murphy, a Democrat who won a tough campaign in Connecticut.

Asked about him, Mr. Hoyer's friends return repeatedly to the themes of hard work and a methodical nature.

"He looks the part, he speaks well, he's got good presence, and obviously all of that helps, but in the end, it's about whether people trust your judgment," said Leon Panetta, who became friends with Mr. Hoyer while both served in Congress. "It's not something you earn over a short period of time. He's been around, and he's earned a reputation."

Steny Hamilton Hoyer was born on June 14, 1939, in New York to a family of Danish origin — his name is the diminutive of his father's, Steen.

He once told a reporter that he and his wife, Judith, now deceased, became sweethearts when he asked her to join his slate of class officers in high school.

He became serious about politics at the University of Maryland after hearing Kennedy, a Massachusetts senator then campaigning for president, speak on campus. He went to Georgetown Law School and began working for Senator Daniel B. Brewster, alongside the future Ms. Pelosi, the daughter of a Baltimore congressman and mayor. He graduated from law school in 1966 and won his State Senate seat that same year, at age 27.

He gave up his seat to run for lieutenant governor, and after he lost, he worked as a lawyer while looking for ways to get back into politics. He found his race when Representative Gladys Spellman fell into a coma in 1980. With his ties to local politics, he won in a crowded field of candidates, beating even Ms. Spellman's husband for the nomination.

The race cemented one of his most important friendships, with Tony Coelho, then a California congressman and chairman of the Democrats' campaign efforts in the House. The special election was Mr. Coelho's first race, and one the Reagan White House hoped would go to a Republican. When Mr. Hoyer won, Mr. Coelho helped ensure that he was the only freshman included in the Democratic response to the State of the Union. Mr. Hoyer was given a seat on the Appropriations Committee, a rare plum for a young lawmaker.

By the early 1990s, Mr. Hoyer had become his party's caucus chairman. But when he ran for whip in 1991, he lost. Supporters of his opponent, David E. Bonior, said that Mr. Hoyer was too much an upstart.

Mr. Hoyer's wife died of cancer in 1997, which friends say was extremely difficult for him. He continued to press for a position in the leadership, competing against Ms. Pelosi for whip in 2001. He lost, again. Mr. Hoyer says that he has moved on, but the campaign has left lingering tensions in their relationship.

"I'm not sure Steny knew what to do when that happened," said Benjamin L. Cardin, the Maryland representative recently elected to the Senate, and a close friend who plays hearts with Mr. Hoyer. ("He's extremely competitive," Mr. Cardin says of their games.) "He didn't know whether he had a future in the Congress or not."

Mr. Coelho said that Mr. Hoyer had counted his votes too loosely in that contest. This time, he was more hard-nosed, pressing colleagues for commitments. He went in with 149 promises, Mr. Coelho said, and emerged with that many votes.

"He has been out there working these freshmen for the last three elections," he said. "Some of these people ran twice. He gave them money, he gave them advice. He became a loyal friend to these people. Nancy thought she could put these people away because of pressure. But these people that got elected understand relationships, and they're not going to flip away because of pressure. He has a tremendous capacity for friendship, and when you have that, people don't flake off on you."

DOJ_NMG_0095657

Representative Elijah E. Cummings of Maryland, among those who nominated Mr. Hoyer on Thursday, said he got the most applause when he talked about what Mr. Hoyer had done for freshmen. “They believed he had been there over and over again,” Mr. Cummings said.

Friends say he has been frustrated by his inability to get past the tension with Ms. Pelosi. Associates have tried to reach out and patch the relationship between the two.

On Thursday, even after Ms. Pelosi supported Mr. Murtha, Mr. Hoyer spoke of his three daughters, his granddaughters and a new great-granddaughter, and how proud they would be to have Ms. Pelosi as the first female speaker.

He and Ms. Pelosi smiled and grasped hands, then lifted their arms over their heads triumphantly.

Speaker Pelosi Tempts Disaster (NYT)

The New York Times, November 17, 2006

Nancy Pelosi has managed to severely scar her leadership even before taking up the gavel as the new speaker of the House. First, she played politics with the leadership of the House Intelligence Committee to settle an old score and a new debt. And then she put herself in a lose-lose position by trying to force a badly tarnished ally, Representative John Murtha, on the incoming Democratic Congress as majority leader. The party caucus put a decisive end to that gambit yesterday, giving the No. 2 job to Steny Hoyer, a longtime Pelosi rival.

But Ms. Pelosi’s damage to herself was already done. The well-known shortcomings of Mr. Murtha were broadcast for all to see — from his quid-pro-quo addiction to moneyed lobbyists to the grainy government tape of his involvement in the Abscam scandal a generation ago. The resurrected tape — feasted upon by Pelosi enemies — shows how Mr. Murtha narrowly survived as an unindicted co-conspirator, admittedly tempted but finally rebuffing a bribe offer: “I’m not interested — at this point.”

Mr. Murtha would have been a farcical presence in a leadership promising the cleanest Congress in history. Ms. Pelosi should have been first to realize this, having made such a fiery campaign sword of her vows to end Capitol corruption. Instead, she acted like some old-time precinct boss and lost the first test before her peers.

As incoming speaker, Ms. Pelosi will be dogged by skepticism — from within the party and without — about her political smarts and her ability to deliver a galvanized agenda.

It was a no-brainer for the caucus to end the misguided fight for Mr. Murtha, who belittled the need for reform. Now the pressure is even greater for Speaker-elect Pelosi to recover by leading the House to something actually worth fighting for — starting with credible anticorruption strictures. For this she needs gaffe-wary advisers, among them Mr. Hoyer, who has his own questionable record of flourishing in big-money politics. The new majority — led by a presumably wiser speaker — must realize by now that intramural vendetta is hardly a substitute for productive government.

Remember Who Sent You (WP)

By E. J. Dionne

The Washington Post, November 17, 2006

Democrats might usefully take a break from their inane round of back-stabbing and score-settling to focus, for a few moments, on why voters gave them their congressional majorities. A lot of Americans are hurting in the pocketbook, and if Democrats don't use the next two years to help them, the party will squander the trust it has temporarily earned.

To prepare for next year, the Democrats (and those Republicans who want to revive their party) should read a truly remarkable speech that Janet Yellen, the president and chief executive of the Federal Reserve Bank of San Francisco, gave the day before voters went to the polls.

In plain language backed by sophisticated analysis, Yellen makes clear that voters who feel severe economic pressures are not deluded, despite the economy's strong performance in keeping down unemployment and inflation.

The reason: new forms of inequality that don't fit into our conventional understanding of how the economy works. She argues that "much of the gain from excellent macroeconomic performance has gone to just a small segment of the population -- those already in the upper part of the distribution."

Yellen tells unfashionable truths. She does not claim, as many conservatives and free traders do, that globalization and the decline in union membership are innocent in the inequality saga. "Globalization and skill-biased technological change may have been working in combination to particularly depress the wage gains of those in the middle of the U.S. wage distribution," she says.

Note the word middle. That's where the biggest negative impact of globalization is being felt. At the top, Yellen says, globalization has been helpful to "highly able workers performing non-routine work requiring problem-solving skills." In the middle, "technology and globalization had the opposite effect -- substituting for workers performing routine or repetitive tasks and depressing their wages."

By the time we reached this decade, "many low-wage jobs that could be eliminated by technology had already vanished." That means the remaining jobs "involve manual and service work that cannot easily be automated."

As a result, "wages in the middle not only rose far more slowly than those at the top, they also rose more slowly than those at the bottom of the distribution."

Yes, there is a middle-class squeeze.

People at the bottom of the economy need help, which could come from an increase in the minimum wage, guaranteed health insurance, expanded wage subsidies through the earned-income tax credit and unionization.

But for the left-out middle, which rebelled in large numbers last week, the answers are more complicated, though no less urgent.

Job training and education are always touted as the answer. Yellen is all for them. But they are no cure-all, because Yellen notices something else that many others have ignored: Even the better educated are now being hit by globalization and technological change.

She says that "the distribution of [job] displacement has shifted towards the highly educated: workers holding a college degree saw nearly a 50 percent increase in their displacement rates between the early 1980s recession and the most recent one in 2001."

Americans are also suffering from much larger fluctuations in their incomes than in the past. In the 1970s, she says, "a typical family might have seen its income vary from a high of $60,000 to a low of $30,000 over the decade." In the most recent decade, the same family might see its income drop to as low as $15,000. Is it any wonder so many working Americans are mad?

Yellen draws on the essential policy book of the year, Jacob S. Hacker's "The Great Risk Shift." Again, if Democrats get tired of recrimination over an election they won -- imagine if they had lost! -- they might spend time with Hacker, who shows how more and more risk is being offloaded from government and private corporations onto individuals. He makes a powerful case for remodeling our social insurance systems to provide genuine economic security for all working Americans.

Hacker makes the paradoxical and insightful point that "we are most capable of fully participating in our economy and our society, most capable of taking risks and looking toward our future, when we have a basic foundation of financial security." It's common sense: Secure people are more likely to be risk-takers.

The task of creating an economy that is more just and more dynamic will not be completed within the life of the new Congress. It will take a decade of reform, experimentation and innovation. Now that House Democrats have settled on a majority leader, you can only hope they move away from self-involvement and start thinking about the people who sent them to Washington.

Federal Diary: New Subcommittees To Focus On Workforce Management (WP)

By Stephen Barr

Washington Post, November 17, 2006

In an effort to take a more strategic approach to federal workforce management, an interagency group has reorganized with an eye to how best to help Uncle Sam recruit and train a new generation of public servants.

The group, the Chief Human Capital Officers Council, was created in 2002 to advise agencies on how to improve federal personnel systems. Yesterday, Linda M. Springer, director of the Office of Personnel Management and the council's chair, announced the creation of six council subcommittees, replacing five panels, and their priorities for the next year.

Projections show that 40 percent of the federal workforce will retire by 2015, casting agencies into a war for talent with corporations, consulting firms and other employers. If the government falters in recruiting engineers, scientists, linguists and other specialized skills, the Government Accountability Office has warned, agencies might not be able to effectively deliver services to the public.

Some of the subcommittees will study workforce planning for the retirement wave, look at how to ramp up training for a possible "knowledge drain," and study how performance-based pay can help the government compete for critical skills.

The subcommittees also will work with agencies on improving marketing strategies and examining whether OPM-sponsored job fairs, which seek to find applicants for hard-to-fill jobs, are worthwhile efforts.

One of the subcommittees focuses on emergency preparedness and in its previous incarnation, helped lay plans for how the government will manage its workforce during a pandemic flu outbreak. The panel, for example, has urged agencies to adopt a Navy system designed to track the whereabouts of employees during emergencies.

Springer also has asked the subcommittee chairmen to work with Sen. Daniel K. Akaka (D-Hawaii) and Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif.), who will oversee federal workforce issues in the next Congress, on legislation that supports the goals of the interagency group, an OPM official said.

The subcommittees are Emergency Preparedness, chaired by David S.C. Chu of the Defense Department; Hiring and Succession Planning, also chaired by Chu; Human Capital Workforce, led by Jeff T. H. Pon of the Energy Department; Human Resources Line of Business, led by Gail T. Lovelace of the General Services Administration; Learning and Development, chaired by Keith A. Nelson of the Housing and Urban Development Department; and Performance Management, chaired by Ronald P. Sanders from the Office of the Director of National Intelligence.Elsewhere . . .

Federal employee groups yesterday welcomed the election of Rep. Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.) as the next House majority leader. Hoyer has championed federal pay raises and benefits for more than two decades. "We have never before had such a good friend so high in the congressional leadership," said Margaret Baptiste, president of the National Active and Retired Federal Employees Association.

Colleen M. Kelley, president of the National Treasury Employees Union, said the union will file a grievance against the Energy Department for delaying employee bonuses and promotions until Congress resolves a fiscal 2007 budget shortfall. She called the decision to delay bonuses "an example of management incompetence."

Office of Management and Budget controller Linda Combs announced yesterday that 18 of 24 federal agencies have received clean financial audits, the same as last year. Agencies that fell short on their fiscal 2006 financial statements included the departments of Defense, Energy and Homeland Security.Talk Shows

Art Gordon, president of the Federal Law Enforcement Officers Association, and Jon Adler, the association's executive vice president, will be the guests on "FEDtalk" at 11 a.m. today on federalnewsradio.com and WFED radio (1050 AM).

Ellen P. Embrey, Defense Department deputy assistant secretary for force health protection and readiness, will be the guest on "The IBM Business of Government Hour" at 9 a.m. Saturday on WJFK radio (106.7 FM).

Don't Snub Harman (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, November 17, 2006

NEWLY MINTED House Speaker Nancy Pelosi is off to a rocky start. On the same day she was formally elected to lead the new Democratic majority, party colleagues refused to endorse her bizarre choice of Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.), who was investigated but not charged in the Abscam scandal more than two decades ago, as her second-in-command.

That embarrassing experience should induce Pelosi (D-San Francisco) — who appeared chastened before reporters Thursday — to reconsider another ill-advised promotion: Her apparent intention to bestow the chairmanship of the House Intelligence Committee not on the panel's ranking Democrat, Rep. Jane Harman (D-Venice), but on Rep. Alcee L. Hastings (D-Fla.).

Hastings, like Murtha, seems an unlikely choice for a leadership role in what Pelosi has been advertising as "the most honest, the most open and the most ethical Congress in history." Hastings was impeached as a federal judge and removed from office in the late 1980s (although he was acquitted of bribery in a criminal trial in 1983).

A litany of explanations have been adduced to explain why Pelosi would bypass Harman, an expert on intelligence matters who has won the respect of both parties while criticizing some of the Bush administration's excesses in the war on terror. None of them is persuasive. Harman has earned this chairmanship.

The argument most often cited for bypassing Harman is that under House rules, her rotating membership on the Intelligence Committee is about to expire. But Harman's supporters note that since 2003, term limits on the committee (which in any case can be waived) don't apply to the chairman and ranking member. They also point out that the independent 9/11 commission called in its recommendations for longer tenures on congressional intelligence panels as a way of fostering continuity and institutional memory.

Then there is the claim that awarding the chairmanship to Harman rather than Hastings would offend the sacred principle of seniority, as well as the sensibilities of the Congressional Black Caucus (Hastings is African American).

Seniority has never been the only criterion for the awarding of committee chairmanships in either party. As for black representation in the leadership, two other African Americans, Reps. Charles B. Rangel (D-N.Y.) and John Conyers Jr. (D-Mich.) are slated to head the Ways and Means and Judiciary committees, respectively.

The most substantial — and alarming — speculation regarding the Harman-Pelosi rift is that the speaker may consider Harman too moderate. If one of the reasons Pelosi backed Murtha was because he took it to Republicans on the war in Iraq, Harman — who initially supported the war — may be insufficiently partisan in Pelosi's eyes.

Pelosi, who has vowed to lead the House from the center, should think twice before indulging in a witch hunt of colleagues who can work well with Republicans.

And it isn't as if Harman is an administration lackey. She has called for the National Security Agency's warrantless eavesdropping program to be subject to the safeguards contained in the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, and she voted against a bill to legalize the program without such safeguards. She also opposed legislation to create military commissions to try suspected foreign terrorists that did not afford detainees access to the writ of habeas corpus.

Especially at this juncture, the Intelligence Committee deserves a chairman who is respected by Democrats and Republicans in Congress and by the White House, and who is free of distracting questions about past personal conduct. Harman fits that description far more than Hastings.

Bush Nominee Gates To Court Lawmakers (AP)

By Anne Plummer Flaherty

AP, November 16, 2006

Robert Gates is making his first round of visits on Capitol Hill since being named by President Bush to replace Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld.

The one-on-one meetings Friday with lawmakers are in anticipation of Gates' confirmation hearing next month. The Senate Armed Services Committee plans to hold the hearing the week of Dec. 4.

The war in Iraq is expected to be a dominant issue for lawmakers in their discussions with Gates. One day after the Nov. 7 elections, Bush said he acknowledged the lack of progress in Iraq cost Republicans votes and handed majority control to Democrats. In a bid to salvage U.S. support, Bush said he would consider a change in course and asked Rumsfeld to step down.

Gates planned to meet with Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn.; Majority Whip Mitch McConnell, R-Ky.; Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid, D-Nev.; Sen. John Warner, R-Va., chairman of the Armed Services Committee; and Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz.

Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., in line to takeover Warner's position as chairman next year, is expected to meet with Gates on Monday.

Members of Congress often meet privately with high-profile nominees before confirmation hearings so they can speak more candidly and get a sense of where the nominee stands on critical issues.

Gates's Opportunity At Defense (WP)

By Gregory F. Treverton

WashingtonPost.com, November 17, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0095661

Robert Gates, nominated by President Bush to succeed Donald Rumsfeld as secretary of defense, will not have much time in office but he will have opportunity.

Gates comes to the job without much baggage, either of ideology or policy. He didn't campaign for the job -- indeed, he turned down the position of director of national intelligence when it was offered -- so he has some independence. And he comes to office when desperation might make for a serious debate about policy toward Iraq.

Gates was the committed Cold Warrior who also helped manage the end of the Cold War (disclosure: We have been colleagues and friends since working together on the Carter White House staff). His approach to the world is more the practical realpolitik of the first President Bush than the neo-conservatism that has held sway under the current president.

In a 26-year career as an intelligence professional, Gates spent almost nine years on the National Security Council, serving four presidents of both major political parties. He has not managed anything on the scale of the Pentagon, but then neither has anyone else.

As deputy CIA director for intelligence, Gates engineered what still is sometimes called the "Gatesian revolution,"drawing on his White House experience to induce intelligence analysts to be more aggressive in marketing their wares to policy officials. This earned him criticism, unfair in my view, for "politicizing" intelligence. As deputy and as director of central intelligence, he was the professional's professional, strategic in view and careful in detail.

Iraq will surely define Gates's tenure. There, the tempting analogy is to Clark Clifford's role as secretary of defense in persuading another Texan, Lyndon Johnson, that winding down the war in Vietnam was not a breach of Texas honor. Clifford described his task as that of the Scarlet Pimpernel, organizing a quiet conspiracy in the national interest.

This time around, the choices are at least as unappealing as they were during the war in Vietnam, but Gates will not lack for co-conspirators. James Baker and the Iraq Study Group provide one kind of cover for a change in policy. And while many prominent Democrats have argued for a timetable for Americas withdrawal, they will not want to look soft on national security.

In these circumstances, there ought to be room for a package -- a timetable but perhaps one with some flexibility -- and perhaps one more push for more stability, including even some short-term increase in U.S. forces.

Beyond Iraq, Gates's time will be short. Rumsfeld should be remembered, but will not be, for aiming at a real transformation of U.S. military capability, against the opposition of almost all of the Pentagon (and much of Capitol Hill to boot). His vision -- a smaller, quicker and more lethal military -- produced quick victory in the conventional phase of the Iraq war but left the United States with too few troops poorly suited to the task of occupation, let alone nation-building.

GatesÂ¿ opportunity will be to redirect the transformation, not for major conventional conflicts but for the shadow wars America is likely to face. He could build on the words of recent Pentagon statements to strengthen AmericaÂ¿s counterinsurgency forces, its special operators, its advisors and policing capacity. All those capacities that have been in short supply in Iraq. A first test will come as the Army brass argues for a larger Army.

With a civilian, Gates, running the Pentagon and a military man, Gen. Michael Hayden, running the CIA, there ought to be an opportunity to bring together the parallel universes of civilian and defense intelligence.

As the capabilities of "national" intelligence collection systems, like the National Security Agency, have improved they have become increasingly important to warfighters for tactical purposes, and thus the distinction between "strategic"and "tactical" intelligence has blurred. Consequently, intelligence agencies and the Pentagon share assets and compete over whose needs are more important.

The competition risks duplication, as the military seeks intelligence systems it can count on that are integral to operational units. Here, too, Gates will not have much time, but he will have the opportunity to lay the cornerstone for the major element of reshaping American intelligence.

Senators Urged To Add Teeth To FDA Bill (AP-Y)

By Andrew Bridges, Associated Press Writer

DOJ_NMG_0095662

AP, November 17, 2006

A bipartisan bill represents the best shot in years to improve the safety of drugs the Food and Drug Administration regulates, but needs bolstering to heal the ailing regulatory agency, witnesses told lawmakers Thursday.

The bill, introduced in August by Sens. Mike Enzi, R-Wyo., and Ted Kennedy, D-Mass., comes on the heels of a string of high-profile drug recalls and safety warnings. Among them was the 2004 withdrawal of the popular painkiller Vioxx after long-term use was linked to an increased risk of heart attack and stroke.

"Millions of Americans rely on the drugs that FDA approves. They take them for sickness. And now the FDA urgently needs treatment," Kennedy said.

Two panels of witnesses, including representatives from industry, consumer and patient groups, praised the bill's timeliness, saying it would improve safety — and the public's confidence.

"The initiative now before you represents the best opportunity in many years to fix these chronic problems," said Dr. Steve Nissen, a Cleveland Clinic cardiologist who served on an FDA advisory panel that in 2001 recommended new warnings on Vioxx.

Some of the bill's provisions, including a temporary ban on consumer advertising of newly approved drugs, echo proposals made in a September report on drug safety commissioned by the FDA. The report found that the FDA cannot track the safety of new drugs, nor respond quickly to problems, for want of money, people and power.

"If there ever was a time that it was critical to address these issues, it is now," said Sheila Burke, chairwoman of the Institute of Medicine panel that produced the report.

Jim Guest, president and chief executive of Consumers Union, called the bill "a good first step," but said its provisions, including the power to assess civil penalties, should be strengthened. Nissen, too, said there was a need for further legislative action, including increased taxpayer funding of an agency that relies heavily on user fees paid by industry.

The Kennedy-Enzi bill calls for increasing those industry fees. Because of that, many FDA watchers believe next year the bill will be folded into legislation to reauthorize the fees.

Dr. Adrian Thomas, of Johnson & Johnson, said increased public funding of the FDA would address the perception that the agency is overly reliant on industry fees in a way that compromises its integrity.

The bill would require pharmaceutical companies to devise safety plans for new drugs. It calls for more disclosure of the results of drug trials in human subjects. It also would give the FDA the authority to require companies to carry out safety studies of drugs once they are on the market.

Senate Weighs Bill To Improve Drug Safety (USAT)

USA Today, November 17, 2006

Representatives from the pharmaceutical industry and consumer and patient groups agreed Thursday that a bipartisan bill working its way through the Senate would improve drug safety and public confidence. The bill by Sens. Mike Enzi, R-Wyo., and Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., would temporarily ban consumer advertising of newly approved drugs, require more disclosure of drug trials in humans and give the Food and Drug Administration (FDA) the authority to require companies to conduct safety studies once drugs are on the market.

Cleveland cardiologist Steven Nissen told the Senate Committee on Health, Education, Labor and Pensions that the bill “represents the best opportunity in many years” to fix chronic problems in the way drugs are approved and marketed. Jim Guest of Consumers Union called the bill “a good first step,” but said it needs to be stronger. Witnesses also called for a boost to the FDA budget.

Meanwhile, the breast cancer drug Herceptin, made by Genentech, received expanded FDA approval to include treatment of women with early-stage cancer who have undergone surgery. Herceptin has been on the market since 1998.

Senate OKs sending nuclear fuel to India

DOJ_NMG_0095663

The Senate overwhelmingly endorsed a plan allowing the United States to ship civilian nuclear fuel and technology to India, handing President Bush a victory on one of his top foreign policy initiatives. Senior lawmakers from both political parties championed the proposal, which reverses decades of U.S. anti-proliferation policy, saying it strengthens a key relationship with a friendly Asian power that has long maintained what the United States considers a responsible nuclear program. The vote was 85-12. Sen. Richard Lugar, R-Ind., called the plan "a lasting incentive" for India to shun future nuclear weapons tests. Sen. Joseph Biden, D-Del., said the endorsement pushes America "a giant step closer" to a "major shift in U.S.-Indian relations."

Panel: China not responsible global player

A congressional advisory panel questioned China's willingness to be a more responsible international player and said the world's most populous nation must abandon a single-minded pursuit of its "own narrow national interests." Among the 44 recommendations the U.S.-China Economic and Security Review Commission made to Congress are "a more effective program" for gathering information about China's military buildup and the need to combat Chinese attempts to isolate Taiwan by supporting the island's membership in world bodies.

"While China is a global actor, its sense of responsibility has not kept up with its expanding power," said Larry Wortzel, chairman of the commission that Congress created in 2000 to investigate U.S.-China issues.

In Beijing, Chinese Foreign Ministry spokeswoman Jiang Yu said she had not seen the report, but "we are against the attempt by any country or any organization to interfere with China's internal affairs."

Criminal investigation opens against Foley

Florida authorities have opened a criminal investigation into the sexually explicit computer messages that former representative Mark Foley sent to former male congressional pages. "We found the basis to open up a criminal investigation," said Kristen Perezluha, a spokeswoman for the Florida Department of Law Enforcement. She would not elaborate. Foley resigned Sept. 29 after being confronted with the lurid communications. His attorney, David Roth, declined to comment on the criminal investigation.

Cheney Is Toast, So New Veep In Works? (USAT)

By Al Neuharth

USA Today, November 17, 2006

Now it's all about the White House in 2008. With midterm ballots barely counted, they started lining up on both sides of the aisle this week. Before it's over, expect 10 or 12 Democrats and four or five Republicans to make a serious run for the Oval Office.

In modern politics, the party in power with a two-term president has had a vice president waiting to move up. Those nominations have been almost automatic. History over the past half century:

Bill Clinton's VP Al Gore in 2000. Ronald Reagan's George H.W. Bush 18 years ago. Lyndon Johnson's Hubert Humphrey in 1968. Dwight Eisenhower's Richard Nixon 46 years ago.

Dick Cheney unequivocally has taken himself out of the running. So he's toast.

It's hard to think of a good reason he should remain in office and logical to assume that some Republicans are pushing him to leave. It could be on "doctor's orders." He's 65 with serious heart problems.

Bush then could name a vice presidential successor who they hope might be nominated and win in '08. But the appointment would need approval of both houses of Congress. With control shifting to the Democrats in January, time may be of the essence.

Likely on the short might-be list (alphabetically):

•Bill Frist, 54, Senate majority leader from Tennessee.

•Rudy Giuliani, 62, former mayor of New York City.

•John McCain, 70, U.S. senator from Arizona.

•Condoleezza Rice, 52, secretary of State.

If Cheney goes, Bush could make political history by naming the first woman and first black as veep. When presidents are lame ducks, they sometimes think more about what historians will say than about current events.

25 Years Later Reagan's Tax Cuts Are A Global Tide (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0095664

The Wall Street Journal, November 17, 2006

It was entirely appropriate that as its keynote speaker to celebrate the 25th anniversary of the 1981 Reagan tax cut, the Heritage Foundation in Washington this week should assign the job to Art Laffer. Mr. Laffer is surely the most irrepressibly ebullient practitioner of the dismal science of economics alive today, maybe ever. It is no surprise that more than a quarter century ago, then California Gov. Ronald Reagan, another genuinely cheerful soul in a dismal profession, would have found common cause with the young economist's view that cutting taxes would produce a wealth of benefits for the American people.

Now, 25 years later and with the post-Reagan Republican Party in tatters over a confused political agenda, Mr. Laffer stood beaming at the Heritage podium to inform its audience that "illegal immigrants are the lifeblood of our society." This produced a boo-burst from a distant corner, which Mr. Laffer seemed not to notice. When so informed over a nightcap at the Willard Hotel, he said with the famous smile, "What do I care? I've been booed at all my life."

As, indeed, has Reaganomics over its 25-year life. On this night Mr. Laffer, famous in part for cutting down economists' pretenses to ideas anyone can understand, had an answer for the boo-birds of Reaganomics: Almost alone, the United States since those tax cuts has managed to remain both a growth country and a developed nation.

Economic growth was always the sine qua non of supply-side tax theory, the belief that lower marginal rates would incentivize people to work, save and invest. Bob Bartley, the late editor of The Wall Street Journal editorial page, wanted nothing more than to focus this debate back then on the particulars of achieving growth in the economy. But for many garden-variety politicians and professional economists, the economy is an abstraction. Yes, they know something is going on out there in the workaday world, but it's all a second-order effect of their policies and theories. So at its creation the supply-side idea instantly bogged down into an argument, alive to this day, over whether the tax cuts would "pay for themselves." You know, the deficit, the budget, the "nonpartisan" economic models at the Congressional Budget Office, blah, blah, blah.

It was back about the time these arguments over fiscal policy were erupting in the late 1970s that this page began to propagate the phrase, "inside the Beltway." This of course refers to Interstate 495, which rings Washington like the bright outline that surrounds protoplasm under a microscope. The unicellular protozoa inside the Beltway live life swimming from this side to that, bumping each other. They enjoy it. And so even today the debate over tax cuts "paying for themselves" lives on, reincarnated as a proposal called "paygo" which decrees that no tax cut may pass into law unless an "offset" is laid upon the altar of the budget gods.

But let's return to the real world, where the object is growing an economy, not fertilizing Uncle Sam's giant budget beanstalk. In the final months of Ronald Reagan's presidency, something else happened that forced even Beltway accountants to look up from their ledgers: The Berlin Wall fell in 1989. Five years later this brought forth the second great wave of supply-side tax policy.

Communism had been running what might be called a 40-year demonstration study in life at one end of the Laffer Curve -- what happens to economies when you tax away pretty much everything. Freed of this utopia, the peoples of Eastern Europe now had to devise new tax regimes appropriate to nations eager -- for want of a better phase -- to work, save and invest.

The first former Iron Curtain country to cut its taxes was Estonia in 1994, led by Prime Minister Mart Laar, who claimed then the only economics book he'd ever read was Milton Friedman's "Free to Choose." Estonia established a flat rate on personal incomes of 26%; two years earlier it had abolished all import tariffs. Estonia grew.

After Estonia, flat-tax regimes coursed across Eastern Europe, as listed below (bear in mind that the top rate in the U.S. is 35%): Lithuania, 33%; Latvia, 25%; Slovakia, 19% (the former sad sack of the region, Slovakia's growing economy has become its envy); Romania, 16%; Ukraine, 13%; Russia, 13%; and Georgia, 12%.

Yes, payroll taxes are often high, but unlike here, the political impulse is to reduce the tax burden; Estonia hopes to get its flat rate down to 20% by decade's end. Even the World Bank has noticed. In a September report on business reforms, it noted that the second most popular global reform the past few years, after easing regulations on new businesses, was "reducing tax rates and the administrative hassle of paying taxes." Bosnia-Herzegovina, emerging from the Balkan wars, has cut property taxes.

The accounting firm KPMG's annual corporate-tax survey, released this month, took special note of the history of corporate tax rates. The downward trend here was begun in 1985 with a corporate-rate cut in the U.K. by Reagan admirer Margaret Thatcher. "In the past 14 years," the report says, "the average corporate tax rate of countries surveyed by KPMG declined nearly 29%, dropping from an average of 38% to 27.1%." When Austria cuts its corporate rate to 25% from 34% and German companies started rolling across the border, German Finance Minister Peer Steinbruck accused the Austrians -- I love this phrase -- of "fiscal dumping."

During Ronald Reagan's presidency, the top marginal rate on personal incomes dropped to 28% from 70%. In 1993 Bill Clinton raised the top tax rate to 39.6%. In 2001 George Bush pushed the top rate back down to 35% and cut the rate on capital gains and dividends to 15%. Last week former Clinton Treasury Secretary Robert Rubin exhorted the Democrats to raise taxes "to solve the nation's fiscal problems."

The Rubin Solution may not be easy. Even a Democratic Congress might realize that raising taxes today is swimming against the global tides. In reversing the Clinton tax increases, passed in another age 13 years ago, and spreading tax cuts to the financial sector, George Bush has driven the roots of the Reagan tax philosophy deeper. If he resists a grand compromise on entitlements that raises taxes, it may prove to be his most enduring legacy.

Issues Front And Center (WP)

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post, November 17, 2006

The Democrats now have the opportunity the Republicans spurned, which is to build a broad coalition in the center and become once again the nation's governing party. But to achieve that, the Democrats must stand for values that connect with those of most Americans. The center is meaningless, after all, except as a platform for enacting legislation the public wants.

Some Democratic initiatives are obvious after the November election: The public wants changes in Iraq policy that reduce the costs and dangers for America; reform of an arrogant and corrupt congressional leadership; and an end to partisan political bickering. The new House speaker, Rep. Nancy Pelosi, had a disastrous post-election week in which her first priority seemed to be settling scores rather than solving these big problems. Shame on her! But let's assume for the moment that the new Democratic majority won't commit instant suicide with a continuation of Pelosi's payback politics, and that it will get serious about governing.

What are the issues where the Democrats should plant their flag and try to create a new majority? Two are no-brainers that should have broad bipartisan support next year: reviving the Clinton administration's push for national health-care policies that can save costs and improve care, and getting serious about alternative energy policies that can reduce demand for foreign oil. Sen. Hillary Clinton has already staked out these issues, which will enhance her stature as a 2008 presidential candidate.

A third big Democratic idea was advanced this week by Jim Webb, the senator-elect from Virginia, who promises to be one of the most interesting voices in the new Congress. He argued in the Wall Street Journal that the Democrats should focus on economic justice. "America's top tier has grown infinitely richer and more removed over the past 25 years," he wrote. "It should be the first order of business for the new Congress to begin addressing these divisions, and to work to bring true fairness back to economic life." Former senator John Edwards, another leading Democratic contender for 2008, has put his stamp on this same issue through his new Center on Poverty, Work and Opportunity at the University of North Carolina.

Webb and Edwards are right about the dangers of rising inequality in America. Studies by the Census Bureau, the National Bureau of Economic Research and other organizations all report growing inequality in income distribution over the past 35 years. According to a June 2000 study by the Census Bureau, the gap between rich and poor began widening sharply in the early 1980s. From 1980 to 1992, the share of national income going to the top fifth rose by nearly 18 percent.

The income gap continued during the technology boom and the stock-option frenzy of the Clinton years, according to studies by a leading analyst of inequality, James K. Galbraith of the University of Texas. He notes that the collapse of the tech bubble and the surge of military spending under President Bush shifted the pattern of winners -- but from blue-state counties to other blue-state counties. In a recent paper, Galbraith found that the big gainers of the 1990s -- Santa Clara, San Mateo and San Francisco counties in California and New York City -- were the top four losers from 2000 to 2004, while the four big winners after 2000 were the District of Columbia and Fairfax, Los Angeles and San Diego counties.

The Democrats' challenge is to fuse populist anger with the party's other dynamic movement -- the call for fiscal reforms made by former Treasury secretary Robert Rubin and other members of the Hamilton Project, which seeks budget-balancing changes in entitlement spending. The goal should be to articulate policies that are at once pro-equality and pro-growth. That's a tall order, especially at a time when the U.S. economy appears to be slowing.

Lawrence Summers, a former Treasury secretary and Harvard economist, suggested the right balance in a column in the Financial Times last month: "The best parts of the progressive tradition do not oppose the market system; they improve on the outcomes it naturally produces. That is what we need today."

If the Democrats hope to re-create the "big tent" of a true governing coalition, they have to find policies that bring together the wings of their own party. Successful economic policies will be those that advance the interests of Main Street without destroying those of Wall Street, and vice versa. Solving that puzzle is a big intellectual challenge. It should motivate and unite the Democrats -- from Webb and Edwards to Clinton and Rubin -- as they move toward 2008.

The Big Three's Diminished Pull (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, November 17, 2006

ONCE UPON A TIME, if the chief executives of the Big Three U.S. automakers wanted a meeting with the president, he would rearrange a few summits or travel to Detroit to accommodate their schedules. Not anymore.

After months of lobbying for some face time with President Bush, the heads of General Motors, Ford and DaimlerChrysler's Chrysler Group finally got their wish Tuesday — after the election, at a time when the president's political power is at a low point. Bush met with the CEOs for about an hour in the Oval Office. The president smiled, said a few nice things to the cameras about the importance of the U.S. auto industry and sent them on their way. Very little, if anything, is expected to come of the meeting.

It was a reflection not only of the newfound weakness of the industry but of a change in global circumstances. The lines separating U.S. from foreign automakers are a lot blurrier than they used to be. DaimlerChrysler, still considered one of the giants of Detroit, is headquartered in Germany. Toyota and Honda might be based in Japan, but they own numerous U.S. factories and employ thousands of American workers.

The executives weren't looking for a bailout, but they were hoping for some assistance from Washington. At the top of their agenda was healthcare. If they want help on that, they'll have to get in line. It is inarguable that the automakers face crushing healthcare costs, but it is the entire U.S. healthcare system that is in desperate need of an overhaul. The auto industry's problems differ only in scale.

Also up for discussion Tuesday was the Japanese yen, which Detroit has long complained is undervalued, and alternative fuels — the CEOs were apparently seeking more subsidies to build flex-fuel cars that can burn either gasoline or an ethanol blend. Bush wisely failed to take the bait on the yen, whose value is determined by market forces and not by the machinations of the Japanese government or its automakers. And although Washington should be encouraging more flex-fuel cars, Detroit could also focus on improving the gas mileage of conventional vehicles.

The U.S. auto industry is an important part of the nation's economy. But this is one road the Big Three are going to have to steer on their own. The days of massive federal bailouts for the likes of Chrysler are over — and would be even if it were still an American company.

Low Oil Prices, Modest Inflation Fuel Dow Record (WSJ)

By Peter A. Mckay

The Wall Street Journal, November 17, 2006

Moderate inflation and a plunge in oil prices to a one-year low pushed the Dow Jones Industrial Average to another record.

The blue-chip average climbed 54.11 points, or 0.4%, to 12305.82, up 15% year to date. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index rose 0.2%, or 3.19 points, to 1399.76, shy of its first close above 1400 since November 2000. The broad-based index is up 12% this year.

DOJ_NMG_0095667

The Nasdaq Composite Index rose 0.3%, or 6.31 points, to 2449.06, up 11% year to date.

In the session's most anticipated piece of economic news, the Labor Department reported that its consumer-price index, excluding volatile food and energy prices, rose 0.1% in October, shy of Wall Street's consensus expectation for an increase of 0.2%.

Compared with the year-earlier period, the so-called core inflation rate is 2.7%, above the 2% level that the Federal Reserve considers the upper limit of acceptable annual growth in prices throughout the economy. October's reading was shy of the 3% level some analysts believe would trigger widespread worries that an interest-rate increase by the Fed is imminent.

"The readings are still too high for the Fed to ease rates, but at least for the day, the market is less worried about the worst-case scenario," said Jim Paulsen, chief investment strategist at Wells Capital Management. He cautioned that he still believes economic growth will push inflation readings higher in the months ahead, eventually prompting the Fed to tighten.

Energy traders bid the expiring December futures contracts for crude oil sharply lower, off $2.50, or 4.3%, to $56.26 a barrel, down 7.8% year to date at the New York Mercantile Exchange.

Warmer weather and mixed reports about the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries' output helped to nudge prices lower. To avoid taking delivery of actual oil, many traders had to sell December futures to move their purely financial bets into January futures, said Alaron Trading analyst Phil Flynn.

He said such selloffs have become more common in the past 18 months or so -- a period in which contracts for long-term crude delivery have usually traded at a premium to contracts for immediate delivery. "This is getting to be a common theme in the oil market," said Mr. Flynn. "I call it expiration ugly, or expiration madness."

Outside the U.S., stocks fell in dollar terms. The Dow Jones World Stock Index, excluding U.S. shares, fell 0.02%, or 0.05 point, to 231.54.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks rose, and bond prices fell. The 10-year note fell 10/32 point, or $3.125 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield up to 4.659%. The 30-year bond fell 20/32 to yield 4.737%.

The dollar strengthened. Against the Japanese currency, the dollar rose to 118.22 yen, compared with 118.04. The euro fell to $1.2796, compared with $1.2826.

Inflation Drops Again As Gasoline Prices Fall (WP)

By Howard Schneider And Nell Henderson

The Washington Post, November 17, 2006

Inflation continued to moderate in October as falling oil prices, a slack housing market and a decline in clothing costs reinforced the sense of a gradually slowing economy.

Labor Department statistics released yesterday indicated that overall prices declined 0.5 percent in October on a seasonally adjusted basis, following a similar decline in the previous month.

Excluding volatile fuel and food costs, prices rose 0.1 percent, the smallest increase since December and a sign that core inflation is declining.

Overall, prices rose at a 2.4 percent annual rate for the first 10 months of the year, the Labor Department reported, much less than the 3.4 percent price increase recorded for all of 2005, when fuel prices spiked.

Wall Street greeted the data with restrained enthusiasm yesterday, concluding the Federal Reserve probably will not need to raise interest rates any time soon to battle inflation. The Dow Jones industrial average rose 54.11, or 0.4 percent, to close at 12,305.82, the latest in a string of all-time highs for the Dow. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index rose 3.19, or 0.2 percent, to close at 1399.76.

The data released yesterday added to evidence that economic growth has slowed under the influence of recent Fed rate increases. The most recent report of the value of all goods and services produced, known as gross domestic product, indicated the economy was expanding at a sluggish 1.6 percent annual rate, down sharply from earlier in the year.

Federal Reserve policymakers agreed at their meeting last month that "inflation risks remained the dominant concern" and that more interest rate increases were possible if price pressures did not ebb, according to minutes of the session released on Wednesday.

The central bank has left its benchmark rate unchanged since June, after increasing it 17 times over two years to restrain inflation. Some analysts warned that it may be too soon to conclude the rate increases are over, with unemployment at a low 4 .4 percent, wages rising and consumers spending the extra cash they've gained from lower gasoline prices.

"There might be a little more work to do," said Drew Matus, senior economist at Lehman Brothers Inc., which predicts the Fed will raise its benchmark rate to 5.5 percent from 5.25 percent early next year. "We don't think the inflation problem has gone away."

The milder inflation report will allow the Fed more time to watch how the slumping housing market affects the economy in coming months, he said. "This gives the Fed more breathing room, but it doesn't mean we're out of the woods" on inflation, Matus said.

For now, the news is positive, particularly last month's mild 0.1 percent increase in the core CPI. The core index rose 2.7 percent in the 12 months that ended in October, after rising 2.9 percent in the year ended in September, the highest 12-month figure reported this year.

"One soft core is not a trend, but it still looks great," said Ian Shepherdson, chief U.S. economist for the High Frequency Economics consulting firm.

Fuel prices figured significantly in the October price decline, as they did in September, falling 7.2 percent last month on top of a 7 percent decline the month before.

Gasoline fell 11.1 percent in October. The national average was $2.23 per gallon, down from more than $3 a gallon for much of the summer, according to the AAA automobile club. Oil is trading at about $59 a barrel, down from a peak of more than $78 a barrel in July.

Inflationary Signs Weaken Broadly (WSJ)

By Rafael Gerena-morales

The Wall Street Journal, November 17, 2006

Inflationary pressures eased broadly last month, reinforcing the Federal Reserve's view that consumer-price increases will subside as the U.S. economy cools.

The Labor Department reported that consumer prices nationwide fell a seasonally adjusted 0.5% last month -- matching September's decline -- and were up 1.3% from a year earlier, the smallest year-to-year increase since June 2002.

Core consumer prices, which exclude food and energy, rose a less-than-expected 0.1% in October, compared with a 0.2% increase in each of the three preceding months. Core prices were up 2.7% from a year earlier, short of the 2.9% year-to-year rise in September.

The inflation reading "is unmitigated good news," said Nariman Behravesh, chief economist at consulting firm Global Insight. "It will provide great comfort to the Fed because they've been saying that inflation is going to come down -- and it has. People who were worried about [high] core inflation can breathe a little easier."

The favorable inflation data, along with a plunge in oil prices to a one-year low, sent the Dow Jones Industrial Average climbing 54.11 points to a record close of 12305.82. (See related article1.)

DOJ_NMG_0095669

Energy prices recorded some of the steepest of October's price declines. Gasoline prices fell 11.1% from September and were down 18.3% from a year earlier. Natural-gas prices declined 7.7% and were 24% below a year ago.

Prices for many other products and services also declined last month. Prices fell 3.3% on information-technology hardware and services, 1.2% on both used cars and trucks and women's apparel and 1% on personal computers and peripheral equipment.

Meanwhile, some housing-related costs, which pushed core inflation higher this summer, continued climbing. Rents paid by tenants, as well as owner's equivalent rent -- what a homeowner would have to pay to rent comparable living space -- each rose 0.4% from September.

Even so, the broad-based price declines suggest that "the inflation scare is over," said Mark Vitner, a senior economist at Wachovia Corp. in Charlotte, N.C. If current trends continue, Mr. Vitner believes that the Fed's next move will likely be to cut interest rates in the first half of 2007. Immediately after the report, futures markets raised the odds of a quarter-point rate cut by April to about one in four, from about one in seven.

Other economists were more cautious. They noted that while inflation is easing, the core level remains above the Fed's perceived "comfort zone" of 1% to 2%, and that the nation's tight labor market, which is helping to lift wages and other business costs, could stoke inflation next year. Average hourly earnings in October were up 3.9% from a year earlier. That compares with an average increase of 2.8% in 2005.

"It's not fair to say that the inflation genie is in the bottle," said Haseeb Ahmed, an economist at J.P. Morgan Chase & Co. "There is still work to do on inflation."

The Fed has kept its target for short-term interest rates at 5.25% since late June as the economy has slowed and appears to be heading toward moderate growth. The economy expanded by 1.6% in the third quarter, compared with an average of 4.1% in the first half of 2006.

The consensus among 56 economists surveyed last month by WSJ.com was that the economy would expand by an average of 2.5% in the fourth quarter, which would be below its long-term trend growth rate of about 3%.

A separate economic report released yesterday by the Federal Reserve seemed to confirm that some sectors of the economy are continuing to cool. The Fed reported that production at the nation's factories, mines and utilities increased a seasonally adjusted 0.2% in October, boosted by a 4.1% increase in utilities' output amid "colder-than-normal" weather in the Midwestern and Rocky Mountain states. The nation's capacity utilization rate, a measure of how fast the industry is running, rose slightly to 82.2% in October.

Manufacturing output, however, fell 0.2% for the second straight month, dragged down by production cuts in the auto and housing-related sectors.

"Manufacturing will not have a merry holiday season this year," said Daniel J. Meckstroth, chief economist for the Manufacturers Alliance/MAPI in Arlington, Va. Mr. Meckstroth projects that manufacturing output will remain flat in the fourth quarter, down from 4.5% growth in the third quarter.

The housing market did offer one bright spot yesterday: The National Association of Home Builders/Wells Fargo Housing Market Index, which tracks builder sentiment about homes sales, for November rose slightly from the previous month, gaining two points to 33.

NAHB chief economist David Seiders said the increase was a sign that the leveling off of home prices has improved housing affordability. Several large home builders, however, have said recently that they expect slow sales to continue into next year and that they haven't seen many signs of improvement.

Also yesterday, the Labor Department said that initial claims for unemployment benefits fell 2,000 to a seasonally adjusted 308,000 in the week ended Nov. 11, suggesting that the labor market remains healthy.

Inflation Slowdown Raises Rate Cut Hope (FT)

By Eoin Callan And Krishna Guha

Financial Times, November 17, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0095670

Inflation slowed sharply in the US last month, new figures showed on Thursday, easing the pressure on the Federal Reserve and raising expectations of an interest rate cut next year.

The core consumer price index rose 0.1 per cent in October, its lowest monthly increase since inflation began to accelerate in the spring.

The October report is a clear break with a run of stubbornly high inflation figures. Core inflation rose 0.2 per cent in each of the three preceding months, and faster in the previous quarter.

The three-month annualised rate of core inflation often cited by Ben Bernanke, the Fed chairman – which peaked at 3.8 per cent in May – fell for the fifth consecutive month to 2.3 per cent from 2.7 per cent.

"I view this as the first sign, the first proof, that the outlook for inflation is improving," said Bob DiClemente, chief US economist at Citigroup.

However, Michael Moskow, president of the Chicago Fed, warned investors against assuming that the Fed would think the fight against inflation is now over. "It's one month, and I think it's a bit premature for anyone to say that we have broken the back of inflation," he said.

"It is moving in the right direction; the key is whether that can be sustained and how quickly we can move to rates that are in a range that is commensurate with price stability. We're certainly not there now."

He added: "My current assessment is that the risk of inflation remaining too high is greater than the risk of growth being too low."

Lower energy prices have given central banks around the world greater flexibility in tackling inflation.

The Bank of Japan also kept its options open on Thursday, keeping interest rates at 0.25 per cent, after a low headline inflation rate of 0.2 per cent in September. But the central bank has made it clear that it is prepared to move pre-emptively against inflation.

Equity markets were buoyant in the wake of the US inflation report, while futures markets priced in about a 50 per cent chance of a US rate cut early next year. The dollar held its ground, while US Treasuries reversed early modest gains.

Meanwhile, figures on Thursday showed inflation pressures remain moderate in the eurozone, with headline and core both at 1.6 per cent.

The softer inflation figures in the US will reduce the pressure on the Fed to consider raising rates and will be viewed by Mr Bernanke as helping support the decision to keep rates on hold at the past three policy meetings.

Prices Fall, US Inflation Worries Ease (CSM)

By Ron Scherer

The Christian Science Monitor, November 17, 2006

The price of a ton of steel is falling - something that helps to ease prices on everything from automobiles to rebar used to buttress concrete. Dresses and trousers are already on sale in department stores. And gasoline prices, after their recent spike, are back down to where they were about a year ago.

Falling prices on many goods are reining in the nation's inflation rate. Thursday, in an economic report that cheered just about everyone, the government reported that the Consumer Price Index (CPI) in October fell 0.5 percent. Even taking out volatile energy and food prices, inflation barely registered, rising only 0.1 percent.

The improving inflation news should help relieve the concerns of the Federal Reserve, the nation's central bank, that inflationary expectations are rising. The Fed meets in the middle of next month to set interest-rate policy. Economists expect the latest report to be one of the factors that keep the bank from taking any action on interest rates.

"I don't think we're going to see a change," says Ann Owen, a former Fed economist now at Hamilton College in Clinton, N.Y. "In the past couple of meetings, even though the Fed has not made any changes, we've seen a dissenting vote in favor of raising interest rates and what we might see now is no dissenting vote."

The inflation numbers are also improving on a year-over-year basis. Compared with last October, prices are up 2.7 percent, a rate that is still higher than the Fed would like to see but a decline from prior months. "The numbers are [going] in the right direction," says Professor Owen.

DOJ_NMG_0095671

The improvement in the CPI follows a similar report on Tuesday for the Producer Price Index, a measure of inflation for businesses, which fell 1.6 percent. Taking out food and energy, prices dropped 0.9 percent.

The falling prices reflect the competitive business environment, says Daniel Meckstroth, chief economist for the Manufacturers Alliance/MAPI in Arlington, Va. "Business just can't raise prices."

In an important trend, some commodity prices other than energy are also starting to retreat, he says. Copper, aluminum, and steel are all selling for less than they were this summer. "We're getting a pause in demand, which is giving supply a chance to catch up," says Mr. Meckstroth.

An easing of the inflation rate might also start to relieve what the Fed calls "inflationary expectations" - the public's anticipation that prices will keep going up. However, prices will have to remain down for a longer time to change perceptions, says Dennis Jacobe, chief economist at the Gallup Organization in Washington.

"A considerable number of Americans think the drop in gasoline prices is temporary and prices will go back up, if not this year than next year," he says.

It's not just gasoline prices, Mr. Jacobe adds. Over the last several years, prices have risen for healthcare and education. In Thursday's report, healthcare rose 0.3 percent in October and education 0.2 percent. "People perceive a sizable increase in these areas," he says.

The Fed is also watching the housing sector carefully for signs that the slowdown there will have an adverse impact on future CPI numbers. Housing is weighted to represent 25 percent of the index. To calculate housing costs, the government looks at rents.

"When there is a big drop in housing, everyone who was going to buy stops and starts renting because they think they should wait to see how low prices drop," says Owen. "This increases the demand for rental housing, which is ironic for the Fed because it could raise the CPI, causing them to raise rates. And housing will decline more, so the CPI gets worse, not better. So, the Fed is watching the housing market carefully because they don't want to accelerate the decline in prices."

This week, DataQuick reported that the number of new and existing homes sold in southern California last month was the lowest in 10 years. And prices have leveled off. The median price was $484,000, the same as September, but up 2.3 percent from October a year ago. DataQuick reports that year-over-year increases have been in the single-digit range for the past seven months and are expected to be slightly negative by the end of this year or early next year.

One of the largest factors in the falling CPI last month was the drop in gasoline prices. Energy prices in October were down 7.0 percent from September, which was down 7.2 percent from August.

The falling prices at the pump could augur well for upcoming holiday sales, says Scott Brown, chief economist at Raymond James & Associates in St. Petersburg, Fla. When gasoline prices move up or down, "there is a lag effect ... on consumer spending," he explains. "People are still working off the $3 a gallon they paid this summer, but once they work through those credit-card bills, they will feel better about the outlook."

As a result, Mr. Brown, says he is "cautiously optimistic" about the prospects for the holiday retail sales.

Halliburton Begins A New Era (WSJ)

By Worth Civils

The Wall Street Journal, November 17, 2006

Halliburton Co. has shed a big part of its business, for better or worse. KBR, the engineering and construction unit with a huge presence in Iraq, was successfully offered to the public Thursday after a slight delay1. Halliburton's stock, which has rallied in anticipation of the spinoff, has done well since the Iraq war began, rising from around $10 to an all-time high of $42 earlier this year. Shares closed Thursday at $32.51, down $1.04 on the New York Stock Exchange. And while its third-quarter performance and plans for more capital spending have drawn approval from some analysts, suspicions surrounding its dealings in Iraq and worries about a slowdown in its oilfield-services business have others concerned. (Ratings and disclosures follow) The Bull Case

Active Oilfields: Halliburton posted strong third-quarter earnings as demand for oilfield services surged. The second-largest industry player behind Schlumberger Ltd. saw its oilfield division hit record revenue of $3.4 billion in the quarter, and it beat analysts' average earnings estimates by twice as much as its larger rival did. The success came across a wide geographic swath, with international growth equaling growth in North America year over year. "This has not been the case in past quarters and bodes well for Halliburton's ability to grow," wrote UBS analyst James Stone, who said the results prove the company is "much more than a one trick pony." Mr. Stone raised his fourth-quarter earnings-per-share estimate to 63 cents from 58 cents. Halliburton "remains one of the most undervalued stocks in the oilfield service sector…despite consistently strong performance," he wrote.

Dollar Signs: Halliburton plans to increase capital spending to $1.2 billion in 2007, up 40% from this year, something analysts see as a good sign for business. Most of the new spending will be used to grow markets in the Eastern Hemisphere, where Halliburton has won several big contracts recently in such countries as Australia, Indonesia and Russia. In June, the company was awarded a three-year contract for the oilfield-services component of a large oil development project in the Arabian Gulf -- the Saudi Aramco Khurais project. Citigroup's Geoff Kieburtz calls the East the "future growth engine" for Halliburton. The company also plans to boost research-and-development spending by as much as 30% next year, which Mr. Kieburtz said shows its "conviction about the positive long-term outlook" in the oilfield business.

Public Appearance: Halliburton took 17% of its KBR unit public yesterday in a move welcomed by analysts. The initial public offering of 27.8 million shares priced at $17, the upper end of its range, and is expected to bring Halliburton $441 million after fees. KBR popped in its debut Thursday, rising 22% to $20.75 a share. "We believe the KBR IPO process should be a catalyst to Halliburton shares…and broaden the company's investor base," Bear Stearns' Robin Shoemaker wrote. Halliburton plans to shed the remainder of the firm by April 2007. While some uncertainty will likely remain until it is fully separated from Halliburton, "the IPO is a critical first step to unlocking the value we see in Halliburton's oilfield business," wrote Mike Urban at Deutsche Bank. "A new era begins for Halliburton," wrote Daniel Henriques at Goldman Sachs in a note after the KBR IPO, which he says will "bridge the valuation gap between Halliburton and its peers," namely Schlumberger and Baker Hughes Inc. The Bear Case

Oilfield Aches: Falling commodity prices could spell trouble for Halliburton's North American business, which accounts for more than 60% of the operating income in its energy-services division. The unit's operating margin -- a measure of revenue left after paying for production costs -- could be pinched, notes J.P. Morgan's Michael LaMotte, who said "the potential threat … is significant." He predicts the margin could fall more than four percentage points next year, shaving 43 cents a share from annual earnings. Also, much of Halliburton's business depends on how many oil and gas pumping rigs come to market, and the overall rate of rig growth is expected to decline, analysts predict. What's more, James Wicklund at Banc of America Securities sees a "great deal of difficulty" in Halliburton signing contracts at higher prices. "Every exploration and production company we talk to is trying to reduce oilfield-services pricing…so any weakness in the market is seen and spreads quickly."

Close Scrutiny: Halliburton could come under more fire amid a new political landscape -- a risk even more bullish analysts acknowledge. "With a Democratic led House and Senate, there is a more than reasonable chance that the company may come under more scrutiny," wrote Conley Turner at Wall Street Strategies. Since the war started in Iraq, Halliburton's KBR unit has received more than $16 billion for projects there. Rep. Henry Waxman, a California Democrat and vocal Halliburton critic, is set to become chairman of the House Government Reform Committee, where he will have subpoena power and could hold hearings examining Halliburton, a prospect that could prove distracting2 for both the company and its shareholders.

Artificial Prop: Anticipation of the KBR spinoff has been the primary force driving up the price Halliburton shares in recent weeks, some analysts say, but the move also has the potential to cut annual revenue by nearly half as it loses business in Iraq and other parts of the world. And some analysts say the KBR spinoff news has made Halliburton seem overpriced. "At this point, we would not recommend chasing the stock," wrote Mr. LaMotte at J.P. Morgan, who thinks the rally in Halliburton shares "probably has more to do with the potential acceleration of the KBR IPO than anything else." In other words, he said, "We do not believe that the rally in the stock indicates that investors believe the North American…business has dodged a bullet and will be fine next year." Mr. LaMotte favors Baker Hughes over Halliburton, saying it has more earnings potential and less exposure to the uncertain North American market.

KBR Shares Up 22% On 1st Day Of Trading (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0095673

The Washington Post, November 17, 2006

KBR Inc., the Halliburton Co. subsidiary that made its parent company famous -- and infamous -- with its huge contracts in Iraq, took a major step toward independence yesterday with an initial public offering in which share prices rose 22 percent on their first day of trading.

Newly issued KBR stock had been priced at $17 a share Wednesday night, but was trading for $21 by the time the New York Stock Exchange opened yesterday. It closed at $20.75. The IPO was projected to net KBR about $441 million, which will be used to pay off debt.

For oil-field-services company Halliburton, the IPO was a milestone in its more than two-year-old effort to spin off KBR. While Halliburton still owns a little more than 80 percent of the subsidiary once known as Kellogg Brown & Root, Halliburton executives have said they plan to sell the rest of the company to shareholders by April. That means Halliburton, where Vice President Cheney once was chief executive, will be separate from the company that has done billions of dollars worth of work in Iraq for the Defense Department over the past 3 1/2 years.

Analysts said Halliburton's main reason for making the move was that KBR had become a drain on the company's share price. While KBR takes in huge revenues through its government contracting and engineering work, its profit margins are considerably thinner than those of the rest of Halliburton, which focuses on exploration and drilling for energy supplies.

"KBR didn't fit with what the rest of the business was," said Poe Fratt, oil sector analyst with A.G. Edwards & Sons Inc.

But Fratt and other analysts said another factor was likely at work. Halliburton may be trying to insulate itself from the bad publicity it received because of allegations that KBR has overcharged the government and shortchanged soldiers.

"The levels of scrutiny have been high for a while, but you're likely to see them escalate now that you have Democrats taking over committee chairmanships," Fratt said. "Halliburton is closely associated with Dick Cheney. But beyond the Beltway, KBR is not."

KBR, which like Halliburton has its headquarters in Houston, has about 400 employees in the Washington area. The company is split between its energy and chemicals division and its government and infrastructure division. Its work includes building offshore oil platforms, converting natural gas to liquid fuels and constructing military bases. KBR recorded $10 billion in revenue last year, about half of which came from Iraq.

KBR has defended its Iraq work and resolved many of the claims about overcharges. But questions linger. The Justice Department and a U.S. attorney in Illinois have open investigations into KBR's Iraq work, and the special inspector general for Iraq reconstruction has been looking into whether the government is getting its money's worth on a KBR contract to provide meals, laundry service and other logistical support to soldiers.

The Army announced over the summer that it would put that contract back out for bid. KBR is trying to keep the contract and is considered a favorite to win the bidding, but it will probably have to share the deal with other companies if it does.

KBR, with a corporate history that goes back more than a hundred years, has been the Pentagon's single largest contractor in Iraq. But as the U.S.-led portion of the reconstruction winds down, the company will face pressure to find business elsewhere. "KBR has been tied to a lot of activity in Iraq, and they have benefited from that. But Wall Street is always looking down the road," said Peter Arment, vice president of JSA Research Inc., which focuses on the defense industry.

Arment said, however, that the quick rise in KBR's share price yesterday was "a very positive sign" that the company will be well received by investors.

KBR's IPO is the latest in a string of successful public offerings by government contractors this fall. Science Applications International Corp. of San Diego raised more than $1 billion with an IPO last month. Shares were initially priced at $15 and closed at $20.08 yesterday. Also in October, Stanley Inc. of Arlington raised $81.9 million in an IPO that was initially priced at $13. Stanley closed at $16.58 yesterday.

KBR Shares Soar After UK Plea Rebuffed (FT)

By Anuj Gangahar

Financial Times, November 17, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0095674

Shares of KBR, the engineering and military services unit of Halliburton that ignored calls from the UK's Ministry of Defence to postpone its float, soared as much as 25 per cent on their debut on the New York Stock Exchange on Thursday after pricing at the top of their forecast range.

The MoD wanted the float delayed to give it time to determine the financial viability of KBR, which owns 51 per cent of the Devonport naval shipyard in Plymouth, western Europe's largest naval dockyard.

In the first nine months of the year, KBR made almost half of its operating profits from Devonport, where Britain's nuclear submarine fleet is refitted and refuelled.

Halliburton was eager to launch its offering at an advantageous moment in the market, but the MoD said it needed until the end of the month before it would conclude its assessment of KBR.

Shares in the company, formerly known as Kellogg Brown & Root, closed at $20.75, up 22 per cent to $3.75 on Wednesday's offering price of $17. They reached $21.31 earlier in the day.

The company raised $473m by selling 27.8m shares at $17 compared with a forecast range of $15 to $17, giving an initial market capitalisation of about $2.8bn.

Halliburton has been trying to split off the KBR unit, which has faced investigations into alleged overbilling concerning its contracts in Iraq, for some years to concentrate on its more lucrative oil services business.

KBR has often been viewed as a political liability for Halliburton, which was led from 1995 to 2000 by Dick Cheney, US vice-president.

In an emergency filing to the Securities and Exchange Commission, Halliburton said the MoD had asked on November 13 for the KBR offering to be withdrawn.

KBR's NYSE Debut (HC)

Houston Chronicle, November 17, 2006

Investors on Thursday looked past the controversy that has dogged KBR, lifting Halliburton Co.'s engineering and government-contracting arm to a strong start in its first day of trading on the New York Stock Exchange.

But KBR's decision to proceed with an initial public stock offering over the objections of the British government might still come back to bite it.

A top official with the United Kingdom's Ministry of Defense is scheduled to meet Monday with William Utt, KBR's chief executive, to discuss the impact of the move on a strategically important naval dockyard, which is majority-owned by KBR.

The British government has threatened to reject the lucrative contract if both sides cannot come to terms and was "concerned" about KBR's decision to proceed with the IPO this week before allowing the ministry office to perform a financial review of KBR, said Mitch Jeffrey, spokesman for the British consul general in Houston.

The British government office said it needs until the end of November to complete the review.

Even with that unresolved issue, KBR's stock price shot up to close at $20.75 per share Thursday. When trading opened it quickly zoomed past the $17 per share price that was set in an initial public stock offering Wednesday night. The largest military contractor in Iraq has faced investigations into overbilling there.

But Thursday's returns suggest investors are looking past negative headlines about KBR and seeing promise in its experience in building refineries, chemical plants and other large-scale energy projects, demand for which is expected to grow to meet rising global energy demands.

Halliburton, which sold 27.8 million shares, or 17 percent of KBR's stock, to underwriters Wednesday, plans to spin off the entire unit by April 2007. The $17 per share price was at the upper end of the estimated price range previously forecast by Halliburton.

The Houston-based oil-field-services giant is cutting ties with KBR, which it acknow- ledged has been a drag on earnings. Officials with Halliburton did not respond to requests for comment.

Jim Wicklund, industry analyst with Bank of America, said based on KBR's first day of trading, Halliburton's decision to part ways was a good one.

DOJ_NMG_0095675

"We believe the separation of the two businesses will unlock the value of both, and they will begin trading more in line with their respective peer groups," he wrote in a note to investors.

KBR raised $445 million in the offering — a bit higher that its original estimate — after underwriting fees and other expenses, the company said Thursday in a filing with the U.S. Securities and Exchange Committee. It will use the proceeds to pay debts to Halliburton subsidiaries that in October were roughly $450 million.

The underwriters, led by Credit Suisse, Goldman Sachs and UBS Investment Bank, have the option to buy an additional 4.18 million shares of KBR stock, which could add to KBR's take.

Candidates, Voters Still Await Results In Some Races (USAT)

By Andrea Stone

USA Today, November 17, 2006

WASHINGTON — Recounts, runoffs and Saturday's Ohio State-Michigan football game stand in the way of deciding House races that remain too close to call 10 days after the election.

Nearly a dozen races were unsettled at the start of the week.

Four races have been called since Tuesday, all but one in favor of the incumbent. Connecticut Republican Rep. Rob Simmons lost to Democrat Joe Courtney by 91 of nearly 250,000 votes cast.

However the remaining contests are decided, they won't prevent Democratic control of the incoming Congress.

Republicans lead in all five races in which absentee and provisional ballots are still being counted.

One of the closest contests is being waged in North Carolina, where GOP Rep. Robin Hayes leads Democrat Larry Kissell by about 450 votes. Poll workers are hand-tallying nearly 1,500 provisional ballots.

In Ohio, two races remain:

•Rep. Deborah Pryce, who has said she'll step down from her GOP leadership position, leads Democrat Mary Jo Kilroy by 3,536 votes. Election officials won't count provisional ballots until Sunday, so workers can watch the Ohio State-Michigan game Saturday.

•Freshman Republican Rep. Jean Schmidt leads Democrat Victoria Wulsin by about 2,800 votes. Provisional and absentee ballots could be counted by Tuesday.

The most contentious standoff is in Florida in the district that Republican Katherine Harris — a central figure in the disputed 2000 presidential election recount — gave up for her failed run for senator.

Just 401 votes separate the leader, Republican Vern Buchanan, from Democrat Christine Jennings. Both showed up in Washington this week for new member orientation.

Jennings has refused to concede, even though the Associated Press has declared Buchanan the winner.

A recount is underway, but that's not likely to explain why more than 18,000 voters in heavily Democratic Sarasota County left the House race blank on their electronic touch-screen ballots.

“Many voters have said they did not see the congressional race option on the ballot they were given,” said Sarah Feinberg of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee. “This is likely to be in court for some time.”

Ed Patru of the National Republican Congressional Committee, who is in Florida monitoring the recount, said Buchanan will keep his lead.

“It's only a matter of time before Jennings concedes. Short of calling for and being granted a new election, nothing will change here,” he said.

Susan MacManus, a political scientist at the University of South Florida, disagrees.

“I don't see either side backing down,” she said.

Though it's unclear whether state officials will heed Democratic calls for a new election, MacManus said that “at least in Florida,” efforts to require paper trails for electronic voting machines “have been fast-forwarded.”

Two other races will be decided in runoffs next month.

In Louisiana, state Rep. Karen Carter is challenging fellow Democrat Rep. William Jefferson, who is under investigation for alleged bribery.

In Texas, GOP Rep. Henry Bonilla faces Democratic former congressman Ciro Rodriguez.

Democrat Won't Seek Recount In Wyoming (AP-Y)

By Bob Moen, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 17, 2006

A Democratic challenger said Thursday he would not seek a recount in his narrow loss to Republican Rep. Barbara Cubin in Wyoming's closest House race in 36 years.

"It is time to put this election to rest and look to the future," Gary Trauner said in a statement. "Wyoming is counting on Mrs. Cubin to provide first-rate representation for all the people of the state, and I trust she will do so."

Cubin beat Trauner by 1,012 votes out of 193,369 cast. The State Canvassing Board certified the election results Wednesday.

The margin was too great to mandate an automatic recount. Trauner had until Friday to request a recount, but he would have had to pay for it.

Because state law does not allow for hand counting of ballots, Trauner said he didn't think a recount would change the result.

The election was Wyoming's closest U.S. House election since 1970, when Democrat Teno Roncalio beat Republican Harry Roberts by 608 votes.

100 Block Of D Street SE Embodies The Story Of The GOP's Undoing (MCT)

By Matt Stearns

McClatchy Newspapers, November 17, 2006

WASHINGTON - A requiem for the nearly departed Republican Congress: A stroll down the 100 block of D Street, Southeast in the nation's capital.

Inside the elegant painted-brick rowhouses that line the quiet street within sight of the U.S. Capitol are the stories of a revolution gone wildly wrong.

Overlooked oversight, tawdry tales of money and sex, increasingly strident conservatism that left moderates feeling isolated and disaffected: It's all here, a one-block catalogue of self-inflicted wounds.

With many of the block's congressional homeowners now facing either lucrative lobbying jobs or unemployment, maybe they could make it a show; open their doors and sell tickets: How We Lost Congress Without Really Trying. A bit of high drama, a dollop of tragedy, a lot of low comedy.

It's not so far-fetched.

For the last couple of years, several of the neighbors hosted a progressive cocktail party/fundraiser, according to the Capitol Hill newspaper Roll Call. Admission: $1,000 per house.

Those were the days, my friend. Who thought they'd ever end? As one homeowner, Mark Foley of Florida - yep, that Mark Foley - might muse in a late-night instant message: LOL!

The neighbors, the drinks, the problems, the consequences:

No. 129 D St., SE: Nancy Johnson of Connecticut, elected 1982. She served martinis - so moderate, so Connecticut, like a John Cheever story - at the progressive cocktail party.

Speaking of moderate: Last summer, the lead picture on Johnson's Web site was one of her with Bill Clinton. A good sign that being a Republican in an increasingly Democratic region was a not-so-good career move. Sure enough, Johnson lost her seat on Nov. 7 to Democrat Chris Murphy.

Northeast Republicans aren't just endangered. They're virtually extinct: The new House will have one Republican from New England. Lamented Sarah Chamberlain Resnick, the executive director of the moderate Republican Main Street Partnership: "If you drive all the moderates out, you're left with a Southern, minority party."

131 D St., SE: Clay Shaw of Florida, elected 1980. Served bourbon. A good Southern drink. He still lost.

Shaw came to Congress with the first Republican revolution, the one that put Ronald Reagan in the White House. He expected to chair the powerful Ways and Means Committee after this election. But Shaw got caught in the anti-Republican, anti-

DOJ_NMG_0095677

Bush, anti-Iraq war riptide. He later said that if Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld had been fired before the election, he could have beat Democrat Ron Klein. But Shaw himself spoke of "progress being made in Iraq" in the weeks before the election.

132 D St., SE: Jim Ryun of Kansas, elected 1996. Served dessert and coffee at the progressive. Not the usual diet of Olympic runners.

Like Shaw, GOP loyalist Ryun tripped up unexpectedly and lost to Democrat Nancy Boyda in a heavily Republican district.

Ryun's house was linked to the scandal that brought down former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay of Texas. Ryun bought the place for $410,000 in 2000 from the U.S. Family Network, a group associated with DeLay (whose political action committee had its office in the house) and lobbyist-felon-inmate Jack Abramoff.

The liberal Web site TPMmuckraker.com reported last spring that Ryun paid below market value; in fact, the seller lost money on the deal, an unheard-of occurrence in Capitol Hill real estate. Ryun said the low price was because of structural deficiencies he had to fix. Bright side: Those repairs should help the resale value.

135 D St., SE: Chris Chocola of Indiana, elected 2002. Served margaritas. No agave growing in Indiana; perhaps part of GOP outreach to Hispanics?

Chocola won office four years ago in a close race, taking an open seat long held by a Democrat in a year the president's party confounded history by winning seats in a midterm. Biggest help: President Bush visited twice to sprinkle Chocola with his post-Sept. 11 political magic dust, as Bush did for many others that year.

George Bush giveth and George Bush taketh away: Chocola was loyal to the administration for four years. And like many other loyal Republicans, he paid the price, losing his seat to Democrat Joe Donnelly in a race that turned on Bush's unpopularity and the war in Iraq.

137 D St., SE: Mark Foley, elected 1994. Served wine.

You know the story: Sexually-charged instant messages to underage male congressional pages. Resignation and rehab. A scandal that reached the highest levels of Congress. An ethics committee investigation into whether Republican leaders had covered up Foley's behavior.

All one month before an already tough election for Republicans. Foley's name appeared on the ballot, with another Republican tapped to fill the seat should Foley win.

He didn't. Democrat Tim Mahoney did.

Good news for the D Street denizens: Washington's sizzling real estate market has cooled, but most of them bought at low enough prices - cough, Jim Ryun, cough - that they'll still do quite well when they sell. The houses likely will fetch north of $850,000. Chocola, the newest homeowner, paid $640,000 in 2002.

Even in Washington, a house with the cachet of a former member of Congress or a scandal - or both - has little impact on price. It's mostly good for cocktail party chatter, said Phil Guire, a Capitol Hill real estate agent.

But "good houses are good houses," Guire said. "That's a block people will want to live on because of its proximity."

One house on the block already is on the market. No. 123, which belongs to Porter Goss. Sound familiar?

Goss, from Florida, chaired the House Intelligence Committee before he was named CIA director in 2004. In about 18 months at the CIA, Goss and his aides (Gosslings, they were called) alienated much of the career staff. Goss quit the CIA a week before federal agents searched the home and office of his confidante, the agency's No. 3 man, Kyle Foggo, as part of the corruption probe that sent former Republican Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham of California to prison.

Goss's house - two bedrooms, two-and-a-half baths - is on the market, too. $985,000.

McCain Calls For Common Sense In GOP (AP-Y)

By Liz Sidoti, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 17, 2006

On the heels of devastating GOP losses, Sen. John McCain called on the Republican Party to return to its common-sense conservatism — and implicitly cast himself as the one who can lead the party's rebirth.

"We lost our principles and our majority. And there is no way to recover our majority without recovering our principles first," the Arizona Republican said Thursday in the first of two speeches that could set the tone for a potential presidential campaign.

DOJ_NMG_0095678

On the same day he launched a presidential exploratory committee, McCain said voters felt that Republicans valued their incumbency over their beliefs on such conservative standards as limited and efficient government — and he urged a return to those tenets.

"Americans had elected us to change government, and they rejected us because they believed government had changed us," the four-term senator said. "We must spend the next two years reacquainting the public and ourselves with the reason we came to office in the first place: to serve a cause greater than our self-interest."

He spoke before members of the Federalist Society, the organization of more than 25,000 conservatives and libertarians including high-profile members of the Bush administration, the federal judiciary and Congress. Later Thursday, he was delivering a broader speech about the future of the Republican Party to another conservative pillar, GOPAC.

"Hypocrisy, my friends, is the most obvious of political sins. And the people will punish it," McCain said, explaining that while Republicans were elected to reduce the size of government, they ended up increasing it "in the false hope that we could bribe the public into keeping us in office."

Fifteen months before the first 2008 presidential nominating contests, McCain is positioning himself as the Republican standard-bearer while President Bush takes on lame-duck status and dispirited party faithful search for a road to recovery. The election cycle was sobering, with GOP candidates losing at all levels of government.

McCain is taking advantage of the postelection period to outline a vision for the party much like Ronald Reagan did after the Republican defeat in the 1976 presidential election.

"Republicans got their teeth kicked in all over the country," said Katon Dawson, South Carolina's party chairman. "Now, there's a window for all people with presidential aspirations to, in political terms, catch the high ground."

As expected, McCain also filed paperwork with the Federal Election Commission that will allow him to raise money and travel the country while weighing a bid. The committee's Web site — http://www.exploremccain.com — went online a day earlier, and McCain's GOPAC speech will be broadcast on the site.

Despite all the action, McCain says he will wait until after the Christmas holiday to decide whether to make a second bid for the White House. He lost to Bush in a contentious race in 2000, when the senator was the underdog and bypassed the revered Iowa caucuses to focus on independent-friendly New Hampshire.

Former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani has filed paperwork to test the waters for the GOP nomination, and Rep. Duncan Hunter of California also has announced his intention to run. On Wednesday, former Wisconsin Gov. Tommy Thompson said he intends to explore a possible candidacy.

McCain's other would-be 2008 Republican rivals include Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee, Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee, Sens. Sam Brownback of Kansas and Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, and former House Speaker Newt Gingrich.

Over the past year, McCain has repeatedly demurred on questions about his political future and said he was focused entirely on helping Republicans get elected across the country.

He spent 2006 sowing goodwill within the GOP ranks, making 346 campaign appearances, raising $10.5 million for candidates and donating another nearly $1.5 million to their races. He directed most of his donations in the final month of the campaign to races in Iowa and New Hampshire.

McCain Tells Conservatives G.O.P.'s Defeat Was Payback For Losing 'Our Principles' (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney

The New York Times, November 17, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 17 — Senator John McCain said Thursday that Republicans had lost the midterm elections because "we abandoned our principles" on fiscal policy and government restraint, inviting a backlash from Americans over what they saw as widespread hypocrisy.

DOJ_NMG_0095679

Mr. McCain — in back-to-back speeches delivered on the day he formally created his presidential exploratory committee — portrayed the election result as deserved punishment of Republicans for their performance in office, rather than an affirmation of the Democratic Party. Speaking to two conservative audiences still reeling from the Republicans' losses of the House and Senate, he said Republicans could recover from the election but only if they took lessons from the results.

"Hypocrisy, my friends, is the most obvious of political sins — and the people will punish it," said Mr. McCain, Republican of Arizona. "We were elected to reduce the size of government and enlarge the sphere of free and private initiative. We increased the size of government in the false hope that we could bribe the public into keeping us in office.

"We lost our principles and our majority," he said. "And there is no way to recover our majority without recovering our principles first."

The speeches were what aides described as the start of a new phase in Mr. McCain's likely try for the presidency, though he will make a formal decision on whether to run next year. The addresses, amounting to a sharp repudiation of his own party as well as an unambiguous embrace of conservative ideology, come as Republicans debate what lessons should be drawn from the defeat.

Mr. McCain, speaking here to the Federalist Society, a conservative legal group, said the outcome did not represent a rejection of "our values and governing philosophy."

"On the contrary, I think they rejected us because they felt we had come to value our incumbency over our principle," he said. "And partisanship, from both parties, was no longer a contest of ideas, but an ever cruder and uncivil brawl over the spoils of power.

"Americans had elected us to change government, and they rejected us because they believed government had changed us," he said. "We must spend the next two years reacquainting the public and ourselves with the reason we came to office in the first place: to serve a cause greater than our self-interest."

One of Mr. McCain's political tasks as he considers a presidential campaign has been to reinforce his standing with conservatives. Mr. McCain has found himself at odds with conservative leaders in opposing the call for immigration measures to prevent illegal immigrants from attaining citizenship.

In his talks, to the Federalist Society and to Gopac, a conservative political action committee, Mr. McCain addressed a subject that has distressed many conservatives about Republicans — the galloping deficit and increases in spending.

"Last year, a Republican Congress passed a highway bill with 6,371 special projects costing the taxpayers 24 billion dollars," he said at Gopac, drawing light applause. "Those and other earmarks passed by a Republican Congress included $50 million for an indoor rainforest, $500,000 for a teapot museum; $350,000 for an Inner Harmony Foundation and Wellness Center; and of course, as you all know, $223 million for a bridge to nowhere. I didn't see these projects in the fine print of the Contract with America, and neither did the voters."

But Mr. McCain also used the talks to reiterate his position on Iraq, urging Washington not to take the wrong lesson from the election, and arguing that the way to success was through increased troop strength.

"In no other time are we more morally obliged to speak the truth to our country, as we best see it, than in a time of war," he said. "So let me say this, without additional combat forces we will not win this war."

"As troubling as it is, I can ask a young marine to go back to Iraq," he said. "What I cannot do is ask him to return to Iraq, to risk life and limb, so that we might delay our defeat for a few months or a year. That is more to ask than patriotism requires."

Mr. McCain was not without humor on Thursday. "In the words of Chairman Mao," he said, "it's always darkest before it's totally black." His audience laughed.

McCain Prepares For '08 Bid With Appeal To Right (WP)

By Dan Balz

The Washington Post, November 17, 2006

Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) took the first formal steps toward a 2008 presidential campaign yesterday and used a pair of speeches before Republican audiences to argue that his brand of conservative, reform-minded politics and hawkish foreign policy can restore the GOP to power.

DOJ_NMG_0095680

On the day when he filed papers to set up a 2008 presidential exploratory committee, McCain served notice to rivals for the GOP nomination that he intends to move aggressively to put his stamp on a party that is rebuilding after losing the House and the Senate in last week's midterm elections.

The former Vietnam prisoner of war, 70, said voters punished Republicans last week for having become intoxicated with power. He urged a return to what he called the common-sense conservative principles espoused by President Ronald Reagan. "Americans had elected us to change government, and they rejected us because they believed government had changed us," he said.

McCain also defended his call for sending more troops to Iraq, a position that puts him at odds with the public and, so far, with President Bush and Army Gen. John P. Abizaid, the head of the U.S. Central Command and the overall commander of U.S. forces in Iraq. "Without additional combat forces, we will not win this war," McCain said.

McCain cited Reagan frequently as the guidepost for the future of the party. In contrast, he never mentioned Bush by name, although he was implicitly critical of the administration's conduct of the war in Iraq. By choosing two conservative audiences for his first major post-election speeches, McCain demonstrated his desire to mend relations with the right, which helped deny him the nomination in 2000.

McCain's moves yesterday were the latest evidence suggesting that the 2008 presidential campaign will accelerate to warp speed earlier than in any other period in recent history. Last week, former New York mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani formed a presidential exploratory committee, and Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack (D) filed a statement of candidacy. Vilsack said he will formally launch his campaign later this month.

Other prospective candidates are moving quickly. Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.), identified by polls as the early leader for the Democratic nomination, said publicly this week she will begin to weigh a run for the White House. Last month, Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) said for the first time that he will consider running, and has been calling into New Hampshire and casting about for possible staff members in the event that he decides to run.

Many other Democrats are close to a decision, among them the party's 2004 presidential and vice presidential nominees, Sen. John F. Kerry (Mass.) and former senator John Edwards (N.C.). The others include Sens. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (Del.), Evan Bayh (Ind.) and Christopher J. Dodd (Conn.), as well as New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson.

On the Republican side, outgoing Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney has been nearly as systematic as McCain in beginning to organize support in states -- such as Iowa, New Hampshire, South Carolina and Michigan -- that will hold early primaries or caucuses in 2008. The McCain and Romney camps have been watching one another's moves closely, but the decision by Giuliani to set up an exploratory committee has complicated the strategies of both.

Other Republicans, including former House speaker Newt Gingrich (Ga.), outgoing Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee, outgoing New York Gov. George E. Pataki and retiring Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (Tenn.) have signaled that they, too, are weighing candidacies.

All are driven to move quickly in part by the formidable fundraising requirements of the coming campaign, which advisers to several prospective candidates said will mean raising $1 million a week during the next year for the most ambitious.

The demands of the primary and caucus calendar and the relatively crowded fields in both parties have also forced nearly all prospective candidates to start building staffs and engaging in the debate over the future of their party. Many spent much of the past year laying their campaigns' foundation.

McCain advisers likened yesterday's speeches -- to the GOPAC political action committee and the Federalist Society -- to an address Reagan delivered in 1977 after the Democrats won the White House and GOP fortunes appeared to ebb.

Asked why McCain has joined the debate now, one of his top advisers, Rick Davis, said: "It didn't take a rocket scientist a month ago to say there's going to be a problem on Election Day, and we need to act quickly on that. Politics abhors a vacuum, and so do we. . . . Why not try to focus the party back on its core principles?"

McCain asserted before both conservative audiences that last week's elections were neither a setback for conservatism nor an affirmation of the Democratic Party's philosophy.

"I think they rejected us because they felt we had come to value our incumbency over our principles, and partisanship, from both parties, was no longer a contest of ideas but an even cruder and uncivil brawl over the spoils of power," he said. "I am convinced that a majority of Americans still consider themselves conservatives or right of center. They still prefer common-sense conservatism to the alternative."

McCain invoked President Theodore Roosevelt in calling on Republicans to take the lead in reforming the capital's spending and lobbying practices.

On lobbying, he said: "Let's ban all gifts from lobbyists to lawmakers and keep lobbyists off the floors of the House and Senate."

McCain said public frustration with the war contributed to the GOP's losses. "We're in one heck of a mess in Iraq," he said, "and the American people told us loud and clear last week that they are not happy with the course of this war. Neither am I. But let's be clear: That's the limit of what they told us about Iraq and the war on terrorism."

He said the United States has made "a great many mistakes in this war, and history will hold us to account for them just as the voters did last week." Defeat would be "a catastrophe," he said.

McCain has spent much of the year courting many of Bush's fundraisers and supporters and trying to reassure conservatives he is one of them, even if he has been at odds with them on some issues. He defended his participation in the bipartisan "Gang of 14" compromise in the Senate, saying that compromise helped ensure the confirmation of many of Bush's judicial nominees.

McCain Says GOP Needs To Recover 'Lost' Principles (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, November 17, 2006

Sen. John McCain yesterday said a majority of voters are still conservative and added the Republican Party must return to basic principles of limited government in order to recapture their support.

"We increased the size of government in the false hope that we could bribe the public into keeping us in office. And the people punished us," the Arizona Republican said. "We lost our principles and our majority, and there is no way to recover our majority without recovering our principles first."

He also said last week's elections, in which Republicans lost control of the House and Senate, were not an endorsement of Democratic ideas, nor of an isolationist approach to foreign policy.

He called the war in Iraq "one heck of a mess," and said voters showed they were unhappy with the way it was being fought, "but let's be clear. That's the limit of what they told us about Iraq and the war on terrorism."

"They didn't tell us to forget the sacrifices of our soldiers in Iraq and Afghanistan or to choose a course that would imperil their mission," he said.

Mr. McCain took the first step this week toward a 2008 presidential run by establishing an exploratory committee, and delivered two major speeches yesterday -- one to GOPAC, a Republican political action committee, and the other to the Federalist Society, a group of conservative lawyers.

Speaking to the Federalist Society, which has been active in the battles over President Bush's judicial nominees, Mr. McCain praised Mr. Bush's picks for federal judgeships.

He also said the standard for evaluating judges is that their decisions "must rest on more than his subjective conviction that he is right or his eagerness to address a perceived social ill."

He praised former Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist and both of Mr. Bush's picks for the Supreme Court: Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Associate Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr.

The senator said he was "proud of my role" in the "Gang of 14," the group of seven Republican senators and seven Democrats that banded together to head off a final showdown over judges on the Senate floor.

The seven Republicans agreed to oppose the "nuclear option" on judges, which Republican leaders had sought as a way to end filibusters on judicial nominees, in exchange for the seven Democrats pledging to forgo filibusters on all but the most extreme judges.

Mr. McCain said he wanted to preserve the filibuster option for future times, but also said the deal struck by the 14 senators has helped to push through some of Mr. Bush's more contentious nominees.

DOJ_NMG_0095682

"President Bush now has a higher percentage of his nominations confirmed to both the district courts and the circuit courts than did President Clinton during his presidency," the senator said.

Mr. McCain was introduced at the Federalist Society by Theodore B. Olson, the former solicitor general and a leading conservative lawyer, who gave a seven-minute testimonial to Mr. McCain's "patriotism, character and integrity."

The senator drew a standing ovation at the beginning and at the end of his remarks.

RNC Denies Offering Chairmanship To Steele (WT)

By Ralph Z. Hallow

The Washington Times, November 17, 2006

The Republican National Committee this week said it never offered Maryland Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele "a specific role" at the committee after his unsuccessful campaign for the U.S. Senate.

Many conservatives were surprised this week when, after reports that some leading Republicans favored Mr. Steele to succeed Ken Mehlman as chairman of the RNC, the White House leaked word to news agencies that President Bush would back Florida Sen. Mel Martinez for the top post at the committee.

The Washington Times reported Nov. 10 that Mr. Mehlman would not seek a second two-year term as RNC chairman in January and that Mr. Steele had been offered a Cabinet or top RNC post in recognition of his hard-fought Senate campaign that ended in defeat on Nov. 7.

The Times on Wednesday asked the White House, the RNC and Mr. Steele whether, as the paper also had reported, anyone from the administration or RNC had told Mr. Steele or any of his aides that he was not a "team player" because he had talked to The Times about the jobs in question and that those jobs could be withheld in retaliation.

RNC spokeswoman Tracy Schmidt on Wednesday declined to respond to the questions.

But an RNC official who insisted on anonymity said, "Ken Mehlman is a big fan and believer in Michael Steele, but at no point did he approach him about the specific role of RNC chairman."

Mr. Steele told The Times on Wednesday that neither White House adviser Karl Rove nor Mr. Mehlman "offered me formally" any job.

"I got calls from various state party chairmen and national committee members to take the chairman's post on Thursday and Friday of last week," Mr. Steele said. "I told them, 'This is clearly a White House decision. We'll just have to wait to see what the White House decides.' This isn't something I actively pursued. It grew up out of the grass roots."

Mr. Steele said he was "surprised after the election when I ... saw this blog about me succeeding Ken Mehlman, that I was being considered for the job."

"I said, 'Wow, I didn't know that,' " Mr. Steele said.

In any case, he said, "all this is moot now. The president has made his decision, and I am a team player."

The Times reported Tuesday that four potential 2008 Republican presidential contenders -- including Arizona Sen. John McCain and Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney -- had called Mr. Steele to urge him to take the RNC post, but only if he won an ironclad agreement to be free to run the RNC so as to further the party's interests rather than take orders from Mr. Rove.

Former Virginia Gov. James S. Gilmore III thought he had such an agreement with the White House but was ousted as Republican national chairman after a short time in office during Mr. Bush's first term because Mr. Gilmore had failed to staff the RNC with operatives from the Bush-Cheney 2000 presidential campaign.

The RNC, which meets in January, is expected to rubber-stamp the White House's choice of Mr. Martinez to become general chairman of the RNC while retaining his Senate seat. The RNC's general counsel, Mike Duncan, would handle day-to-day operations.

"I support the president's decision, and in January the party will vote on it," Mr. Steele told The Times on Wednesday. "I'm fine with Mel Martinez. I called him ... and congratulated him and offered to help in any way I can."

The choice of Mr. Martinez was widely interpreted as a signal of a renewed White House push to promote passage of its plan to offer amnesty to illegal aliens, which Mr. Martinez sponsored in the Senate, but which was blocked by conservative Republicans in the House. During his Senate race, Mr. Steele had campaigned against such an amnesty.

Mr. Steele, who would have become the first black RNC chairman, denied that he or anyone on his campaign or lieutenant governor's staff had been scolded by anyone from the White House or the committee as "not being a team player" because he had allowed himself to be interviewed by The Times. However, a senior Steele aide had confided the contrary to The Times.

Mr. Rove did not respond on the record to questions from The Times about Mr. Steele or about any discussions with him about posts at the RNC or in the Cabinet or whether he thought Mr. Steele was competent to run an agency or department in the federal government.

"We never speculate about personnel matters," White House spokeswoman Dana Perino told The Times.

Aides To DeLay Replacement Clean Files And Quit (NYT/AP)

The New York Times, November 17, 2006

HOUSTON, Nov. 16 (AP) — Representative Shelley Sekula-Gibbs, who was elected to finish the term of Tom DeLay, the former House majority leader, has asked Congress to investigate the destruction of files in her office by former staff members of Mr. DeLay.

Ms. Sekula-Gibbs, a Republican like Mr. DeLay, said the employees walked out on Tuesday, resigning en masse. The Capitol Hill newspaper Roll Call reported that they did not like the way she was treating them.

Ms. Sekula-Gibbs said Thursday, just three days after being sworn in, that seven employees in her Washington office and the district office in Stafford, Tex., outside Houston, “deleted records and files without my knowledge or permission” before quitting.

A spokeswoman, Lisa Dimond, told The Associated Press that the congresswoman had not yet gotten a response to her request for an investigation.

David James, former deputy chief of staff for Mr. DeLay, released a statement Thursday saying that the computers in the office were “scrubbed and reconfigured” according to House rules on transition between members.

“The staff members have a combined thirty-plus years of experience working on the Hill,” Mr. James wrote. “Never has any member of Congress treated us with as much disrespect and unprofessionalism as we witnessed during those five days.”

Ms. Sekula-Gibbs has raised eyebrows on Capitol Hill, largely because of the resignations. Earlier, she told reporters she planned to resolve such thorny issues as tax cuts, immigration reform and the Iraq war — all in less than two weeks of a lame-duck Congress.

DeLay Successor Seeks Inquiry Into Missing Computer Files (WP)

By Charles Babington

The Washington Post, November 17, 2006

Just when it seemed things could get no stranger regarding the House seat once held by Texas Republican Tom DeLay, his successor called for an investigation into missing computer records last night, and an aide accused her of "disrespect and unprofessionalism."

Rep. Shelley Sekula-Gibbs (R-Tex.), who is warming the 22nd District seat for only a few weeks, said that former DeLay employees apparently deleted the office's computer files shortly before they walked out, en masse, on Tuesday.

The records dated from her assumption of the office Nov. 8 and did not involve matters related to the former majority leader, Sekula-Gibbs said in an interview in her unadorned office in the Cannon Building. Those who erased the records, she said in a statement, "have harmed the 22nd congressional district" and "brought shame to this office." She has asked for an investigation.

David James, DeLay's former chief of staff, who stayed to work for Sekula-Gibbs -- until Tuesday's walkout -- said last night that the office computers "were scrubbed and reconfigured by an outside vendor in the days immediately prior to her assuming office," as House policies require. The new congresswoman was given a copy of everything "electronically or in hard copy, or both," James said in a statement.

DeLay, facing indictment in Texas, resigned from his House seat in June, triggering two elections on Nov. 7 in his Houston area district. The first, won by Sekula-Gibbs, was a special election to complete his term in the 109th Congress, which will adjourn next month. The other, won by Democrat Nick Lampson, is for the full two-year term of the 110th Congress, which convenes in January.

Sekula-Gibbs, a dermatologist, arrived for Congress's lame-duck session with ambitions for funding a fence along the Mexican border, making a number of tax cuts permanent and achieving other goals that may or may not be possible in the handful of appropriations bills on Congress's plate.

She also invited President Bush and Vice President Cheney to her swearing-in, prompting titters among some GOP staffers. Yesterday she said the invitations were a courtesy and "it's absurd to think that I thought they would come."

James and half a dozen other former DeLay staffers were on board to help Sekula-Gibbs finish the 109th Congress's business. But they abruptly left their posts Tuesday, during her open house celebration. Sekula-Gibbs said she has no idea why they left. But James said in his statement: "Never has any member of Congress treated us with as much disrespect and unprofessionalism as we witnessed during those five days."

Earlier in the day, James had briefly returned to the office to turn in his House identification badge, a key and his laptop computer, along with a sergeant-at-arms receipt acknowledging their return. Sekula-Gibbs was out of the office, and James quickly left.

GOP Can't Lose Latinos (LAT)

By Tamar Jacoby

The Los Angeles Times, November 17, 2006

ACROSS THE NATION, Republicans are asking what they did wrong in the 2006 midterms. This is a question with many answers. But few missteps were more foolish — and few will be harder to correct — than those made with Latino voters. The appointment this week of Cuban-born Sen. Mel Martinez of Florida to chair the Republican National Committee is a good way to make a new start. But the damage done in the last year goes deeper than symbolism, and it will take more than one appointment to undo it.

Republicans have, of course, long been divided about Latinos — split between those who "get it" and those who don't. President Bush was the most prominent Republican who got it, though he was hardly alone. Arnold Schwarzenegger, Rudy Giuliani, George Pataki and others have long understood the GOP's inherent appeal for the fastest-growing voting bloc in the country. In a national poll last month, 34% of Latinos called themselves conservative, 29% moderate and only 24% liberal.

Diverse as they can be in origin and outlook, on many issues — abortion, homosexuality, education, homeownership, small-business concerns and Iraq — Latinos tend to line up with Republicans. And though Democrats have been wooing these voters longer and have won the lifetime loyalties of many in the second and third generations, immigrants have been up for grabs — and for more than 10 years now Republicans have been making a hard run at them.

That effort was working pretty well. Between 1996 and 2004, Bush and Karl Rove managed to double the percentage of Latinos voting Republican in presidential elections: up from 21% for Bob Dole to a whopping 44% for Bush two years ago. Other Republicans across the country were making similar inroads. In 2004, Bush advisor Matthew Dowd said that in the years ahead, the GOP would have to keep its share above 40% if it wanted to remain the majority party.

But that scenario failed to account for the Republicans who didn't get it — and in the last year or so these naysayers have destroyed everything Bush built. Republican hard-liners in the House refused to enact the president's immigration reform. They passed a bill making felons of illegal immigrants, not because it was good law but merely to make a political point. They spent recent months demagoguing the immigration issue, first at a series of "field hearings" in their districts and then on the campaign trail, casting newcomers as terrorists and criminals and anyone who seemed to side with them as un-American.

The problem was as much about tone as substance — many Latinos are also worried about illegal immigration. But the hard-liners' grandstanding added up, and there was no mistaking the message: Not only illegal immigrants but 30 million Latino voters heard Republicans saying, "We don't like you." The results were hardly surprising. Last week, Latinos voted 70% to 29% in favor of Democrats. And it could be argued that this shift is what decided the election. According to exit polls, white voters were split more or less evenly between the two parties, with Latinos, Asians and blacks making the difference on election night.

The question is what happens now. Does the wing of the GOP that made the mistake see it? Conservative bloggers are urging Republicans in exactly the wrong direction, arguing against all evidence that the midterms were a vote against immigration and that any compromise with Democrats on this issue would be a betrayal of the party. But even if the GOP ignores this bad advice, the party has plenty of damage to repair.

The issue isn't just immigration but the way the hard-liners' stance has been so offensive, even to Latinos who agree with them about the need for a secure border. It's about whether you see Latinos as "us" or "them." It's about what kinds of innuendo you use in making your case. It's about whether or not you're imagining a shared future, and how constructively you're planning for it. Republican naysayers fail on all counts. Latinos sense it. And as a consequence, most can no longer hear the GOP even on issues on which they agree with the party.

Even without further immigration, Latino political muscle is expected to explode in coming years as newcomers become citizens and their children come of age. Already in 2008, four of the most heavily Latino states — Florida, New Mexico, Arizona and Nevada — are expected to be critical battlegrounds. And what Latino voters ultimately need — what would serve them and serve the nation — is competition between the two parties to make policy that helps them succeed as Americans: economic policy, education policy, assimilation policy and policy to ensure opportunity. But that competition can't even take place — Latinos can't be expected to give the Republican case a hearing — until the party digs itself out of the hole it has dug itself into.

Immigration is the place to start undoing the damage. But it's going to be a long, uphill walk.

Michael Moore's Pledge (LAT)

By Michael Moore

The Los Angeles Times, November 17, 2006

I WOULD LIKE TO extend an olive branch. Those of you who consider yourselves conservative and usually vote Republican have not had a very good couple of weeks. Trust me, I know how this feels.

In fact, those of us on the other side of the fence don't really know what it's like to win, so if we seem a bit awkward right now (were we supposed to vote for the majority leader the speaker said to vote for, or stick to our promise to the other guy?), forgive us.

I know you are dismayed at the results of last week's election. You've got to be freaking out about what this bunch of tree-hugging, latte-sipping, men-kissing-men advocates will do now that the country is in our hands. I don't blame you. We'd never admit it, but we secretly admire you because you know how to chop down a tree, take your coffee black and enjoy watching women kissing women. Good on you!

What I don't want is for you to drop into the deep funk we liberals have been in for two-plus decades. Yes, your Republican revolution is over, but hang in there. And do not despair. I, and the millions who voted for Democrats, have no interest in revenge for the last 12 years. In fact, let me make 12 promises as to how we will treat you, the minority, in the coming years.

Thus, here is "A Liberal's Pledge to Disheartened Conservatives":

1) We will always respect you. We will never, ever, call you "unpatriotic" simply because you disagree with us. In fact, we encourage you to dissent and disagree with us.

2) We will let you marry whomever you want (even though some among us consider your Republican behavior to be "different" or "immoral"). Who you marry is none of our business. Love, and be in love — it's a wonderful gift.

3) We will not spend your grandchildren's money on our personal whims or to enrich our friends. It's your checkbook too, and we will balance it for you.

4) When we soon bring our sons and daughters home from Iraq, we will bring your sons and daughters home too. We promise never to send your kids off to war based on some amateur Power Point presentation cooked up by men who have never been to war.

5) When we make America the last Western democracy to have universal health coverage, and all Americans are able to get help when they fall ill, we promise that you too will be able to see a doctor, regardless of your ability to pay. And when stem cell research delivers treatments and cures for diseases that afflict you and your loved ones, we'll make sure those advances are available to you and your family too.

6) When we clean up our air and water, you too will be able to breathe the cleaner air and drink the purer water. When we put an end to global warming, you will no longer have to think about buying oceanfront property in Yuma.

7) Should a mass murderer ever kill 3,000 people on our soil, we will devote every single resource to tracking him down and bringing him to justice. Immediately. We will protect you.

8) We will never stick our nose in your bedroom or your womb. What you do there as consenting adults is your business. We will continue to count your age from the moment you were born, not the moment you were conceived.

9) We will not take away your hunting guns. If you need an automatic weapon or a handgun to kill a bird or a deer, then you really aren't much of a hunter and you should, perhaps, take up another sport. In the meantime, we will arm the deer to make it a fairer fight.

10) When we raise the minimum wage, we will raise it for your employees too. They will use that money to buy more things, which means you will get the money back! And when women are finally paid what men make, we will pay conservative women that wage too.

11) We will respect your religious beliefs, even when you don't practice those beliefs. In fact, we will actively seek to promote your most radical religious beliefs ("Blessed are the peacemakers," "Love your enemies," "It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter the kingdom of God" and "Whatever you did for one of the least of these brothers of mine, you did for me"). We will let people in other countries know that God doesn't just bless America, he blesses everyone. We will discourage religious intolerance and fanaticism — starting here at home.

12) We will not tolerate politicians who are corrupt and break the law. And we promise you we will go after the corrupt politicians on our side first. If we fail to do this, we need you to call us on it. Simply because we are in power does not give us the right to turn our heads the other way when our party goes astray. Please perform this important duty as the loyal opposition.

I promise all of the above to you because this is your country too. You are every bit as American as we are. We are all in this together. We sink or swim as one. Thank you for your years of service to this country and for giving us the opportunity to see if we can make things a bit better for our 300 million fellow Americans — and for the rest of the world.

Now pull yourself together and let's go have a Frappuccino.

Justice Recalls Treats Laced With Poison (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, November 17, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 16 — A discussion of recent threats to judges' safety, at a bar association conference in suburban Dallas last week, became startlingly specific when Sandra Day O'Connor, the retired Supreme Court justice, recounted that each justice had received in the mail "a wonderful package of home-baked cookies" that contained "enough poison to kill the entire membership of the court."

Justice O'Connor's remarks were reported on Thursday in The Star-Telegram in Fort Worth.

Although the episode was not publicly disclosed when it occurred in April 2005, it had a public, although little-noticed, denouement last month when the sender of the poisoned cookies was sentenced in federal court here to 15 years in prison.

The sender, Barbara Joan March of Bridgeport, Conn., pleaded guilty to 14 counts of "mailing injurious articles." The 14 recipients included the nine justices; the chiefs of staff of the Army, Navy, and Air Force; and the director and deputy director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation. The packages, containing either candy or baked goods, were laced with rat poison.

All mail received at the Supreme Court is screened, and the tainted packages never reached the justices, said Kathleen Arberg, the court's public information officer. The danger posed by the packages was immediately apparent. Each contained a typewritten letter stating either, "I am going to kill you," or, "We are going to kill you," and adding, "This is poisoned."

The letters carried various return addresses of people who had earlier connections with Ms. March, including seven who attended college with her. The F.B.I. determined that Ms. March wrote and sent the letters, typing a number of them on a typewriter at a public library near her home.

Preaching The Gospel Of Small Government (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0095687

BOWLING GREEN, Ky. — Lawrence W. Reed is one of those people with so much passion for an unusual line of work that he invented a new occupation, and it has helped shape the conservative movement from here to the Himalayas.

Mr. Reed runs a conservative think tank school. Twice a year, ideological allies from across the globe travel to his program at the Mackinac Center for Public Policy in Midland, Mich., to study the tricks of the idea-peddling trade. Policy institutes have been central to a national organizing strategy that has long won the right a reputation for savvy, and state-level versions are growing in number and clout.

Pushing causes like lower taxes, less spending and school choice plans, they have offered conservatives a base of influence independent of electoral politics. Indeed, after the Republican losses in the midterm elections, many conservatives said this carefully tended world — of research organizations, single-interest groups, foundations and publications — was vital to the movement's revival.

Mr. Reed has nurtured so many state policy groups that he has been called the movement's Johnny Appleseed. But a competing metaphor is sometimes invoked, that of a restaurant chain. His school is part of an extensive system of support, a national back office of sorts, that allows even policy novices to produce abundant, salable fare.

Consider the experience here in Kentucky, where the Bluegrass Institute for Public Policy Solutions has made enough noise for the state's largest newspaper to call it a "conservative propaganda mill." Its founder, Christopher J. Derry, was a sales executive with no public-policy background when he attended Mr. Reed's school three years ago. He left with access to everything from off-the-shelf speeches and papers to management software.

"This is like a franchise," Mr. Derry said. "I saw that I could recreate what the other state groups are doing."

No one is more central to this replicating effort than Mr. Reed, who combines libertarian ardor with a demeanor so earnest it approaches guilelessness. He said he first felt called to "the liberty movement" as a 12-year-old watching the "The Sound of Music," and was a high school sophomore when he burned his first Soviet flag.

He attributes the Republican losses in last week's election to party's failure to cling to its small-government philosophy and argues the drift shows the need for groups like his. "This underscores the importance of investing in ideas first and foremost, because politicians will almost always disappoint," Mr. Reed said.

From Michigan to Mongolia

As a full-throated advocate of capitalism — the jagged, creative-destructive kind — Mr. Reed says he is used to being called a corporate apologist who would despoil the environment and afflict the poor. But he sees himself as a defender of free markets and free men, claiming among his major role models Thomas Clarkson, a 19th-century British abolitionist whom Mr. Reed regards as the world's first think-tank entrepreneur. "Clarkson championed our movement's overarching principle: If there's anything certain in human affairs, it's that liberty will prevail," he said.

From Midland, Mr. Reed runs Mackinac (pronounced MAK-in-aw), the largest of the right's state-level policy institutes. The center started its training program eight years ago, and it has alumni in nearly every state and 37 countries, from Uruguay to Nepal. Among them was a Mongolian who went on to become prime minister, putting his free-market training to work by privatizing the national herd of yaks.

When the Mackinac Center was founded in 1987, there were just three other conservative state-level policy institutes. Now there are 48, in 42 states, joined in an association called the State Policy Network. At least three former Mackinac presidents are now in the House, Representatives Mike Pence of Indiana, Jeff Flake of Arizona, and Tom Tancredo of Colorado, all Republicans.

Collectively, the groups have pushed for cuts in health and welfare programs, constitutional limits on state spending, and expanded school choice programs. They have opposed what they call burdensome health, safety, and environmental regulations and increases in the minimum wage.

In labeling the institutes (and himself), Mr. Reed prefers the term "free market" over "conservative," since most of the groups stress economics over social issues.

In Colorado, the Independence Institute has been a leading force behind a constitutional spending cap called the Taxpayer Bill of Rights. In Arizona, the Goldwater Institute has championed a school-choice law that sends 22,500 children a year to private schools. The Texas Public Policy Foundation helped pass a law to end what the group said were excessive lawsuits.

"In terms of generating and popularizing ideas, I think they've been very effective," said Carl Helstrom, executive director of the JM Foundation, one of the movement's major donors.

Some critics say the groups' support for unfettered markets promotes a form of social Darwinism.

"Their philosophy encourages selfishness and greed," said Iris J. Lav, who runs the State Fiscal Analysis Initiative, a network of 29 liberal state-level groups organized in part as a countervailing force. "If you have problems, they don't care — just too bad."

Greed is the rare accusation that rankles Mr. Reed.

"They think if you're pushing free markets there must be something in it for you," he said. "It speaks to their ignorance."

Mr. Reed was raised in western Pennsylvania, where his father ran a plumbing-supply store and both parents ignored politics. The persecution of the von Trapp family in "The Sound of Music" grabbed his attention; the Soviet invasion of Czechoslovakia, in 1968, sent him running to his first protest. He was 14.

Academia to Politics

After earning a master's degree at Slippery Rock University of Pennsylvania, he taught economics at Northwood University in Midland, but academia left him restless. In 1982, Mr. Reed, then 29, unsuccessfully ran for Congress and got to know an ambitious state senator named John Engler.

Both were Republicans who thought Michigan needed its own version of the Heritage Foundation, a Washington policy institute that was influencing the Reagan presidency. A few years later, when such a group formed, Mr. Engler helped recruit Mr. Reed to run it.

With $20,000 in seed money, the Mackinac Center was started in 1987 as a bare-bones affair, but quickly proved troublesome to Gov. James J. Blanchard, a Democrat. The Mackinac Center warned that one of Mr. Blanchard's signature programs, the nation's first prepaid college tuition plan, would need a state bailout. Amid fears about its financial health, the program soon suspended enrollment.

After Mr. Engler unseated Mr. Blanchard in 1990, Mackinac had a friend at the top. Acting on the center's advice, Mr. Engler sold a state-owned insurance company for $250 million. But when Mr. Engler created tax breaks to lure businesses to Michigan, Mr. Reed, clinging to his free-market views, attacked them as "corporate welfare."

The Mackinac Center has often battled the Michigan Education Association, a teachers' union. When the union opposed privatizing support services, like school meals and security, a Mackinac employee monitored the union parking lot and discovered that it used private contractors like the ones it was opposing.

"We don't just write papers, we do stakeouts," Mr. Reed said.

Many of the state-level groups were inspired by larger Washington counterparts, like the Cato Institute and the Heritage Foundation. While there are no formal ties, many informal bonds have been formed through overlapping donors, revolving employees and occasional joint projects.

A key supporter of the state-level movement was Thomas A. Roe, a South Carolina industrialist and Heritage Foundation donor who founded the South Carolina Policy Council, and helped finance the other state-level groups. Mr. Roe died in 2000, but the Roe Foundation gives each of the 48 groups annual grants of $15,000 to $30,000.

With a budget of more than $4 million and a staff of 32, the Mackinac Center is more than five times larger than the average state-level institute, some of which consist of little more than a person and a fax machine. Most groups do not disclose donations they receive.

A Culture of Mutual Aid

To maximize the groups' clout, Mr. Roe encouraged them to share their work, and a culture of mutual aid has taken hold. "There's a joke that you don't have to reinvent the wheel, you can steal somebody else's wheel and use it," said Mr. Helstrom, the JM Foundation executive.

DOJ_NMG_0095689

Mr. Derry of the Bluegrass Institute has taken that advice to heart. He was working at an asset management firm in 2003 when a Bowling Green tax increase got under his skin. A few months later, he was sitting in Mr. Reed's school, wondering whether to quit his $400,000 job to start a shoestring policy group.

"You're going to have to decide what's more important," Mr. Reed said as the course wound down. "Making a lot of money or championing liberty."

"I was hooked," Mr. Derry said.

He said part of the appeal was the network of groups ready to help. Three conservative foundations offered grants totaling $80,000, but most of what Mr. Derry calls "franchise" help came in other ways.

Mr. Reed has a standard speech he calls the "Seven Principles of Sound Public Policy." Mr. Derry added the words "for Kentucky" and took it on the fund-raising trail. The Evergreen Freedom Foundation, in Olympia, Wash., is known for its guide to paring state budgets. Mr. Derry distributed it under the Bluegrass name. A Maryland paper on excessive lawsuits, republished in North Carolina, gained a third life as "Preparing for Tort Reform in Kentucky."

"People were so helpful, I couldn't believe it," Mr. Derry said. "It jump-started me by a couple of years."

The Bluegrass Institute quickly made a mark by fighting with the state's governor, Ernie Fletcher, a Republican, over a tax plan he called revenue-neutral and Mr. Derry called a tax increase. To make a point about pork-barrel spending, his group sent an intern into the Capitol dressed like a pig.

Depending on one's perspective, the Bluegrass Institute view of liberty can seem either steadfast or extreme. Walking to his car after a recent event, Jim Waters, the policy director at the institute, mentioned how he had recently survived a head-on collision thanks to his car's airbags. A few moments later, describing the institute's priorities, he said the Bluegrass Institute was fighting tougher seat-belt laws, which he called an intrusion on liberty. Car safety laws "did save my life," he conceded when asked about the apparent contradiction.

At an institute event in Bowling Green, an audience member chided the group for opposing efforts to ban smoking in restaurants. "I watched my mother die of cancer," the person said.

"We hate smoking as much as you do," Mr. Derry replied. "But we hate government even more."

The Bluegrass Institute has a budget of about $400,000, but recently laid off a policy analyst, leaving a staff of five. Still, even critics say the group has leveraged modest resources into a growing presence.

"They get airplay," said Susan Weston, a longtime advocate for Kentucky public schools. "They get their op-eds published. They've built an e-mail list."

True to his promise of continuing help, Mr. Reed made a two-day visit to Kentucky last year. Speaking to potential donors in Louisville, he likened Mr. Derry to Benjamin Franklin.

After the event, Mr. Derry marveled once more at all the support he had received.

Mr. Reed said, "You're our comrade in arms."

Mr. Derry, replied, "It's about liberty."

Mr. Reed said, "This is a missionary movement."

How Milton Friedman Changed Economics, Policy And Markets (WSJ)

By Greg Ip And Mark Whitehouse

The Wall Street Journal, November 17, 2006

A half century ago, Milton Friedman's advocacy of free markets over government intervention and his prescription for inflation-fighting by central banks were treated as fringe notions by many economists. By the time the Nobel Prize-winning economist died yesterday at the age of 94, his views had helped to reshape modern capitalism.

A diminutive man known for his strong-willed and combative style, Mr. Friedman provided the intellectual foundations for the anti-inflation, tax-cutting and antigovernment policies of President Ronald Reagan and British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher and an era of more-disciplined central banking. His ideas helped to end the military draft in the 1970s, gave birth to staple conservative causes such as school vouchers and created the groundwork for new economic views about the Great Depression, unemployment, inflation and exchange rates.

Many of his ideas remain controversial to this day, or carry less weight. Central bankers don't follow his prescriptions for how to implement monetary policy, considering them impractical. And despite his strong advocacy, publicly funded vouchers for students to attend private schools are still rare and researchers struggle to prove their effectiveness. His advocacy of the decriminalization of drugs hasn't been heeded.

But few would argue against the notion that Mr. Friedman -- with highly technical academic papers, popular books and columns, and the ear of powerful politicians -- helped to shift the center of debate in the U.S. and abroad about the proper role of government in managing a nation's economy. His influence spread far afield, from Hong Kong to Chile to Russia and Eastern Europe, and his ideas took root with reformers pushing for privatization and open markets.

"Among economic scholars, Milton Friedman had no peer," Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke said yesterday. "The direct and indirect influences of his thinking on contemporary monetary economics would be difficult to overstate. Just as important, in his humane and engaging way, Milton conveyed to millions an understanding of the economic benefits of free, competitive markets, as well as the close connection that economic freedoms bear to other types of liberty."

President Bush said, "His work demonstrated that free markets are the great engines of economic development."

Critics said he inspired policies that put millions of people out of work in pursuit of low inflation and demonized almost everything the government did, no matter how beneficial or democratically chosen. "Milton Friedman didn't make a distinction between the big government of the People's Republic of China and the big government of the United States," said James Galbraith, professor of government at the University of Texas and son of the late, liberal economist John Kenneth Galbraith, who often sparred with Mr. Friedman.

"Most Americans have no idea what the science of economics is about. Milton Friedman made economic thought more accessible to more people, and he did it in a simple, straight-forward way that avoided politics and cut to the heart of free market capitalism."

Share your thoughts2 about Mr. Friedman's contributions to American society.

Mr. Friedman, who died of heart failure at home, is survived by his wife, Rose -- whom he met in graduate school and who co-authored many of his books -- his son and daughter.

Mr. Friedman exercised extraordinary influence through his academic work, which is viewed as among the most authoritative in the economics field in the 20th century. He went beyond the role of academic by advising politicians such as Mr. Reagan and Ms. Thatcher and by writing popular books, such as "Capitalism and Freedom" in 1962 and, with his wife, "Free to Choose" in 1979. The latter book was adapted as a television series.

Mr. Friedman was awarded the Nobel Prize for Economic Science in 1976. He was best known for explaining the role of money supply in economic and inflation fluctuations. By managing the amount of money sloshing through a financial system, Mr. Friedman theorized, central banks could control inflation without making costly mistakes.

As with many of his ideas, his prescriptions weren't immediately accepted by central bankers when he advanced them in the 1950s and 1960s. Many economists believed inflation could arise from other factors, such as the influence of unions, corporations or oil-producing countries.

These views were advanced by Mr. Friedman's early mentor and friend, Arthur Burns, Federal Reserve chairman from 1970 to 1978. Mr. Friedman was harshly critical of Mr. Burns's monetary policy, and as inflation rose and unemployment took hold, his own views grew in prominence. By the time he won his Nobel, the unemployment rate had climbed to more than 7% and was on its way to surpassing 10%. The inflation rate, too, had flirted with double-digit levels.

Along with economist Edmund Phelps, this year's Nobel Prize winner, Mr. Friedman in the 1960s also developed the theory that policy makers couldn't maintain low unemployment by permitting higher inflation. The view holds sway at major central banks today, including the Fed, and helped to defeat the inflation of the 1970s and set the stage for the low inflation and low unemployment of the 1990s and today.

It took Paul Volcker, who became Fed chairman in 1979, to put the monetarist theory into practice, adopting money-supply targets that drove interest rates to double digit levels, sent the economy into a deep recession, and ultimately brought inflation down drastically. But unemployment eventually fell as well, proving that Mr. Friedman and Mr. Phelps were right about the absence of a rigid tradeoff between unemployment and inflation.

DOJ_NMG_0095691

"That was a victory among many victories," Mr. Phelps said.

While central bankers still accept that inflation is largely a result of money-supply growth, few target the money supply in practice because it is difficult to measure and its relationship to overall spending often shifts.

The Fed stopped setting target ranges for monetary-supply growth in 2000 and has stopped publishing some long-followed data series on money growth. Still, Mr. Bernanke noted in 2003 at a conference on the legacy of Milton and Rose Friedman that the professor's ideas held enormous sway in the field.

"Friedman's monetary framework has been so influential that, in its broad outlines at least, it has nearly become identical with modern monetary theory and practice," Mr. Bernanke said.

His intellectual rigor was matched by a demanding persona. When Mr. Friedman returned reporters' calls, for example, he often called collect. He was also tough on students. Gary Becker, one former student, remembers Mr. Friedman ripped into his dissertation proposal in the early 1950s. Mr. Becker, a University of Chicago professor, went on to win the Nobel himself.

Ultimately, even ideological opponents changed their views about him. "He was the devil figure in my youth," Lawrence Summers, the former Treasury Secretary and nephew of two left-leaning Nobel winners, is quoted saying about Mr. Friedman in the book "Commanding Heights." "Only with time have I come to have large amounts of grudging respect. And with time, increasingly ungrudging respect."

Mr. Friedman was born in Brooklyn, N.Y., in 1912, the fourth child of European immigrants. His mother ran a small retail store and his father "engaged in a succession of mostly unsuccessful 'jobbing' ventures," he wrote in an autobiography on the Web site for the Nobel Prize. "The family income was small and highly uncertain; financial crisis was a constant companion."

Early in his life, he planned to become an actuary. But he emerged after World War II as a strong-viewed young professor at the University of Chicago. At the time, economic thought was dominated by the theories of John Maynard Keynes, who advocated activist government spending to stimulate demand and fix the economy during troubled times, such as the Great Depression of the 1930s. (When asked in 2004 by The Wall Street Journal to name the most important economist of the 20th century besides himself, Mr. Friedman named Mr. Keynes. Read the full Q&A3.)

Mr. Friedman, who had started his studies at Chicago during the Depression, challenged the Keynesian approach, espousing the idea that the government should stay out of individuals' affairs whenever possible, and that markets can solve economic problems much more efficiently than government officials can. His ideas formed the basis for what become known as the "Chicago School" of economics, a concept of free-market capitalism.

Influenced by such earlier free-market thinkers as Friedrich von Hayek, Mr. Friedman -- some of whose relatives died during the Nazi occupation of Eastern Europe -- saw economic and political freedom as inextricably linked. As he wrote in the 1962 text "Capitalism and Freedom," "a society which is socialist cannot be democratic, in the sense of guaranteeing individual freedom."

"No one in the 20th century has had the ideological influence that Milton Friedman has had in moving the economic profession from Great Depression-era do-goodism towards a friendliness toward, and appreciation of, the free market," said Paul Samuelson, a fellow Nobel laureate and frequent ideological opponent of Mr. Friedman. "We've lost a giant in economics."

Mr. Friedman's ideas weren't all laissez-faire. His concept of a "negative income tax" to eliminate poverty, for example, laid the foundation for today's Earned Income Tax Credit.

Mr. Friedman considered his best purely scientific contribution to economics to be his work on how people make spending decisions -- which was based on data he collected while working with future Nobel laureate Simon Kuznets at the National Bureau of Economic Research. Under his "permanent income" theory, people smooth their spending based on what they expect their incomes to be in the long term -- meaning that things such as unexpected tax breaks or other windfalls will have only a limited effect on spending.

He also attacked the system of fixed currency-exchange rates that emerged after World War II with encouragement from Mr. Keynes. George Shultz, a longtime friend of Mr. Friedman who served in both the Nixon and Reagan administrations, says that after Mr. Nixon was elected in 1968 but before he took office, Mr. Friedman wrote to him saying that "pressures on the tie of the dollar to gold are relentless" and that Mr. Nixon would be wise to sever the link immediately as an affirmative action, rather than be forced to. Mr. Friedman "turned out to be right," but Nixon didn't listen "until he was forced to," Mr. Schultz says.

Mr. Nixon abandoned the gold standard in 1971.

By the 1970s, his influence had become substantial. He was a member of the Commission on an All-Volunteer Armed Force, appointed by Mr. Nixon in 1969. Former Fed Chairman Alan Greenspan, who was also a member, says that at the outset, panel Chairman Thomas Gates "was very clearly unconvinced that a volunteer army would work. At the end of the commission hearings he was strongly in favor of it, and the main reason was Friedman kept dissuading him on all the concerns he had." Mr. Nixon ended the draft in 1973.

In the 1970s, Mr. Friedman courted controversy for his association with Chile's military government which, after toppling a civilian government in 1973, implemented many free-market and monetarist ideas learned by its advisers who had studied at the University of Chicago. He was widely criticized for meeting with Chilean dictator Augusto Pinochet, whose government was eventually blamed for murdering and torturing thousands. Mr. Friedman's Nobel Prize ceremony was disrupted by demonstrators.

That same year Mr. Reagan, who had just made an unsuccessful bid for the presidency, noted the demonstrations in a radio address and said, "It seems when Milton Friedman talked, someone in Chile listened. Wouldn't it be nice if just once someone in Washington would ask: 'What did he say?'" In another address, he quoted Mr. Friedman, saying, "When you start paying people to be poor, you wind up with an awful lot of poor people."

One of the paradoxes of Mr. Friedman's immense influence on policy was his low regard for policy making. He often advocated abolition of the Fed for its failures during the Great Depression and the 1970s, though he later relented and admitted Mr. Greenspan had done a remarkable job from 1987-2006. After two years in the Treasury Department during World War II, he never served in government, aside from advisory roles.

Lawrence Lindsey, who served in both Bush presidencies and on the Fed board, recalls telling Mr. Friedman in the early 1990s, "Why don't you come to Washington, we could use you here." Mr. Friedman replied, "I detest that town."

Mr. Friedman once described his refusal to leave academia as necessary to his larger mission: "For society to be at once humane and to give opportunity for great human achievements, it is necessary that a small minority of people who do not have materialistic objectives have the greatest degree of freedom."

Milton Friedman, Free-Market Theorist, Dies At 94 (NYT)

By Holcomb B. Noble

The New York Times, November 17, 2006

Milton Friedman, the grandmaster of free-market economic theory in the postwar era and a prime force in the movement of nations toward less government and greater reliance on individual responsibility, died yesterday. He was 94 and lived in San Francisco.

His death was confirmed by Robert Fanger, a spokesman for the Milton and Rose D. Friedman Foundation in Indianapolis.

Conservative and liberal colleagues alike viewed Mr. Friedman, a Nobel laureate, as one of the 20th century's leading economic scholars, on a par with giants like John Maynard Keynes and Paul Samuelson.

Flying the flag of economic conservatism, Mr. Friedman led the postwar challenge to the hallowed theories of Lord Keynes, the British economist who maintained that governments had a duty to help capitalistic economies through periods of recession and to prevent boom times from exploding into high inflation.

In Mr. Friedman's view, government had the opposite obligation: to keep its hands off the economy, to let the free market do its work. He was a spiritual heir to Adam Smith, the 18th-century founder of the science of economics and proponent of laissez-faire: that government governs best which governs least.

The only economic lever that Mr. Friedman would allow government to use was the one that controlled the supply of money — a monetarist view that had gone out of favor when he embraced it in the 1950s. He went on to record a signal achievement, predicting the unprecedented combination of rising unemployment and rising inflation that came to be called stagflation. His work earned him the Nobel Memorial Prize in Economic Science in 1976.

Rarely, colleagues said, did anyone have such impact on his own profession and on government. Though he never served officially in the halls of power, he was around them, as an adviser and theorist.

"Among economic scholars, Milton Friedman had no peer," Ben S. Bernanke, the Federal Reserve chairman, said yesterday. "The direct and indirect influences of his thinking on contemporary monetary economics would be difficult to overstate."

Professor Friedman also fueled the rise of the Chicago School of economics, a conservative group within the department of economics at the University of Chicago. He and his colleagues became a counterforce to their liberal peers at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology and Harvard, influencing close to a dozen American winners of the Nobel in economics.

It was not only Mr. Friedman's antistatist and free-market views that held sway over his colleagues. There was also his willingness to create a place where independent thinkers could be encouraged to take unconventional stands as long as they were prepared to do battle to support them.

"Most economics departments are like country clubs," said James J. Heckman, a Chicago faculty member and Nobel laureate. "But at Chicago you are only as good as your last paper."

Alan Greenspan, the former Federal Reserve chairman, said of Mr. Friedman in an interview Tuesday: "From a longer-term point of view, it's his academic achievements which will have lasting import. But I would not dismiss the profound impact he has already had on the American public's view."

To Mr. Greenspan, Mr. Friedman came along at an opportune time. The Keynesian consensus among economists, he said — one that had worked well from the 1930s — could not explain the stagflation of the 1970s.

But he also said that Mr. Friedman had made a broader political argument: that you have to have economic freedom to have political freedom.

Mr. Friedman had a gift for communicating complicated ideas in simple and lucid ways, and it served him well as the author or co-author of more than a dozen books, as a columnist for Newsweek from 1966 to 1983 and even as the star of a public television series. He was a bridge between the academic and popular worlds, and his broader impact stemmed in large part from the fact that he was preaching a gospel of capitalism that fit neatly into American self-perceptions. He was pushing on an open door.

A Staunch Libertarian

As a libertarian, Mr. Friedman advocated legalizing drugs and generally opposed public education and the state's power to license doctors, car drivers and others. He was criticized for those views, but he stood by them, arguing that prohibiting, regulating or licensing human behavior either does not work or creates inefficient bureaucracies.

Mr. Friedman insisted that unimpeded private competition produced better results than government systems. "Try talking French with someone who studied it in public school," he argued, "then with a Berlitz graduate."

Once, when accused of going overboard in his antistatism, he said, "In every generation, there's got to be somebody who goes the whole way, and that's why I believe as I do."

In the long period of prosperity after World War II, when Keynesian economics was riding high in the West, Mr. Friedman alone warned of trouble ahead, asserting that policies based on Keynesian theory were part of the problem.

Even as he was being dismissed as an economic "flat-earther," he predicted in the 1960s that the end of the boom was at hand. Expect unemployment to grow, he said, and inflation to rise, at the same time. The prediction was borne out in the 1970s. It was Paul Samuelson who labeled the phenomenon stagflation.

Mr. Friedman's analysis and prediction were regarded as a stunning intellectual accomplishment and contributed to his earning the Nobel for his monetary theories. He was also cited for his analyses of consumer savings and of the causes of the Great Depression: he blamed the Federal Reserve, accusing it of bad monetary policy and saying it had bungled early chances for recovery. His prestige and that of the Chicago school soared, and his analysis of the Depression changed the way that the Fed thought about monetary policy.

Government leaders like President Ronald Reagan and Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher of Britain were heavily influenced by his views. So was the quietly building opposition to communism within the East bloc.

As the end of the century approached, Professor Friedman said events had made his views seem only more valid than when he had first formed them. One event was the fall of communism. In an introduction to the 50th-anniversary edition of Friedrich A. Hayek's book predicting totalitarian consequences from collectivist planning, "The Road to Serfdom," Mr. Friedman wrote it was clear that "progress could be achieved only in an order in which government activity is limited primarily to establishing the framework with which individuals are free to pursue their own objectives."

"The free market is the only mechanism that has ever been discovered for achieving participatory democracy," he said.

Professor Friedman was acknowledged to be a brilliant statistician and logician. To his critics, however, he sometimes pushed his data too far. To them, the debate over the advantages or disadvantages of an unregulated free market was far from over.

Milton Friedman was born in Brooklyn on July 31, 1912, the last of four children and only son of Jeno S. Friedman and Sarah Landau Friedman. His parents worked briefly in New York sweatshops, then moved their family to Rahway, N.J., where they opened a clothing store.

Mr. Friedman's father died in his son's senior year at Rahway High School. Young Milton later waited on tables and clerked in stores to supplement a scholarship he had earned at Rutgers University. He entered Rutgers in 1929, the year the stock market crashed and the Depression began.

Mr. Friedman attributed his success to "accidents": the immigration of his teen-age parents from Czechoslovakia, enabling him to be an American and not the citizen of a Soviet-bloc state; the skill of a high-school geometry teacher who showed him a connection between Keats's "Ode to a Grecian Urn" and the Pythagorean theorem, allowing him to see mathematical beauty; the receipt of a scholarship that enabled him to attend Rutgers and there have Arthur F. Burns and Homer Jones as teachers.

He said Mr. Burns, who later became chairman of the Federal Reserve, instilled in him a passion for scientific integrity and accuracy in economics; Mr. Jones interested him in monetary policy and a graduate school career at Chicago.

In his first economic-theory class at Chicago, he was the beneficiary of another accident — the fact that his last name began with an "F." The class was seated alphabetically, and he was placed next to Rose Director, a master's-degree candidate from Portland, Ore. That seating arrangement shaped his whole life, he said. He married Ms. Director six years later. And she, after becoming an important economist in her own right, helped Mr. Friedman form his ideas and maintain his intellectual rigor.

After he became something of a celebrity, Mr. Friedman said, many people became reluctant to challenge him directly. "They can't come right out and say something stinks," he said. "Rose can."

In 1998, he and his wife published a memoir, "Two Lucky People" (University of Chicago Press), in which they reveled in "having intellectual children throughout the world."

His wife is among his survivors. They also include a son, David, and a daughter, Janet Martel, four grandchildren and three great-grandchildren.

A Fateful Class

That fateful class at the University of Chicago also introduced him to Jacob Viner, regarded as a great theorist and historian of economic thought. Professor Viner convinced Mr. Friedman that economic theory need not be a mere set of disjointed propositions but rather could be developed into a logical and coherent prescription for action.

Mr. Friedman won a fellowship to do his doctoral work at Columbia, where the emphasis was on statistics and empirical evidence. He studied there with Simon Kuznets, another American Nobel laureate. The two turned Mr. Friedman's thesis into a book, "Income From Independent Professional Practice." It was the first of more than a dozen books that Mr. Friedman wrote alone or with others.

It was also the first of many "Friedman controversies." One finding of the book was that the American Medical Association exerted monopolistic pressure on the incomes of doctors; as a result, the authors said, patients were unable to reap the benefits of lower fees from any real price competition among doctors. The A.M.A., after obtaining a galley copy of the book, challenged that conclusion and forced the publisher to delay publication. But the authors did not budge. The book was eventually published, unchanged.

During the first two years of World War II, Mr. Friedman was an economist in the Treasury Department's division of taxation. "Rose has never forgiven me for the part I played in devising and developing withholding for the income tax," he said. "There is no doubt that it would not have been possible to collect the amount of taxes imposed during World War II without withholding taxes at the source.

"But it is also true," he went on, "that the existence of withholding has made it possible for taxes to be higher after the war than they otherwise could have been. So I have a good deal of sympathy for the view that, however necessary withholding may have been for wartime purposes, its existence has had some negative effects in the postwar period."

After the war, he returned to the University of Chicago, becoming a full professor in 1948 and commencing his campaign against Keynesian economics. Robert M. Solow of M.I.T., a Nobel laureate who often disagreed with Mr. Friedman, called him one of "the greatest debaters of all time." But his wisecracking style could infuriate opponents.

Mr. Samuelson, also of M.I.T., who was not above wisecracking himself, had a standard line in his economics classes that always brought down the house: "Just because Milton Friedman says it doesn't mean that it's necessarily untrue."

But Professor Samuelson said he never joked in class unless he was serious — that his friend and opponent was, in fact, often right when at first he sounded wrong.

Mr. Friedman's opposition to rent control after World War II, for example, incurred the wrath of many colleagues. They took it as an unpatriotic criticism of economic policies that had been successful in helping the nation mobilize for war. Later, Mr. Samuelson said, "probably 98 percent of them would agree that he was right."

In the early 1950s, Mr. Friedman started flogging a "decomposing horse," as Mrs. Thatcher's chief economic adviser, Alan Waters, later put it. The horse that most economists thought long dead was the monetarist theory that the supply of money in circulation and readily accessible in banks was the dominant force — or in Mr. Friedman's view, the only force — that should be used in shaping the economy.

In the 1963 book "A Monetary History of the United States, 1867-1960," which he wrote with Anna Jacobson Schwartz, Mr. Friedman compiled statistics to buttress his theory that recessions, as well as the Great Depression, had been preceded by declines in the money supply. And it was an oversupply, he argued, that caused inflation.

In the late 1960s, Mr. Friedman used his knowledge of empirical evidence and statistics to calculate that Keynesian government programs had the effect of constantly increasing the money supply, a practice that over time was seriously inflationary.

Paul Krugman, a Princeton University economist and Op-Ed columnist for The New York Times, said Mr. Friedman then managed "one of the decisive intellectual achievements of postwar economics," predicting the combination of rising unemployment and rising inflation that came to be called stagflation.

In this regard, his Nobel award cited his contribution to the now famous concept "the natural rate of unemployment." Under this thesis, the unemployment rate cannot be driven below a certain level without provoking an acceleration in the inflation rate. Price inflation was linked to wage inflation, and wage inflation depended on the inflationary expectations of employers and workers in their bargaining.

A spiral developed. Wages and prices rose until expectations came into line with reality, usually at the natural rate of unemployment. Once that rate is achieved, any attempt to drive down unemployment through expansionary government policies is inflationary, according to Mr. Friedman's thesis, which he unveiled in 1968.

For years economists have tried to pinpoint the elusive natural rate, without much success, particularly in recent years.

Mr. Friedman was right on the big economic issue of that time — inflation. And his prescription — to have the governors of the Federal Reserve System keep the money supply growing steadily without big fluctuations — figured in the thinking of policy makers around the world in the 1980s.

A Retort to Kennedy

Mr. Friedman also pursued his attack on Keynesianism in a more general way. He warned that a government allowed to regulate the economy could not be trusted to keep its hands off individual liberties.

He had first been exposed to this line of attack through his association with Mr. Hayek, who was predicting in the early 1940s that communism would lead inevitably to totalitarianism and the crushing of individual rights. In an introduction to a 1971 German edition, Professor Friedman called Mr. Hayek's book "a revelation particularly to the young men and women who had been in the armed forces during the war."

"Their recent experience had enhanced their appreciation of the value and meaning of individual freedom," he wrote.

DOJ_NMG_0095696

In 1962, Mr. Friedman took on President John F. Kennedy's popular inaugural exhortation: "Ask not what your country can do for you. Ask what you can do for your country." In an introduction to his classic book "Capitalism and Freedom," a collection of his writings and lectures, he said President Kennedy had got it wrong: You should ask neither.

"What your country can do for you," Mr. Friedman said, implies that the government is the patron, the citizen the ward; and "what you can do for your country" assumes that the government is the master, the citizen the servant. Rather, he said, you should ask, "What I and my compatriots can do through government to help discharge our individual responsibilities, to achieve our several goals and purposes, and above all protect our freedom."

It was not that Mr. Friedman believed in no government. He is credited with devising the negative income tax, which in a modern variant — the earned-income tax credit — increases the incomes of the working poor. He also argued that government should give the poor vouchers to attend the private schools he thought superior to public ones.

In forums he would spar over the role of government with his more liberal adversaries, including John Kenneth Galbraith, who was also a longtime friend (and who died in April 2006). The two would often share a stage, presenting a study in contrasts as much visual as intellectual: Mr. Friedman stood 5 feet 3; Mr. Galbraith, 6 feet 8.

Though he had helped ignite the conservative rebellion after World War II, together with intellectuals like Russell Kirk, William F. Buckley Jr. and Ayn Rand, Mr. Friedman had little or no influence on the administrations of Presidents Dwight D. Eisenhower, Kennedy, Lyndon B. Johnson and Richard M. Nixon. President Nixon, in fact, once described himself as a Keynesian.

It was frustrating period for Mr. Friedman. He said that during the Nixon years the talk was still of urban crises solvable only by government programs that he was convinced would make things worse, or of environmental problems produced by "rapacious businessmen who were expected to discharge their social responsibility instead of simply operating their enterprises to make the most profit."

Rising With Reagan

But then, after the 1970s stagflation, with Keynesian tools seemingly broken or outmoded, and with Ronald Reagan headed for the White House, Mr. Friedman's hour arrived. His power and influence were acknowledged and celebrated in Washington.

With his wife, in 1978 he brought out a best-selling general-interest book, "Free to Choose," and went on an 18-month tour, from Hong Kong to Ottumwa, Iowa, preaching that government regulation and interference in the free market was the stifling bane of modern society. The tour became the subject and Mr. Friedman the star of a 10-part PBS series, "Free to Choose," in 1980.

In 1983, having retired from teaching, he became a fellow at the Hoover Institution at Stanford University. Five years later he was awarded the Presidential Medal of Freedom and the National Medal of Science.

The economic expansion in the 1980s resulted from the Reagan administration's lowered tax rates and deregulation, Professor Friedman said. But then the tide turned again. The expansion, he argued, was halted when President George H. W. Bush imposed a "reverse-Reaganomics" tax increase.

What was worse, by the mid-1980s, as the finance and banking industries began undergoing upheavals and money began shifting unpredictably, Mr. Friedman's own monetarist predictions — of what would happen to the economy and inflation as a result of specific increases in the money supply — failed to hold up. Confidence in his monetarism theory waned.

Prof. Robert Solow of M.I.T., a Nobel laureate himself, and other liberal economists continued to raise questions about Mr. Friedman's theories: Did not President Reagan, and by extension Professor Friedman, they asked, revert to Keynesianism once in power?

"The boom that lasted from 1982 to 1990 was engineered by the Reagan administration in a straightforward Keynesian way by rising spending and lowered taxes, a classic case of an expansionary budget deficit," Mr. Solow said. "In fairness to Milton, however, it should be said that one of the reasons for his wanting a tax reduction was to force the spending cuts that he presumed would follow." Professor Samuelson said that "Milton Friedman thought of himself as a man of science but was in fact more full of passion than he knew."

DOJ_NMG_0095697

Mr. Friedman remained the guiding light to American conservatives. It was he, for example, who provided the economic theory behind “prescriptions for action,” as his onetime professor, Jacob Viner, put it, like the landslide Republican victory in the off-year Congressional elections of 1994.

By then Professor Friedman had grown into a giant of economics abroad as well. He was sharply criticized for his role in providing intellectual guidance on economic matters to the military regime in Chile that engineered a coup in the early 1970s against the democratically elected president, Salvador Allende. But for Mr. Friedman that was just a bump in the road.

In Vietnam, where the Constitution was amended in 1986 to guarantee the rights of private property, the writings of Mr. Friedman were circulated at the highest levels of government. “Privatize,” he told Chinese scholars at a meeting at Fudan University in Shanghai; and he told those in Moscow and elsewhere in Eastern Europe: “Speed the conversion of state-run enterprises to private ownership.” They did.

Mr. Friedman had long since ceased to be called a flat-earther by anyone. “What was really so important about him,” said W. Allen Wallis, a former classmate and later faculty colleague at the University of Chicago, “was his tremendous basic intelligence, his ingenuity, perseverance — his way of getting to the bottom of things, of looking at them in a new way.”

Nobel Winner Milton Friedman Dies At 94 (LAT)

By Jonathan Peterson

The Los Angeles Times, November 17, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO — Milton Friedman, a brilliant champion of free-market economics and individual freedom who almost single-handedly altered the boundaries of public debate on an array of national issues, died today in San Francisco. He was 94.

The circumstances of his death were not immediately available.

"America has lost a true visionary and advocate for human freedom," said Gordon St. Angelo, president and CEO of the Milton and Rose D. Friedman Foundation.

"Milton's passion for freedom and liberty has influenced more lives than he ever could possibly know. His writings and ideas have transformed the minds of U.S. presidents, world leaders, entrepreneurs and freshmen economic majors alike."

Friedman was considered a leading economic thinker of the 20th century. His many prescriptions for policy, notably on managing the nation's money supply and curbing the welfare state, influenced presidents and presidential candidates dating back to the 1960s. His sweeping, pro-capitalist ideas earned him legions of followers domestically and overseas, while also sparking dissent and controversy.

Friedman was awarded the Nobel Prize in economics in 1976 for a body of "original and weighty work," including his money supply research, which jurors said had influenced fellow scholars as well as the U.S. Federal Reserve and the central banks of other nations.

Friedman's influence extended far beyond the ivory tower. He became an economist-celebrity, promoting his passionate beliefs in books, magazines and television appearances. With confidence and a professor's logic, he sought to demolish the conventional wisdom after World War II that government must play a sweeping role in people's lives.

Taxes, he said, should be cut and simplified. Society benefits when personal choice reigns supreme.

"My world will not be the same," said former Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan in a statement today. "He had been a fixture in my life both professionally and personally for half a century."

Ed Crane, president of the Cato Institute, commented today on Friedman's life and legacy: "Here's a guy who won the Nobel Prize in economics for his work in monetary theory and he was a great Chicagoan, a great empiricist and theoretician of economics. But ultimately, what Milton believed in was human liberty and he took great joy in trying to promote that concept.... Milton would say, 'Maybe I did well and maybe I led the battle, but nobody ever said we were going to win this thing at any point in time. Eternal vigilance is required and there have to be people who step up to the plate, who believe in liberty and who are willing to fight for it.' "

Friedman had an uncanny ability to discern issues before most others, framing political battles decades before they flared publicly.

DOJ_NMG_0095698

In the 1960s, he argued that personal retirement accounts made more sense than a mandatory system of Social Security, helping set the stage for the recent national debate. Similarly, he contended that parents should be allowed to choose what schools their children attend, laying the foundation for ongoing arguments about school choice.

"Why do America's universities have a greater reputation around the world than its public schools?" he once asked aloud. "You have choice. That makes all the difference in the world."

He emerged as a leading voice in the Vietnam-era movement to end the draft, a position ultimately endorsed by President Richard Nixon.

Friedman offered blunt advice on subjects as personal as laws against prostitution — he saw them as incursions into individual choice — and as sweeping as the international system of relatively fixed exchange rates, which he sought to overturn and which did collapse in the early 1970s.

He became the human face of the influential "Chicago school" of economics, emphasizing the role of monetary policy, which affects interest rates, and the benefits of laissez-faire or free-market approaches to the economy.

Political leaders listened, granting almost unparalleled influence to a capitalist icon whose free-market emphasis had once seemed out of step with his times. The rise of Ronald Reagan and British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher brought Friedman fans to seats of national power.

Later, some would see the inspiration of Friedman behind moves of former Soviet governments, the People's Republic of China and other nations to stake more of their future on a private sector.

"At the Harvard University I knew as a graduate student in the late 1960s, Milton Friedman was treated as a right-wing Midwestern crank," said Robert J. Barro, a noted economist, during a 1998 tribute to Friedman at Stanford University. "It is notable that Milton Friedman's transition from pariah to priest was achieved mainly through the force of ideas."

Not all of the ideas found lasting acceptance. The U.S. Federal Reserve, the Bank of England and other central banks abandoned much of his monetary prescription, after brief and unhappy experiments.

After a series of corporate and financial scandals, the Friedman-style mantra for deregulation lost its allure for much of the public. Some of Friedman's social priorities, notably for the legalization of drugs, never caught on.

Friedman acknowledged in a 2003 interview that in hindsight he might not have pushed the technical aspects of his money supply theories so aggressively. Yet he never wavered from the essence of his world view.

"You form a philosophy at a certain stage and for the rest of your life it dominates," he told the Financial Times in June 2003. "On the big issues of policy, I don't think there is anything I've changed my mind about."

To many of his admirers, Friedman will most be remembered for the sweep of a vision that encompassed economic and political freedom and he viewed each as a complement to the other.

"He has used a brilliant mind to advance a moral vision: the vision of a society where men and women are free, free to choose," President Bush said in a May 2002 White House tribute to Friedman. "That vision has changed America and it is changing the world."

Friedman was born in Brooklyn on July 31, 1912, the fourth child in a family of struggling Jewish immigrants from a region that is now part of Ukraine. When he was 13 months old, the family moved to the northern New Jersey town of Rahway.

The household was warm and supportive and childhood was generally happy, Friedman would recall. But money was tight. Friedman's parents engaged in various enterprises with limited success, including a small shop and an ill-fated ice cream parlor. The family lived over the shop.

"Among my most vivid memories are heated discussions between my parents at night about where the money was to come from to pay incoming bills," Friedman recalled in his 1998 memoir, "Two Lucky People," written with wife, Rose.

The youthful Friedman made heavy use of Rahway's small local library -- "almost exhausting the contents" -- and was an enthusiastic Boy Scout. He shined in the classroom, winning an unexpected promotion to seventh grade midway through sixth. Slight of stature — Friedman was about 5"2' as an adult — he played on the chess team and volunteered to do chores for the baseball team.

After graduating, he moved 12 miles away to New Brunswick and entered Rutgers University on a scholarship. Always enterprising, he supplemented the aid by waiting on tables, hustling fireworks, tutoring high school students and clerking in a retail store. Friedman also began fruitful intellectual relationships with two professors: Arthur F. Burns, later to become chairman of the Federal Reserve, and Homer Jones, who lectured students on the importance of individual freedom.

The profession of economics did not beckon at first. Friedman planned to become an actuary, hoping he could use his math skills to earn a decent living. He would later joke that he changed his mind after flunking some difficult actuarial exams. But in an October 2000 PBS interview, Friedman offered a deeper insight into his motives, recalling that he faced a career decision during the depths of the Great Depression.

"If you're a 19-year-old college senior, which is going to be more important to you: figuring out what the right prices ought to be for life insurance or trying to understand how the world got into that kind of a mess?"

Friedman chose to pursue the latter question as a University of Chicago graduate student in 1932.

To a kid who lived over a store in Rahway, the university atmosphere was electrifying, an entree to whole new worlds. Chicago "exposed me to a cosmopolitan and vibrant intellectual atmosphere of a kind that I had never dreamed existed. I have never recovered," Friedman later said.

At Chicago, Friedman also met his future wife, Rose Director, a quiet economics student and European immigrant who had grown up in Portland. They married in 1938.

New worlds continued to open. Over the next several years, Friedman studied economics at Chicago and Columbia University, did a stint on a New Deal economics project in Washington, the National Resources Committee, and went to work for the nonprofit National Bureau of Economic Research in New York.

He would discover that scholarly conclusions can lead to controversy. At the bureau, Friedman worked with an economist, Simon Kuznets, on a study of professional income. Based on their research, Friedman wrote in his doctoral thesis that physicians gained extra income through the powers of the American Medical Assn. to restrict entry into the profession. These same powers, Friedman reported, reduced the availability of medical care for the public.

Columbia University held up accepting Friedman's thesis for five years. "I was young and innocent at the time and did not realize that a storm of protest would develop," Friedman wrote in "Two Lucky People. "I soon learned better."

Meanwhile, Friedman and his future wife corresponded several times a week. Rose had gone to work for the New Deal economics panel in Washington.

A 1938 letter to Rose, then his fiancee, reveals Friedman's frustration that his work seemed removed from the more urgent problems of a world headed for war: "I must say this damn European situation certainly is lousy. Here the world is going to pieces over our heads and we sit worrying about means and standard deviations and professional incomes. But what the hell else can we do?"

After a fierce inner struggle, Friedman agreed on a Jewish wedding in deference to his relatives. The two were married that year in a small ceremony in New York City.

Friedman had not yet arrived at a vehement rejection of tax-and-spending policies as a way to steer the national economy. During World War II, he even went to work for the federal government, advising the Treasury on wartime tax policy and other matters.

There followed a brief stint at the University of Minnesota. Then in 1946 Friedman joined the faculty of the University of Chicago, which would serve as home base for the next 30 years.

Inside the classroom, Friedman gained a reputation as a strict but inspiring teacher who brought principles of economics to life.

"Being a student of Milton's was magic indeed," Gary S. Becker, a 1951 graduate student of Friedman who later would win his own Nobel Prize, recalled years later. "People would always ask me, 'Why are you so excited? Are you going out on a date with a beautiful woman?' I said, 'No, I'm going to a class in economics.'"

Early on, Friedman arrived at one of his famous findings: The Federal Reserve had blundered terribly in the late 1920s and early 1930s, triggering the 1929 stock market crash and deepening the Great Depression through excessive tightness in the money supply. That knowledge, he believed, should protect America from a recurrence.

"In 1953 I gave a talk in Stockholm under the title of 'Why the American Economy is Depression-Proof.' I've been right for 45 years," he told Forbes magazine in 1997. "Why should I change my story now?

DOJ_NMG_0095700

"And the reason I said it then is the same reason I say it now: The Great Depression need not have occurred if the monetary authorities had behaved differently."

Other core beliefs that he would forever retain were now taking shape. These included his faith in the efficiency of free markets and an emphasis on the role of the Federal Reserve as the key to economic stability.

Friedman's lifelong views on freedom and personal choice were also emerging in the 1940s and 1950s.

In particular, he was moved by an economics professor named Friedrich Hayek, whose intellectual attacks on socialism galvanized a small group of true-believers under the banner of "liberalism."

At the time, mainstream Democrats and Republicans assumed the federal government would retain a huge, ambitious role throughout society, serving as an equalizer for the disadvantaged and softening the sharp edges of a Darwinian marketplace. John Maynard Keynes, an eminent British economist, emerged as the intellectual symbol of the prevailing view.

Friedman set out to provide an alternative. In 1962, Friedman published "Capitalism and Freedom," a widely read primer on his anti-government convictions, containing thoughts on monetary policy, public education, welfare and poverty. He blasted the Social Security program for restricting people's options in saving for retirement, pushed for a single-rate, "flat" tax to replace the more complex system of multiple brackets, and called for an end to professional licensing boards.

The following year he published what many consider his scholarly masterpiece, an 800-page "Monetary History of the United States," written with economist Anna Schwartz. It provided detailed evidence for his monetarist view that careful growth of the money supply was the paramount factor in sustaining economic growth.

In the 1964 presidential campaign, Friedman stepped directly into the political battlefield.

Lyndon Johnson, the Democratic incumbent, advocated a Keynes-style Great Society of ambitious federal programs. Sen. Barry Goldwater, the conservative Republican nominee, was drawn to Friedman's policies and picked the economist as an advisor.

Johnson won in a landslide. But Friedman stayed at the forefront of the policy struggle, soon beginning a Newsweek column that provided him a forum for his ideas on taxes, red tape, import restrictions, the Federal Reserve and many other matters.

Although many took offense at Friedman's anti-government views, his ideas did not fall into a tidy framework.

His push to decriminalize drug use found little support among many conservatives. His advocacy of school vouchers, which he viewed as essential to giving poor children a better chance to attend quality schools, was greeted with disdain by many liberals. His opposition to most of government beyond matters of security made him a hero to libertarians.

Friedman's wariness of government fit with the libertarian ideology, at times making it impossible to label him in simplistic liberal-conservative terms.

When Nixon appointed Friedman to a panel examining whether to abolish the draft, Friedman found himself at odds with Gen. William Westmoreland, the Army chief of staff and former Vietnam commander.

At one point, Westmoreland declared that he did not want to command an army of "mercenaries."

"I stopped him and said, "General, would you rather command an army of slaves?" Friedman later recalled. "He drew himself up and said, 'I don't like to hear our patriotic draftees referred to as slaves.' I replied, 'I don't like to hear our patriotic volunteers referred to as mercenaries.'"

U.S. officials ended the draft in 1973. Friedman also offered a range of economic advice to the Nixon White House, including a plan for a negative income tax that would provide new aid to the poor.

But the economist was horrified when Nixon imposed wage and price controls and Friedman blasted the plan as "pure window dressing which will do harm rather than good." He also was disappointed at Nixon's willingness to accept a batch of new regulatory agencies, including the Environmental Protection Agency, Occupational Safety and Health Administration and Consumer Product Safety Commission.

Soon after, the novel problem of stagflation — inflation amid sluggish growth — created a new opening for Friedman's strategies.

Contrary to the long-held view, he argued that inflation did not help ease unemployment by heating up the economy. The answer to slumps, he maintained, was carefully controlled growth of the money supply.

DOJ_NMG_0095701

On Oct. 14, 1976 reporters swarmed Friedman as he entered a Detroit news conference about a proposed state spending limit. To Friedman's surprise, they informed him he had won the Nobel Prize in economics.

The Swedish academy credited Friedman with insights into managing the nation's money supply — it should grow gradually and steadily, he believed — and how households decide what they can afford to spend, based on expected lifetime earnings. They also cited Friedman for exploding the old fallacy that inflation could reduce unemployment.

"It is very rare for an economist to wield such influence, directly and indirectly, not only on the direction of scientific research but also on actual policies," the judges said.

It was an award that Friedman's loyalists thought he should have gotten earlier. Caught off guard, the economist responded archly: "It is not the pinnacle of my career. I would not want a professional judgment of my scientific work to be those seven people who selected me for the award."

But for Friedman, the Nobel Prize also brought controversy.

He had enraged human rights activists the prior year by giving a series of lectures in Chile, which was controlled by the military dictatorship of Augusto Pinochet. Critics accused the economist of bolstering Pinochet, whose government included Friedman disciples, dubbed "the Chicago boys."

When the Friedmans traveled to Stockholm for the Nobel award, protesters were waiting. The furor annoyed the economist, who believed that economic freedom was a force for political freedom.

"I gave exactly the same lectures in China that I gave in Chile," Friedman said years later. "I have had many demonstrations against me for what I said in Chile. Nobody has made any objections to what I said in China. How come?"

Friedman's involvement in policy deepened. In 1980 he served as an advisor to the presidential campaign of Ronald Reagan and continued to offer some advice after Reagan was in the Oval Office. The two shared an admiration of Hayek and a distrust of government.

Reagan soon supported a politically costly effort by the Federal Reserve to clamp down on the money supply and combat inflation, adhering to Friedman's principles. The effort conquered inflation, but at the cost of a steep recession.

Friedman always looked back kindly on Reagan's economic stewardship: "You know, there is a myth that Reagan was somehow simple-minded and didn't understand these things," Friedman said in the 2000 PBS interview. "That's a bunch of nonsense. He understood this issue very well.... He knew very well that he was risking his political standing in order to achieve a basic economic objective."

The Fed stayed on the Friedman bandwagon in the early 1980s, focusing on the money supply with careful attention to technical measures known as M1 and M2. The investment world took notice and Friedman's influence reached dizzying heights.

"Every Friday afternoon, a kind of an eerie silence settled over the normally boisterous trading rooms on Wall Street," recalled Walter Wriston, former chairman of Citibank, at the 1998 tribute. "The computer screens started going blank at about 4:20 as traders waited for the 4:30 announcement by the Federal Reserve of the M1 and M2 figures."

It was a "truly extraordinary demonstration of how the power of an idea advanced by a private citizen can affect the way the world works," Wriston added.

Throughout his career, Friedman would tell people that he considered his public activities something of a diversion from his real work as a "scientist." Yet there is little doubt that he felt some lure of the limelight.

His public celebrity skyrocketed in 1980 with the 10-part PBS series "Free to Choose," a compilation of Milton and Rose Friedman's shared philosophy about personal, political and economic freedom. A book based on the project became the year's top seller in nonfiction. Friedman later described the effort as "the most exciting experience of our lives."

Friedman continued his research at Stanford's Hoover Institution, which he had joined in 1977 after three decades at Chicago. More honors were to come, including a presidential Medal of Freedom in 1988 and the National Medal of Science that same year.

But if he remained a hero to many, Friedman's influence in some circles declined in later years. The Fed and other central banks had long ago concluded that his monetary strategies should not be taken literally, although Fed vigilance against inflation continued under Greenspan.

Similarly, his appeals to abandon the war on drugs and other government programs remain outside the mainstream of political debate.

"Human life requires the balancing of freedom with other goals, including security and equality," said Richard Parker, a senior fellow at Harvard's Kennedy School of Government. "Friedman's repeated neglect of these other values has been the repeated source of error in his policy advice."

But to legions of admirers, Friedman remains a towering figure, unparalleled in the breadth of his insights about freedom and the economy.

Said Allan H. Meltzer, professor of political economy at Carnegie Mellon University in Pittsburgh and a scholar at the American Enterprise Institute for Public Policy Research: "He's a giant."

He is survived by his wife Rose; daughter Jane, an attorney; and son, David, a professor of law and economics at Santa Clara University.

Economist Touted Laissez-Faire Policy (WP)

By Patricia Sullivan And Carlos Lozada

The Washington Post, November 17, 2006

Milton Friedman, 94, the Nobel Prize-winning economist whose tireless advocacy of unfettered free markets reshaped the nation's economic policies, died Nov. 16 of a heart ailment at St. Francis Memorial Hospital in San Francisco.

One of the most influential economists of the 20th century, Friedman championed individual choice on topics ranging from Social Security to the military draft. He revived conservative economic theory after the big-government era of the 1940s, 1950s and 1960s, leading the movement that says government's proper role in the market is to stabilize the growth of the money supply -- and stay out of the way.

His views gained traction in the 1970s when a combination of high unemployment and inflation, known as "stagflation," sharply ended the long post-World War II boom.

"Inflation is always and everywhere a monetary phenomenon," he often said.

"Friedman's monetary framework has been so influential that, in its broad outlines at least, it has nearly become identical with modern monetary theory," Ben S. Bernanke, now chairman of the Federal Reserve, said in a 2003 speech at the Federal Reserve Bank of Dallas.

A 5-foot, 2-inch scholar with a dry wit, the bald, bespectacled Friedman joked that he'd lost an inch because of the weight of the world on his shoulders. He was widely respected as an academic who also expressed himself in ways that could be understood by those who were interested, but unschooled, in economic theory. He took his theories to television, starring in a 10-week series on economics that aired on public television in the 1980s, and he wrote a column for Newsweek from 1966 to 1983. He published nearly two dozen books.

Friedman, an economic adviser to presidents Richard M. Nixon and Ronald Reagan, was awarded the Presidential Medal of Freedom and the National Medal of Science in 1988. He won the Nobel Prize in economics in 1976.

His laissez-faire ideas went from maverick to mainstream during his lifetime. He began graduate studies in economics during the Great Depression as the theories of British economist John Maynard Keynes were revolutionizing his profession. Keynes believed that government intervention was necessary to help smooth out the boom-bust cycles in the economy. That theory became the rock against which Friedman pushed for decades until it moved.

One of his most famous arguments dealt with the causes of the Depression. It was prompted not by changes in tariff laws or by the stock market crash, he said, but by the Federal Reserve Board's decisions to shrink the money supply for fear of inflation in 1929 and again in 1936. Those choices choked the life out of the economy and exacerbated a bad situation, he stated in "A Monetary History of the United States, 1867-1960," (1963) co-written with Anna J. Schwartz. The book is considered the definitive history of the nation's money supply.

Friedman's ideas were not initially hailed, and they remain controversial, especially among those who believe government should be a more active player in the economy, a position epitomized by the late Harvard University economist John Kenneth Galbraith.

Richard Parker, a Galbraith biographer, wrote last year in the Boston Globe that Friedman's "passionate calls for financial and securities market deregulation played no small role in ushering in the half-trillion dollar S&L fiasco of the 1980s and the deeply corrupt Wall Street stock market boom of the 1990s. His tax-reduction-at-all-costs policies helped lead to the nation's yawning budget deficits."

But the core of Friedman's work -- that controlling the money supply is a major key to economic health -- was embraced widely across the political spectrum.

His landmark 1962 work, "Capitalism and Freedom," listed common governmental activities in the United States and other Western societies that he considered unjustifiable under his economic principles. These included price supports for agriculture; restrictions on international trade; rent controls; legal minimum wage rates; detailed regulation of industries such as banking or transportation; control of radio and television by the Federal Communications Commission; Social Security (which he called a Ponzi scheme); licensing restrictions on any enterprise, occupation or profession; public housing programs; the military draft; the legal prohibition against carrying mail for profit; and publicly owned and operated toll roads.

"This list is far from comprehensive," Friedman added.

He was a hero to libertarians for advocating the legalization of drugs and prostitution and for promoting the idea of school choice. He also served on a presidential commission that urged Nixon in 1970 to end the military draft.

"No public-policy activity that I have ever engaged in has given me as much satisfaction," he wrote in "Two Lucky People," the 1998 memoir he wrote with his wife. The most dramatic moment, he wrote, was when Gen. William Westmoreland testified that he did not want to command an army of mercenaries. "I stopped him and said, 'General, would you rather command an army of slaves. . . . If they are mercenaries, then I, sir, am a mercenary professor, and you, sir, are a mercenary general, and we are served by mercenary physicians, we use a mercenary lawyer and we get our meat from a mercenary butcher.' "

Milton Friedman was born in Brooklyn, N.Y., on July 31, 1912, the son of Jewish Austro-Hungarian immigrants. He grew up in nearby Rahway, N.J., where his parents ran a garment shop, a dry goods store and an ice cream parlor.

Friedman enrolled in Rutgers University and worked as a waiter, department store clerk and tutor. He started small businesses selling clothes and secondhand books.

After graduating in 1932, he moved to the University of Chicago, where he earned a master's degree in economics in 1933. That's also where he met and later married Rose Director Friedman, his wife of 68 years, who is also an economist and with whom he wrote many books. They had two children, who survive him.

Later, Friedman became a federal employee with the National Resources Committee, a New Deal agency of the kind that he would later criticize so fervently. Part of his work there and at other agencies involved designing the federal withholding tax system.

He received a doctoral degree in economics from Columbia University in 1946 and joined the University of Chicago, where he became known as the leader of the Chicago School of free-market economists. As a believer in the principles espoused by 18th-century economist Adam Smith, Friedman argued vigorously that economic freedom was necessary for political freedom.

Upon retiring in 1977, he became a senior research fellow at Stanford University's Hoover Institution.

The idea of the world's foremost laissez-faire economist living in one of the nation's most liberal cities struck many as unlikely. Asked why he chose San Francisco, he responded with his trademark wit, "Not much competition here."

Influential Economist Milton Friedman Dies At Age 94 (USAT)

By Sue Kirchhoff

USA Today, November 17, 2006

WASHINGTON — Nobel Memorial Prize-winning economist Milton Friedman, an outspoken advocate of free markets and free choice, adviser to presidents and best-selling author, died Thursday at 94.

DOJ_NMG_0095704

Often described as one of the most influential economists of the last century, Friedman died of heart failure in San Francisco.

"He had been a fixture in my life both professionally and personally for a half century. My world will not be the same," said former Federal Reserve chairman Alan Greenspan.

Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke called him an economic scholar without peer.

Friedman was a leader of a school of thought that became known as the Chicago school of economics, named after the University of Chicago, where he was a professor. Friedman's work emphasized free markets and monetarism, which stresses the importance of the money supply in inflation and business cycles. He famously noted "inflation is always and everywhere a monetary phenomenon." His work contrasted with John Maynard Keynes' advocacy of government intervention to manage the economy.

Friedman was instrumental, with 2006 Nobel Memorial winner Edmund Phelps, in promoting the view that there is not a sustainable long-run trade-off between inflation and unemployment.

Nariman Behravesh of Global Insight notes Friedman correctly predicted the rise of inflation in the 1960s and 1970s, which many others missed. His theories explained stagflation — high inflation and unemployment.

Friedman and co-author Anna Schwartz reshaped understanding of the Great Depression, illuminating the role played by misguided central bank policy.

Friedman wrote extensively on public policy, including a column in Newsweek magazine. Among his best-known popular works is Free to Choose, which became a best-selling non-fiction book in 1980. It was written with his wife, Rose Friedman, to accompany a 10-part public television series.

Friedman advocated greater school choice via vouchers. He was an opponent of the military draft and a force in ending conscription in 1973.

Friedman was a senior research fellow at Stanford University's Hoover Institution since 1977. He was a professor at the University of Chicago from 1946 to 1976, when he won the Nobel Memorial Prize in Economics.

Born in 1912, Friedman grew up the son of Eastern European immigrants in a working-class family in Rahway, N.J. Friedman paid his way through Rutgers University with a scholarship and a series of odd jobs. He considered majoring in math and becoming an actuary but turned to economics.

Friedman worked on tax policy in World War II, helping develop tax withholding (which he later wanted to abolish). He was briefly posted in Paris helping administer the Marshall Plan for rebuilding Europe, where he became interested in floating exchange rates.

Friedman advised conservative Arizona Sen. Barry Goldwater in his 1964 presidential run and later Presidents Nixon and Reagan and foreign leaders. In a 2002 tribute, President Bush noted that Friedman's free-market ideas have been adopted in many countries: "The rest of the world is finally catching up with Milton Friedman."

Friedman received a bachelor of arts from Rutgers in 1932, a master's from the University of Chicago in 1933 and a Ph.D. from Columbia University in 1946.

In an autobiography, Friedman talked of meeting his wife, who survives him, while she was a "shy, withdrawn, lovely, and extremely bright fellow economics student" doing graduate work at the University of Chicago. They were married in 1938.

Friedman Debunked The Gospel Of Keynes (WP)

By Steven Pearlstein

The Washington Post, November 17, 2006

One thing that baffles those of us with no training in economics is that two people who hold diametrically opposite views can both be held out as giants of their profession.

After all, if the great British economist John Maynard Keynes was right that government can smooth out the business cycle by stimulating and managing demand for goods and services through such mechanisms as public-works programs, deposit insurance and deficit spending, then how could Milton Friedman be right that the better approach is for government to cut taxes, curb regulation and focus on the supply of money in circulation?

DOJ_NMG_0095705

Or how do we square Keynes's prescription that global finance can be stabilized through fixed exchange rates with Friedman's formula of floating exchange rates?

There is, of course, a political analogy to this conundrum. The same country reveres the memory of Franklin Roosevelt for pulling us out of the Great Depression while crediting Ronald Reagan with restoring the competitiveness of the American economy.

The dirty little secret is that there are few scientific truths in economics analogous to the laws of thermodynamics or genetics. Economics is a social science, not a physical one, in which people and systems are constantly adapting to changing conditions. The policies that may be good for one era may not be right for the next. And it is the truly great economists who spot the changing dynamics, acknowledge the inadequacy of the old prescriptions and are clever enough to come up with something better.

In this respect you can say that Milton Friedman, who died yesterday, was the greatest economist of our time. He was not simply the most influential economist since Keynes, but a worthy successor, building on Keynes's insights even as he discredited key aspects of Keynesian economic management.

In the 1950s, as socialism was gaining credence around the world and Keynesian thinking dominated economics textbooks, Friedman's skepticism about government management of the economy was viewed as nothing short of heresy. But by the mid-1970s, as the country was beset by stagnant growth and high inflation, it became clear the Keynesian model had played itself out. Suddenly, Friedman's ideas didn't look so kooky.

"I grew up in a Keynesian household," recalls Larry Summers, the former Treasury secretary and Harvard president whose mother and two uncles were respected economists. "And as an undergraduate, I was taught an economics that had demand but no supply." But in time, says Summers, it dawned on him and most others in the profession that Keynesian theory was not so much wrong as incomplete.

With his focus on the overall demand for goods and services in the economy, Keynes overlooked the importance of the supply of money in circulation. Friedman argued that controlling that supply was a better tool for managing the economy than taxation and spending policies.

Inflation, it turned out, wasn't as benign an antidote to unemployment as Keynes had thought, nor was there necessarily a trade-off between the two, as he presumed.

And many Keynesian policies meant to correct for very real imperfections in the marketplace turned out to have big imperfections of their own.

The intellectual roots of Friedman's "economic liberalism" run back to Adam Smith and Alfred Marshall, and were spun out at the University of Chicago with his pal George Stigler and intellectual superstars including Ronald Coase, Zvi Griliches, Gary Becker, Robert Lucas and Kevin Murphy. But even as the profession moved toward fancy mathematics and modeling, Friedman went the other way, constantly striving to connect theory with people and policy.

With his wife, Rose, he wrote a regular column for Newsweek, churned out books in simple English and produced a television series for PBS. And over the years, he provided a steady stream of influential advice to politicians and policymakers, beginning with Barry Goldwater and Richard Nixon, and extending through Ronald Reagan, Margaret Thatcher and Alan Greenspan.

Friedman wasn't always right. His dogmatic monetarism clouded his economic predictions during the 1980s and '90s, in part because of globalization and new financial instruments that made it difficult to measure the money supply, let alone control it. And after the success of the Greenspan era at the Federal Reserve, Friedman was forced to acknowledge that maybe humans could do a better job managing monetary policy than the computer he once recommended.

Friedman's abiding distrust of government action also blinded him to its successes. But it would be wrong to confuse his libertarian instincts with lack of human sympathy. He was an early proponent of the negative income tax, now known as the earned income tax credit -- which supplements the wages of millions of low-income workers. And while he opposed rent control, public education and Social Security, he promoted government vouchers to help people buy housing, education and medical care.

Whether he was right or wrong, whether you agreed with him or not, it is certainly true, as Summers noted yesterday, that Friedman improved the quality of thinking in every debate he entered. The same might be said of his friend John Kenneth Galbraith, who was as energetic in defending the Keynesian view as Friedman was in discarding it -- and who also died this year.

Many of Friedman's ideas have become so fundamental to modern economic thinking, it's easy to forget how unconventional they once were. Federal Reserve Chairman Ben S. Bernanke put it nicely in 2003, at a conference organized by the Dallas Fed to celebrate Friedman's life and work.

"I am reminded," Bernanke said, "of the student first exposed to Shakespeare, who complained to the professor: 'I don't see what's so great about him. He was hardly original at all. All he did was string together a bunch of well-known quotations.'"

Capitalism And Friedman (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 17, 2006

There are some public figures whose obituaries can be written years in advance. Milton Friedman was not one of them.

Arguably the greatest economist of the 20th century, he won his Nobel Prize 30 years ago. His classic "Capitalism and Freedom" was published 44 years ago. He died yesterday at the age of 94, but as the op-ed running nearby attests, he was active in writing about, thinking about and explaining how economics affects our world until the end.

In today's feature, he updates and re-examines conclusions he reached about the Great Depression in "A Monetary History of the United States, 1867-1960," a book published with Anna Schwartz 43 years ago. His thesis was that the Great Depression was not, as was once commonly presumed, a "market failure," but a failure of government policy. Contraction of the money supply in the wake of the stock-market crash of 1929 was what turned a financial event into an economic catastrophe.

This insight flowed from Professor Friedman's conviction that "money matters." As the Royal Academy of Sweden noted in announcing his 1976 Nobel, Friedman's was a lonely voice in arguing for the importance of the money supply in economics when he began writing about it in the 1950s.

By the late 1970s, stagflation -- the combination of high inflation and high unemployment -- had made it obvious that the then-dominant Keynesian model had some large holes. These included the effect of the money supply on inflation and the fact that inflation and employment did not move in lockstep as some of Keynes's disciples asserted. It was a seminal insight, creating what became known at the University of Chicago and elsewhere as the "monetarist school" and laying the intellectual basis for central bankers to break the great inflation of the 1970s.

In awarding its Nobel in 1976, the Royal Swedish Academy of Sciences cited his "achievements in the fields of consumption analysis, monetary history and theory, and for his demonstration of the complexity of stabilization policy." The citation covers a huge swath of economic thinking, and suggests both the range and the consistency of Professor Friedman's thought. In layman's terms, the Swedish Academy credited him with nothing less than shredding the Keynesian consensus.

First, he had shown that men are no fools. People spend money in accordance with their income expectations over the long-term, not in response to one-time "stimuli" from the government. This is known as the "permanent income" hypothesis, and it called into question Keynesian notions of how short-term stimulus affects the economy. In addition to his monetary insights, Mr. Friedman questioned the degree to which fiscal policy could be used to "fine-tune" the economy by adjusting spending, tax or monetary policy. Today we take for granted that all of these operate with a lag, but it was Milton Friedman who first highlighted the problem.

For all of his academic accomplishments, Professor Friedman's role as a popularizer of free-market principles was arguably more important. He wrote a column in Newsweek for 18 years starting in 1966, preaching the importance of economic freedom to a generation that had never heard such things in school. His 1980 book, "Free to Choose," was a best seller, and the videos that accompanied it were smuggled behind the Iron Curtain like seeds of revolution.

He was among the first to point to Hong Kong as a model of free-market success, a lesson that even today is remaking Communist China. And he first suggested educational vouchers to rescue failing public schools as long ago as 1955; in recent years, he established a foundation to support this idea that continues to advance despite ferocious opposition from unions and other entrenched interests.

This newspaper had the privilege of publishing Milton Friedman's articles on numerous occasions over the years. We've also disagreed with him from time to time, notably on exchange rates and drug legalization. These disputes always gave us cause to reflect, and 20 years ago amid one debate on the benefits of fixed exchange rates we noted that "being spanked by Milton Friedman is one of life's most humiliating experiences."

In truth, Professor Friedman always argued with civility and a bracing wit. One of his best barbs on the size of government: "Given our monstrous, overgrown government structure, any three letters chosen at random would probably designate an agency or part of a department that could be profitably abolished." And he popularized "There is no such thing as a free lunch."

In "Two Lucky People," written with his wife, Rose Friedman, who survives him as a distinguished economist in her own right, Mr. Friedman well described the role of a public intellectual: "We do not influence the course of events by persuading people that we are right when we make what they regard as radical proposals. Rather, we exert influence by keeping options available when something has to be done at a time of crisis."

On the death of Ronald Reagan, whom he advised, Mr. Friedman wrote on these pages that "few people in human history have contributed more to the achievement of human freedom." The same can and long will be said of Milton Friedman.

Why Money Matters (WSJ)

By Milton Friedman

The Wall Street Journal, November 17, 2006

The third of three episodes in a major natural experiment in monetary policy that started more than 80 years ago is just now coming to an end. The experiment consists in observing the effect on the economy and the stock market of the monetary policies followed during, and after, three very similar periods of rapid economic growth in response to rapid technological change: to wit, the booms of the 1920s in the U.S., the '80s in Japan, and the '90s in the U.S.

The prosperous '20s in the U.S. were followed by the most severe economic contraction in its history. In our "Monetary History" (1963), Anna Schwartz and I attributed the severity of the contraction to a monetary policy that permitted the quantity of money to decline by one-third from 1929 to 1933. Since 1963, two episodes have occurred that are almost mirror images of the U.S. economy in the '20s: the '80s in Japan, and the '90s in the U.S. All three episodes were marked by a long period of rapid economic growth, sparked by rapid technological change and the emergence of new industries, and accompanied by a stock market boom that terminated in a crash. Monetary policy played a role in these booms, but only a supporting role. Technological change appears to have been the major player.

These three episodes provide the equivalent of a controlled experiment to test our hypothesis about what we termed the Great Contraction. In this experiment, the quantity of money is the counterpart of the experimenter's input. The performance of the economy and the level of the stock market are the counterpart of the experimenter's output, i.e., the variables whose relation to input the experimenter is seeking to determine. The three boom episodes all occurred in developed private enterprise market economies, involved in international finance and trade, and with similar monetary systems, including a central bank with power to control the quantity of money. This is the counterpart of the controlled conditions of the experimenter's laboratory.

The Money Supply: In addition, history has provided a close counterpart to the kind of variation in input that our hypothetical experimenter might have deliberately chosen. As Fig. 1 shows, monetary policy, as measured by the behavior of the quantity of money, was very similar in the three boom periods, and very different in the three post boom periods, with settings that might be described as low, medium, high.

To measure the quantity of money, I use M2 in the U.S. and the conceptually equivalent M2 plus certificates of deposit in Japan. To express the data for the two countries and the widely separated periods in comparable units, I use as an index of the money stock the ratio of the quantity of money to its average value for the six years prior to the cycle peak. The peak quarter of the relevant business cycle is the third quarter of 1929 (29.3) for the earlier U.S. episode; the first quarter of 1992 (92.1) for Japan; and the first quarter of 2001 (01.1) for the second U.S. episode (see Table 1). Finally, the data are plotted to align the dates at the cycle peak.

Fig. 1 shows a striking contrast between the period before the cycle peak and the period after the cycle peak. There are some differences before the peak -- money growth is slowest on the average for the earlier U.S. episode, fastest for Japan -- but the differences are small and there is reasonably steady money growth in all three episodes. The contrast with the period after the cycle peak could hardly be greater. Money supply declines sharply after the cycle peak in the first episode, goes from stable to rising mildly in the second, and rises steadily and sharply in the third. Our hypothetical experimenter planned his experiment well.

The GDP: The results of the third episode of this natural experiment are now all in. Fig. 2 shows how GDP in nominal terms (dollars or yen in current prices) behaved during the boom and post boom periods. I use nominal GDP rather than real GDP because M2 is also a nominal magnitude. How changes in nominal GDP are divided between prices and output is an important question but one that is not directly relevant to this experiment. One further preliminary comment: I believe the erratic behavior of nominal GNP during the '20s and '30s is largely a statistical artifact. The data for that period are scarce and of poor quality.

As in Fig. 1, there is a striking contrast between the boom and the post-boom periods: roughly similar growth during the booms, widely variable growth during the post-boom. Both before and after the cycle peak, nominal GDP growth paralleled monetary growth. During the boom, money and nominal GDP grew most rapidly in Japan, most slowly in the first U.S. episode, and at an intermediate rate in the second U.S. episode. Table 2 shows the ratio of the money stock at the cycle peak to its value six years earlier (the initial date in the figures) and the corresponding ratio for GDP. In the first two rows of the table, the ratios are highest for Japan, lowest for the U.S. 1920s.

After the cycle peak, money fell sharply in the first episode and so did nominal GDP; money growth stagnated in the second episode and so did GDP; money grew at a rapid rate in the third episode and, after a brief lag (corresponding to the mild 2001 recession) so did GDP. Table 3 shows the ratio of the money stock at the terminal date plotted to its value at the cyclical peak and the corresponding ratio for GDP. Both ratios are decidedly lowest for the U.S. 1920s, and decidedly highest for the U.S. 1990s.

The Stock Market: The peak of the stock market, as measured by S&P's index, coincided with the cycle peak in the first episode, both occurring in the third quarter of 1929 (29.3). However, that was not the case in the later episodes. In Japan, stock prices as measured by the Nikkei peaked in the fourth quarter of 1989 (89.4), nine quarters before the cycle peak. In the second U.S. episode, stock prices as measured by S&P 500 peaked in the third quarter of 2000 (00.3), two quarters prior to the cycle peak. Accordingly, Fig. 3 plots the data to align the series at the stock market peak.

The near identity of the three stock market series during the boom is truly remarkable. Yet even the minor deviations that exist reflect to some extent the differences in monetary growth, as Table 2 makes clear. Money growth was highest in Japan, and the Nikkei shows the largest rise in the stock market. The other two do not conform: Money rose more in the '90s than in the '20s, while stock prices rose slightly less, as shown by the ratio of peak to initial value in Table 2.

Of more interest for our purpose is what happened after the peak. For a year after, the three stock-price series fell in tandem, responding to the inner dynamics of a collapsing bubble. Then, the differences in monetary policy began to have an effect. Beginning in late 1930, the S&P index started falling away from the others under the influence of a collapsing money stock. For another year and a half, the other two indexes move in tandem. Then the much more expansive policy of the Fed in the '90s than of the Bank of Japan in the '80s takes effect and pulls the S&P 500 away from the Nikkei, which stabilizes in response to the passive monetary policy of the Bank of Japan (as shown by Table 3).

The results of this natural experiment are clear, at least for major ups and downs: What happens to the quantity of money has a determinative effect on what happens to national income and to stock prices. The results strongly support Anna Schwartz's and my 1963 conjecture about the role of monetary policy in the Great Contraction. They also support the view that monetary policy deserves much credit for the mildness of the recession that followed the collapse of the U.S. boom in late 2000.

Mr. Friedman, who died yesterday, was the 1976 Nobel Laureate in economics. He was a senior research fellow at the Hoover Institution and professor emeritus at the University of Chicago.

ABOARD AIR FORCE ONE, Friday, Nov. 17 — During the presidential campaign in 2000, George W. Bush, who served out the Vietnam War in the Texas Air National Guard, was asked whether he ever considered volunteering to fight when he graduated from Yale in 1968.

"Did I think about going to the Army post and saying 'Send me to Vietnam?' " Mr. Bush asked, describing his own outlook in 1968. "Not really. I wanted to fly, and that was the adventure I was seeking."

Thirty-eight years later, at age 60, Mr. Bush is finally arriving in Vietnam. On Friday he starts a 72-hour visit, linked to an annual Asian summit meeting that the Communist government in Vietnam is playing host to for the first time and that some White House officials concede is spectacularly poorly timed. Just as Lyndon B. Johnson did in 1968, Mr. Bush has ousted his longtime defense secretary and nominated a realist with "fresh eyes" to replace him. Just like President Johnson in 1968, he is conducting a broad rethinking of strategy, and is hearing options he does not like.

The White House insists that the comparisons stop there. His aides argue that the analogies between these two wars, conducted in different parts of the world, facing very different enemies, are mostly false ones.

The comparisons will nonetheless be the unavoidable subtext of Mr. Bush's every move as he travels in Hanoi and then stops in the city that in his youth was known as Saigon, and that became the scene of an American military debacle. And he will have to convince his allies, ordinary Americans, and perhaps himself, that Iraq will end differently.

Until now, when asked what he had learned from Vietnam, Mr. Bush has almost reflexively reached for the same line: That he does not micromanage his generals, the way Mr. Johnson did. It is a response drawn from conservative orthodoxy about what went wrong in Vietnam, underlying an argument that had the generals been allowed to fight their way, the United States might have won.

But he may feel compelled to say more after he lands in Hanoi. Mr. Bush will find himself inside government halls adorned with paintings of Ho Chi Minh. He will be talking about the future of Asia with Ho's Communist successors who, Washington once warned, could not be allowed to win under any circumstances.

He will be sleeping just a mile or so from the open-air equivalent to the Situation Room where Ho Chi Minh managed his generals, from a single telephone at the end of a conference table. (It is now part of a museum, but Mr. Bush's schedule reveals no plans to visit.) His motorcade will zip past the lake where John McCain was pulled to shore after bailing out, and Mr. Bush will have his picture taken with foreign leaders under the same skies where Operation Rolling Thunder, the bombing attack on North Vietnam's capital, tried to break the enemy's will.

With such emotional imagery to deal with, it is no surprise that Mr. Bush's national security team has spent an enormous amount of time drawing distinctions between the war that their generation grew up with, and the one that they ordered.

"Historical parallels of that kind are not very helpful, and I don't think they happen to be right," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice told reporters the other day, in a tone she might have used for a Stanford graduate student whose thesis was not holding together. "This is a different set of circumstances, with different stakes for the United States."

Stephen J. Hadley, the president's national security adviser, struck a similar note last week when he suggested that the "domino effect" that Americans worried about in the 1960s and 70s — the fear that neighboring countries would fall to Communism's lures — was nothing compared with the problems today.

"There were discussions about dominoes, some which fell, some which didn't fall," he said, recalling the Vietnam debate that raged when he was a student at Cornell. But, he added, "Most men and women in America believe that it is important that we not fail in Iraq; that the consequences of an Iraq that descended into chaos would be an Iraq that would be a safe haven for terrorists."

Ultimately, he said, that "could result in 9/11-type attacks against the United States," a reach across the ocean that no one really harbored three decades ago.

In private, Mr. Bush says there is another big difference between then and now — the draft. There is little question that by signing up to be a pilot in the Texas Air National Guard, the risk was low that he would end up in Vietnam as a 23-year-old. But according to an academic called into the White House recently, Mr. Bush said, "We could never have sustained this effort in Iraq, politically," if there was not an all-volunteer force. He declined to be named because he was relaying a private conversation.

DOJ_NMG_0095710

The argument that Vietnam is very different gets some backing from Stanley Karnow, the Vietnam historian. “There are differences and similarities, of course,” he said. “We got lied into both wars.”

But, he added, “The easy summation is that Vietnam began as a guerrilla war and escalated into an orthodox war — by the end we were fighting in big units. Iraq starts as a conventional war, and has degenerated into a guerrilla war. It has gone in an opposite direction. And it’s much more difficult to deal with.”

U.S. Seeks Korea Nuclear Step

HANOI, Nov. 16—The United States is working with China and other Asian nations to pressure North Korea to take a visible step toward dismantling its nuclear program before starting a new round of nuclear disarmament talks, American officials said Thursday.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said that while she was hopeful that the talks — begun in 2003 — would restart in December, it was pointless to return to the bargaining table without a show of good faith from both sides. Speaking to reporters in Hanoi after meeting with some of her counterparts for the Asia Pacific Economic Cooperation meeting, Ms. Rice refused to expand on what those steps would be. But American officials, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to speak publicly, said an acceptable move might be for North Korea to dismantle one of its nuclear facilities and readmit inspectors.

Comparisons With Vietnam Shadow Bush Trip (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, November 17, 2006

HANOI -- President Bush will focus on trade and worldwide crises like AIDS and bird flu during his eight-day trip to Southeast Asia, but the specter of the Vietnam War 30 years ago and comparisons to the U.S.-led war in Iraq have followed him to the Pacific Rim.

The president has repeatedly rejected comparisons between the two wars, even as Democratic critics complain that Iraq has become a "quagmire" like Vietnam, which U.S. forces abandoned in 1973 after the deaths of 58,000 American troops.

"I see differences, I really do," Mr. Bush insisted last week in a press conference. "I don't think it is a parallel."

Other top administration officials also say there is no likeness between the two conflicts.

"This was a different set of circumstances with different stakes for the United States and a different kind of war," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said this week in Germany. And National Security Adviser Stephen J. Hadley said before the president departed this week on his trip that the two wars are different.

"I remember a debate about what would happen if the United States left Vietnam, and there were discussions about dominoes, some which fell, some of which didn't fall," he said. "But nobody, I think, felt that it would result in a clear and present danger to the territory of the United States."

Still, Democrats charge that the Bush administration has not learned the lessons from the Vietnam War, and some party leaders have directly compared the two wars. Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat, has called the Iraq war a "seemingly intractable quagmire ... with no end in sight," and others complain that there has never been an exit strategy -- a lesson that should have been learned from Vietnam.

There are, in some ways, comparisons worth noting. In nearly every speech he gives, the president insists that the war in Iraq is the central front in the war against terror and has warned that if the United States fails there, other nations in the Middle East could fall like dominoes.

"The enemy understands the stakes of what a free society will mean to their ambitions to spread their dark vision throughout the Middle East and then the world," he said during a campaign event before the Nov. 7 elections.

The construction mirrors the premise that led the United States into Vietnam in the 1960s: that Southeast nations near Vietnam would fall into communist hands if the United States failed in its effort to help South Vietnam fight the North.

Critics say, however, that the "domino theory" proved false.

"We thought the sky would fall in the '70s, too, and it didn't," said Michael O'Hanlon, a foreign-policy scholar at the Brookings Institution who is part of the independent, bipartisan Iraq Study Group. He also said there are several other parallels between the two wars, including an insurgency that has established "a self-sustaining momentum that is very hard to overcome" and a weak allied government.

Vietnam scholar Robert K. Brigham, a Vassar College history professor, asserts that the parallels between the two wars are unmistakable. In both wars, superior U.S. firepower did not translate into victory, nation-building became ever more difficult with the passage of time, and public support waned after years of war.

"In going to war in Iraq, the George W. Bush administration has purposefully turned its back on the lessons of Vietnam," Mr. Brigham writes in his new book, "Is Iraq Another Vietnam?" "That the United States is not omnipotent is an important lesson Americans learned in the mangrove swamps and highlands of Vietnam. It is one the United States is (re)learning in Iraq as well."

But Pham Viet. Anh does not agree that the Iraq war is like the Vietnam War.

"I think it is different. The Vietnam War was between South Vietnam and North Vietnam, not a war between Vietnam and the United States," the 24-year-old magazine reporter said outside Hanoi's grand Temple of Literature.

But the reminders are everywhere. Near the center of the city is Truc Bach lake, where then-Lt. Cmdr. John McCain, now a Republican senator from Arizona and a likely presidential candidate in 2008, was captured after parachuting out of his damaged warplane to spend more than five years as a prisoner of war. Statues of Ho Chi Minh, the victorious North's revolutionary communist leader, are everywhere, and thousands flock to his mausoleum each year to see his body. One of the capital's trendiest nightspots is the disco Apocalypse Now, named after one of the most famous movies made about the war.

The president will add to the reminders this weekend when he tours the Joint POW-MIA Accounting Command, where he will be briefed on efforts to locate or account for all of the nearly 1,800 service members still missing from the Vietnam War.

Bush Arrives In Vietnam For Trade Talks (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, November 17, 2006

HANOI — Six years ago today, Bill Clinton became the first U.S. president to visit Hanoi and the first in more than three decades to visit Vietnam, closing a painful chapter in American diplomatic and military history.

When President Bush arrived today, he was shadowed by an issue that was politically difficult for him when he first ran for president, just as it was for Clinton: the question of military service during the Vietnam War. And there was new attention to an issue that is politically painful for him in 2006: whether the Iraq war is turning into a new generation's equivalent of the torturous Vietnam conflict.

Bush flew here this morning after a one-day stop in Singapore, where he warned North Korea not to spread its nuclear technology to nations or terrorist groups, and said the United States' partners in the region needed to recognize the threat that Pyongyang posed.

The president, speaking to government leaders and students at the National University of Singapore, said, "America's position is clear: The transfer of nuclear weapons or materiel by North Korea to states or non-state entities would be considered a grave threat to the United States, and we would hold North Korea fully accountable for the consequences of such action.

"For the sake of peace, it is vital that the nations of this region send a message to North Korea that the proliferation of nuclear technology to hostile regimes or terrorist networks will not be tolerated."

The audience was silent during his address and applauded politely when he was done.

Bush said he was committed to liberalized trade rules, despite what he noted were "the old temptations of isolationism and protectionism" in the United States.

He said the creation of a free-trade agreement among the 21 nations of the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation forum, whose summit this weekend has brought Bush to Vietnam, "deserves serious consideration."

Bush's less-than-enthusiastic endorsement suggested he might be backing off a goal to which the Clinton administration had committed the United States.

Trade liberalization has met a resurgent skepticism in the United States and drew criticism in several congressional campaigns this fall.

DOJ_NMG_0095712

In 1994, the economic forum, of which the U.S. is a member, called for "free and open trade and investment in the Asia-Pacific" by 2010 among developed nations, with developing nations following suit 10 years later.

A White House official said Bush still backed meeting the two deadlines, even though he used what the aide acknowledged was "softer" language to express the objective.

The summit is seen as Vietnam's debut on the world stage — as an economic engine in Southeast Asia and as a nation that has moved beyond the war. The communist government, however, still maintains strict one-party control, and dissidents say political freedom has yet to match the nation's economic progress.

Bush had hoped to win Congress' authorization normalizing trade relations with Vietnam before he arrived. But there were not enough votes this week to move the legislation through Congress.

Republican congressional leaders, who remain in charge during the lame-duck session, said they hoped to revisit the issue next month.

The question of whether Bush is leading the United States into a Vietnam-like quagmire in Iraq, which his critics increasingly argue is the case, has drawn sharp challenges from the president and his senior aides.

At a news conference the day after U.S. voters delivered what was largely interpreted as a rebuke to the president's Iraq policies, Bush said such an interpretation of the war was wrong.

He said that Iraq, "after the overthrow of the tyrant" Saddam Hussein, established a constitution and elected a unity government, "which is different from Vietnam" during and after the war. He said that the U.S. military was a volunteer force, not a draft-fed military, and that unlike in the Vietnam era, "the support for our troops is strong here in the United States."

"I don't think it is a parallel," he said.

Nevertheless, in the Iraq war, as was true in the Vietnam conflict, the population is divided, experts and politicians are split over whether the Pentagon should deploy more troops or be given a deadline to start pulling them out, and the mounting death toll of U.S. troops has brought a political backlash against the administration.

In Vietnam, Bush plans to focus more on current problems and not on the past, including the politically fraught question from his first presidential campaign that resurfaced in 2004: whether he used his father's clout to gain a coveted spot in the Texas Air National Guard to avoid being drafted at the height of the war.

On Saturday, Bush is scheduled to visit the U.S. military office in Hanoi, which is responsible for finding the remains of U.S. troops. It also investigates information about prisoners of war.

The United States has found no evidence that Americans are still being held as prisoners of war in Vietnam.

Bush's Trade Talk Diverges From Dems' (USAT)

By David Jackson

USA Today, November 17, 2006

SINGAPORE — President Bush pressed familiar points in Asia on Thursday on trade and anti-terrorism policies, but Democrats are making it clear the political environment has changed back home.

A week after his Republican Party lost control of Congress, Bush told an audience here that the United States wants to expand trade in Asia and work to restrict the spread of nuclear weapons, particularly from North Korea.

“We must seize on our common opportunities,” Bush said at the National University of Singapore. “We must be willing to confront our common threats.”

Bush noted that trade and nuclear proliferation are linked because technological advances that have helped expand trade also increase global threats. He warned that “irresponsible behavior by a few can have catastrophic consequences for the entire world.”

The president was to echo these themes today in Hanoi, Vietnam, where he is attending an economic summit of Asia-Pacific leaders. Bush, the fourth U.S. president to visit Vietnam, also will visit Communist Party headquarters for meetings with party leaders.

DOJ_NMG_0095713

This weekend, Bush will meet with leaders from Russia, China, Japan and South Korea — all key to helping curb North Korea's nuclear hopes.

In Washington, Democrats preparing to take charge of Congress next year challenged Bush over his approaches to free trade and North Korea, as well as the war in Iraq.

"The next few months will be a time of great transition here in Congress and hopefully in American foreign policy," Rep. Tom Lantos, D-Calif., said. Lantos will be the next chairman of the House International Relations Committee.

Lantos called for sending an American envoy directly to North Korea to negotiate a halt to its nuclear weapons program.

In his remarks, Bush again endorsed six-party talks that include China, Russia, Japan and South Korea, saying the region must send North Korea the message that "proliferation of nuclear technology to hostile regimes or terrorist networks will not be tolerated."

House Democrats dealt a blow to Bush's trade agenda Monday by blocking approval of normalized trade relations with Vietnam. Bush wanted the bill passed before today's trip to Hanoi, site of the annual Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation (APEC) forum.

Expanded trade is the linchpin of Bush's Asia policy. He noted in his speech Thursday that the United States does more business across the Pacific than the Atlantic.

"We hear voices calling for us to retreat from the world and close our doors," Bush said. "These are the old temptations of isolationism and protectionism, and America must reject them."

Bush called for U.S.-Asian cooperation on the environment, alternative energy sources and infectious diseases such as HIV, AIDS and avian flu.

Elizabeth Economy, director for Asia studies at the Council on Foreign Relations, said Bush's hopes for Asia are threatened by other problems such as Iraq.

"Even without the congressional defeat, U.S. influence and prestige have been seriously diminished by concern over Iraq and the state of the U.S. economy," she said.

Differing views could be found in Singapore, where international trade is reflected in miles of upscale shopping malls along the commercial strip on Orchard Road and food carts along the river.

Liu Chong Sin lamented Bush's "aggressiveness" while browsing in one of the many symbols of American capitalism, a Borders bookstore.

"He's caused a lot of trouble for the whole world, I believe," he said, citing the Iraq war and tensions with North Korea. Liu hopes pressure from the new Democratic Congress will "change" Bush.

Shi Yin, after shopping in one of the high-end boutiques on Orchard Road, said terrorists threaten prosperity everywhere, and Bush is right to confront them in Iraq and elsewhere because "there are times you need to be tough."

Bush Pushes Free Trade During Asia Trip (WSJ)

By Yochi J. Dreazen

The Wall Street Journal, November 17, 2006

SINGAPORE -- Kicking off an Asia swing overshadowed by political troubles at home and diplomatic disputes abroad, U.S. President George W. Bush fired back at newly empowered Democrats challenging his free-trade push.

North Korea's nuclear program also hangs over Mr. Bush's trip, his first since voters rebuked his Republican party at the polls last week. The president in his speech issued a stern warning to Pyongyang, vowing to hold it "fully accountable" for any transfer of nuclear-weapon technology to terrorist organizations.

On trade, the president urged Asian countries to work with the U.S. to rejuvenate a long-stalled round of global trade talks and endorsed the idea of a free-trade agreement with all 21 Pacific Rim members -- even as he felt compelled to rally support anew in his own government for such efforts.

"We hear voices calling for us to retreat from the world and close our doors to its opportunities," he told an audience at the National University of Singapore in his first major speech of the trip. "These are the old temptations of isolationism and protectionism, and America must reject them."

DOJ_NMG_0095714

Mr. Bush is bringing a range of objectives to his weeklong Asia trip, which will take him to Singapore, Vietnam and Indonesia. The centerpiece is a three-day stop in Hanoi for the Asia Pacific Economic Cooperation forum, where Mr. Bush is scheduled to sit down with a number of regional leaders, including Chinese President Hu Jintao on Sunday, to talk about trade, regional security and issues such as North Korea's nuclear program.

The trip comes at a sensitive moment for Mr. Bush, who has been weakened significantly by the Democrats' sweep of Congress. Russia and China have rebuffed White House efforts to pass a hard-hitting United Nations Security Council resolution designed to force Iran to rein in its nuclear program. The administration's handling of Iraq has also come under mounting criticism in the U.S., where members of both major political parties are hoping that a bipartisan Iraq panel headed by former Secretary of State James Baker can find a way out of the seemingly intractable mess there.

Lawmakers sent Mr. Bush off to Asia on a sour note by failing to pass legislation lifting Cold War-era economic restrictions on Vietnam and granting the country the same benefits as other U.S. trading partners in the World Trade Organization. Mr. Bush had hoped to arrive in Vietnam with the measure in place, but the administration now acknowledges that the measure won't come to another vote until December at the earliest.

More broadly, the Democratic takeovers of the House and Senate seem likely to force Mr. Bush to significantly curtail, if not abandon, his global free-trade ambitions. Many of the newly elected Democratic lawmakers campaigned on protectionist platforms, and their criticism of Mr. Bush's free-trade agenda is certain to imperil a raft of impending trade deals. Democrats are already gearing up to prevent the administration from keeping its authority to negotiate trade deals with other countries without congressional input. That issue will come to a vote next year.

Mr. Bush seemed tired during his speech, which contained no new policy proposals and none of the soaring rhetoric that has often been a hallmark of his public remarks. The auditorium where he delivered the speech was far from full, and several of the waiters who had set up food and drinks outside the hall said they were drafted at the last minute to help fill in several of the back rows of the room.

The president reserved his harshest language for North Korea, which sparked global outrage by successfully detonating a nuclear bomb last month. Mr. Bush said that the potential spread of weapons of mass destruction to terrorist groups was "the greatest danger in our world today." He added: "America's position is clear: The transfer of nuclear weapons or material by North Korea to states or nonstate entities would be considered a grave threat to the United States, and we would hold North Korea fully accountable for the consequences of such action."

Mr. Bush alternated the tough talk with conciliatory language, praising North Korea for agreeing to return to the so-called six-party talks that also include Japan, China, South Korea and Russia. The president said the U.S. would be willing to give North Korea security assurances and economic aid if it abandoned its nuclear program.

Bush Cautiously Backs Pacific Rim Free Trade (WP)

By Michael A. Fletcher

The Washington Post, November 17, 2006

SINGAPORE, Nov. 16 -- President Bush reassured Pacific Rim leaders Thursday that the United States stands squarely behind efforts to liberalize trade with the region, and he promised to continue pressuring North Korea to abandon its nuclear weapons program.

On the eve of an economic summit in Vietnam, Bush voiced tentative support for a free-trade agreement covering all 21 member states of the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation forum, saying during a speech here that the idea deserves "serious consideration."

In addition, the president again warned North Korea that the United States would consider it a "grave threat" and would hold North Korea responsible if it transfers nuclear bomb technology to another country or to a terrorist organization. He said North Korea should take "concrete steps" to end its nuclear program, and he called on other Asian countries to send the same message to Pyongyang.

DOJ_NMG_0095715

North Korea agreed last month to resume talks with five other nations on ending its nuclear weapons program, just three weeks after conducting its first nuclear weapons test. Diplomats hope talks among the two Koreas, China, Japan, Russia and the United States will take place by the end of the year, but no date has been fixed.

In comments to reporters at the APEC meeting in Hanoi, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said there was deep skepticism among the group's members that North Korea actually intended to abandon its nuclear weapons. [Bush landed in Hanoi on Friday morning, the Associated Press reported.]

Asked if she would favor delaying talks until she was certain North Korea would take steps to show its commitment, Rice said: "I don't think it makes sense for us to have talks unless we think that it's going to be fruitful. It certainly doesn't make sense just to go back to talk."

In his speech at the National University of Singapore, Bush also called on North Korea to take demonstrable action to show it is willing to end its weapons program. "Pyongyang must show it's serious . . . by taking concrete steps to implement its agreement to give up its nuclear weapons and weapons program," he said.

Bush added that if North Korea did so, the United States and other nations involved in the six-party talks would provide it with economic help, security assurances and other benefits.

Bush's visit to Southeast Asia comes on the heels of elections in which Democrats won majorities in both chambers of Congress, an outcome widely seen as a repudiation of the president's leadership.

Some analysts have said many nations in Southeast Asia, which have a generally warm view of Bush, see the United States as a pillar of stability in a region where Communist-run China is the dominant force.

With Bush weakened politically, they say, many leaders in this economically booming region doubt his power to deliver on his trade liberalization and other promises.

Bush suffered a disappointment this week when the House of Representatives failed to approve a measure to establish permanent normal trade relations with Vietnam. Bush had expressed hope that Congress would approve the measure before his trip to Hanoi, but House leaders now say they will not try again to pass the bill until next month.

Passage of the bill is needed for U.S. firms to take advantage of the low tariffs Vietnam will enact as a result of its recent membership in the World Trade Organization, and its failure to pass was viewed as a disappointment by the Vietnamese government.

In his address previewing issues he plans to emphasize during his week-long trip, Bush said the United States is serious about helping the region meet the challenges that could undermine its recent record of explosive economic growth. He cited efforts to develop alternative energy sources, fight pandemic diseases such as AIDS and avian flu, and combat terrorism.

Pointing out that the United States does more trade across the Pacific Ocean than across the Atlantic, Bush said he wants his administration to remain deeply involved in the region.

Before his speech, the president met with Singapore's prime minister, Lee Hsien Loong. Accompanied by his wife, Laura, he also visited the Asian Civilizations Museum, where the two listened to a performance of Asian fusion music.

Bush briefly tried his hand at the saron, an instrument similar to a xylophone, tapping out a passable rhythm with a rubber mallet.

The president is scheduled to stay three nights in Vietnam, then visit Indonesia and Honolulu before returning to Washington on Tuesday.

Bush Warns N. Korea On Nuclear Transfers (AP-Y)

By Terence Hunt, Ap White House Correspondent

AP, November 17, 2006

Hurt by election losses back home, President Bush tried to exert his authority on the world stage Thursday by warning a nuclear-armed North Korea against peddling its weapons and vowing the United States would not retreat into isolationism.

Bush's declaration came on the eve of his arrival in Vietnam for a summit of Asia-Pacific leaders and individual meetings with a handful of them — all curious about whether election setbacks had unsettled him. Striking moments for Bush in Hanoi will include a visit Friday to Communist Party headquarters for talks with the party's general secretary.

Bush directly challenged newly empowered Democrats in the U.S. who are demanding a fresh course in Iraq and are fearful that free-trade agreements could cost American jobs.

"We hear voices calling for us to retreat from the world and close our doors to these opportunities," the president said in a speech at the National University of Singapore. "These are the old temptations of isolationism and protectionism, and America must reject them."

Bush will turn to personal diplomacy in meetings Saturday and Sunday with Russia's Vladimir Putin, China's Hu Jintao, Japan's Shinzo Abe and South Korea's Roh Moo-hyun. All are partners with the United States in talks aimed at persuading a defiant North Korea to abandon its nuclear weapons.

While North Korea's recent nuclear test has been widely condemned, the 21 members of the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation forum appeared divided over what to say publicly.

Meanwhile, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, who went to Hanoi a day ahead of the president seeking a consensus, said Thursday that North Korea must come to new disarmament talks ready to deal — or there is no point in holding such a session.

"I do think that after having set off a nuclear test that the North Koreans need to do something to demonstrate that they actually are committed to denuclearization that goes beyond words," Rice said. "Because after having set off a nuclear test, there's some skepticism about that."

Bush said the transfer of nuclear weapons or material by North Korea to others would be "a grave threat to the United States and we would hold North Korea fully accountable for the consequences of such action."

"For the sake of peace," he said, "it is vital that the nations of this region send a message to North Korea that the proliferation of nuclear technology to hostile regimes or terrorist networks will not be tolerated."

Bush's visit to the one-time wartime capital of Hanoi brought inevitable comparisons between Iraq and the divisive war fought and lost in Vietnam more than three decades ago. Like Vietnam, the United States faces a determined insurgency in Iraq; both wars have demonstrated the limits of U.S. power.

"Historic parallels of that kind are, I think, not very helpful and I don't think they happen to be right," Rice told reporters on the way to Vietnam. "This is a different set of circumstances with different stakes for the United States in a different kind of war."

Bush is the fourth U.S. president to visit Vietnam, where communist forces prevailed over the United States in a conflict that claimed more than 58,000 American lives. The others were Lyndon Johnson, Richard Nixon and Bill Clinton.

Bush's message in Asia was clear: The United States has been influential there for more than six decades and isn't about to pull back now. Many nations in the region are nervous about the rise of China and how Washington will react.

Despite Bush's tough talk, he was unable to deliver a promised agreement to normalize trade with Vietnam. The accord was held up by a House still in Republican hands, sending a bad signal across Asia about Bush's clout and the future of trade-liberalizing bills in the Democratic Congress taking power in January.

"In this new century," Bush said, "America will remain engaged in Asia, because our interests depend on the expansion of freedom and opportunity in this region."

He said the United States sees its role in Asia, a region with a history of colonialism, as one of "partnership, not paternalism."

In Singapore, the president met with Prime Minister Lee Hsien Loong. He paid a courtesy call on acting President J.Y. Pillay and lauded Singapore's success at integrating its many ethnicities and religions by visiting its Asian Civilisations Museum.

Lee, who often has advised Bush on how to improve the U.S. image, particularly in the Muslim world, seemed pleased with the president's focus. "Singapore is very happy that America has a stake in the region, and is growing the stake in the region," Lee said.

With another foreign-policy priority pending on Capitol Hill — a civilian nuclear pact with India — Bush spoke by telephone from Singapore with Indian Prime Minister Manmohan Singh. The agreement has been approved by the House, and Bush told Singh that Republican Senate leaders have assured him they will act soon.

Bush, In Asia, Makes Appeal On North Korea (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0095717

By David E. Sanger And Helene Cooper

The New York Times, November 17, 2006

SINGAPORE, Nov. 16 — President Bush opened a five-day tour of Asia today with a warning that North Korea poses a significant risk of selling its nuclear technology or bomb-grade nuclear fuel to other nations or to terror groups. Mr. Bush urged Asian nations to enforce United Nations sanctions against North Korea.

Meanwhile, American officials in Hanoi, where foreign ministers gathered today before the opening of the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation meeting on Friday, said that the United States is working with China and other Asian allies to press North Korea to take a visible step towards dismantling its nuclear program.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, speaking with reporters in Hanoi, said that the coming resumption of long-running six-way talks with North Korea over its nuclear program would be pointless without shows of good faith from both sides.

Together, the statements by Mr. Bush and Ms. Rice suggest how much the issue of North Korea's newly acquired nuclear-power status is likely to dominate the APEC meeting, which usually focuses on trade issues.

Speaking at the National University of Singapore, Mr. Bush warned the North Korean government against aiding other nations, particularly in the Middle East, in their pursuit of nuclear weapons. He said there would be unspecified "grave consequences" if North Korea was ever caught shipping nuclear technology or weaponry abroad.

"The transfer of nuclear weapons or material by North Korea to states or non-state entities would be considered a grave threat to the United States, and we would hold North Korea fully accountable for the consequences of such action," Mr. Bush said. "For the sake of peace, it is vital that the nations of this region send a message to North Korea that the proliferation of nuclear technology to hostile regimes or terrorist networks will not be tolerated."

Mr. Bush did not directly mention Iran, but that was clearly the potential customer he had in mind.

Other senior administration officials have said in recent months that they are looking for evidence that North Korea is seeking to expand its dealings with Iran beyond the sale of missile technology. In a recent interview, Ms. Rice said that she had seen no such evidence that the two countries have cooperated in the nuclear arena.

Mr. Bush also sought to reassure American allies and trading partners that the United States was not on the retreat in the Pacific, just as China is rapidly expanding its influence throughout the region.

"In this new century, America will remain engaged in Asia, because our interests depend on the expansion of freedom and opportunity in this region," Mr. Bush said. "We hear voices calling for us to retreat from the world and close our doors to these opportunities. These are the old temptations of isolationism and protectionism, and America must reject them."

In these comments Mr. Bush appeared to be addressing members of his own Republican party who helped kill a deal that would have given control over several American seaport terminal operations to DP World, a company based in Dubai.

Many Republicans have also expressed reservations about free-trade agreements, even as the Bush administration has been pushing to revive stalled global trade talks.

In Hanoi, speaking after a breakfast meeting with some of her counterparts, Ms. Rice refused to say specifically what steps the United States and China are urging North Korea to take before the six-nation talks on its nuclear program resume, saying she did not want to negotiate in the press.

But other American officials said that the steps she had in mind could include the dismantling of one of the North's many nuclear facilities and the readmission of international inspectors.

The officials said they would like to see the dismantling begin with a facility like North Korea's five-megawatt reactor, which is continuing to produce nuclear fuel, or its plutonium reprocessing center, where spent reactor fuel can be turned into material for weapons.

"I do think that after setting off a nuclear test, the North Koreans need to do something to show they're committed to denuclearization that goes beyond words and just saying that they're committed to denuclearization," Ms. Rice said, "because after having set off a nuclear test, I think there's some skepticism about that."

Ms. Rice acknowledged that the United States will have to give a little to get a little. "There are principles on both sides, on denuclearization, and on movement toward the easing of tensions in economic and other relations" she said. "So I think, obviously, people will want to look at both."

But the main topic on the minds of American officials was on how to put enough pressure on the regime in Pyongyang to get real results out of the next round of negotiations.

That has been the rub in the disarmament talks, which have dragged on fitfully and inconclusively for several years before North Korea started boycotting them more than a year ago, angry over newly imposed American financial sanctions. Two weeks ago, China announced that the six-nation talks, which als include Russia, Japan and South Korea, would reconvene soon; American officials said at the time that the next meeting was likely in November or December.

But Kim Jong-il, the North Korean leader, is now known to have accelerated his pursuit of nuclear weapons even while his envoys participated in earlier rounds of talks. .Some analysts suspect that he has agreed to resume the talks now simply to forestall tough enforcement of the international sanctions prompted by Pyongyang's nuclear test and recent missile tests, and to persuade China and South Korea to ease his government's growing economic woes.

In fact, earlier this week, South Korea said it would not join a United States-led effort to intercept North Korean ships suspected of carrying unconventional weapons or related cargo. Even after the nuclear test, the government in Seoul has continued to hew to its policy of avoiding confrontation with the North.

Asked about that policy in Hanoi, Ms. Rice refused to publicly criticize South Korea. "Their context is different," she said, later adding that she did not have "any doubt that they are committed, and know they have to stay committed."

Privately, though, American officials have expressed frustration with South Korea, and say they are well aware of growing skepticism about whether the talks will succeed.

"The issue is, we really need this next round to be successful" and yield concrete results, one senior United States official said. "We can't emerge saying we set up a working group."

Given that friction, a face-to-face encounter between Mr. Bush and President Roh Moo-hyun of South Korea at the APEC meeting may well turn testy. Mr. Roh has been vocal in criticizing what he has called a one-sided American approach to North Korea.

American officials say that Mr. Roh told them in Washington before the nuclear test that a detonation by the North would "change everything" in inter-Korean relations. But now that it has happened, one of Mr. Bush's senior national security aides said in Washington before the president left, "It seems to have changed almost nothing."

Mr. Bush arrived this morning here in Singapore, one of Asia's most prosperous corners, and spent the day sightseeing and meeting with local leaders, including Singapore's prime minister, Lee Hsien Loong. The president's visit is seen as a gauge of whether his influence has been diminished by his party's sweeping defeat in the midterm elections last week.

Stopping over in Moscow Wednesday while his aircraft refueled, Mr. Bush and his wife, Laura, had a 90-minute visit with President Vladimir V. Putin, which the White House described as largely social.

But it included some exchanges about whether Russia would support a United Nations Security Council draft resolution imposing sanctions on Iran for its continued defiance regarding its nuclear program.

On the way here, Mr. Bush's national security adviser, Stephen Hadley, acknowledged that the two countries were still far apart on such sanctions.

"The issue is just what should be in the resolution," Mr. Hadley said after talking to his counterpart, Igor Ivanoff, in Moscow. "It's a little bit like sausage making — it's not pretty, and a lot of it spills out into the public. But I think the international community has held together on this issue, and I think we will again."

Russia has deep economic ties to Iran's nuclear power program: it is the supplier of nuclear reactors that are now under construction there. And Russia has expressed reluctance to impose sanctions, saying they would undercut efforts to reach a negotiated settlement. Bush administration officials make little secret of their frustration that Iran is still enriching uranium as the year draws to a close.

Asked about seeking Iran's help with ending violence in Iraq while pressing it at the same time on the nuclear issue, Mr. Hadley said the administration had no intention of easing up on one to win Iran's help on the other. "There's not a tradeoff between the two," he said. "Iran ought to have an interest in having a unified and stable Iraq."

In Moscow, the Kremlin's spokesman, Dmitry Peskov, described the meeting of the presidents and their wives as brief but "very positive." He said that among the subjects they took up was an agreement, already announced, for Russia to enter the World Trade Organization. When Mr. Bush travels to Hanoi on Friday, he will face a more difficult trade issue: Congress balked at final passage of a bill that would normalize trade relations with Vietnam.

Mr. Bush had hoped to have that bill approved and ready to bring with him; instead, Mr Hadley said, he will tell the Vietnamese that he believed the problems in Congress over the matter — some with Bush's own Republican allies — will soon be resolved.

Vietnam Rolls Out Red Carpet For Bush (FT)

By Amy Kazmin And Caroline Daniel

Financial Times, November 17, 2006

Vietnam's communist rulers will on Friday suppress their irritation at the US rejection of a trade bill and roll out a red carpet for President George W. Bush. They are keen to deepen a relationship crucial to their country's future prosperity.

But the second US presidential visit since the end of the Vietnam war has spawned little of the public enthusiasm generated by Bill Clinton's ground-breaking trip six years ago.

As a Hanoi National University student at the time, Huy, now a 28-year-old IT professional, was thrilled to be among several hundred students invited to hear the then US president speak.

But as he sipped espresso and surfed the internet at a Hanoi café on Thursday night, Mr Huy expressed indifference towards Friday's arrival of Mr Bush. Initially describing his opinions as "too sensitive" to share, Mr Huy, who asked that his full name not be used, admitted he was unhappy with Mr Bush's decision to go to war in Iraq. "He is fighting so many countries," he said. "In the past, we were fighting so much, so we like peace. We hate war."

Such lukewarm sentiment towards the White House's current occupant seems widely shared on the streets of Hanoi, where questions about Mr Bush's visit are met with platitudes, rather than genuine enthusiasm. "We welcome Mr Bush as our visitor," said a young employee of a securities company, before acknowledging, "I liked Mr Clinton so much more."

The apathy over the visit does stem in part from a visceral antipathy towards the US military intervention in Iraq. Yet the striking change in attitude also reflects Vietnam's economic progress – and rising self-confidence – since euphoric Vietnamese lined the roads to welcome Mr Clinton, a gesture of an overwhelming desire to bury past enmity once and for all.

"It's comparing apples and oranges," said Adam Sitkoff, a former Clinton staffer, now executive director of the American Chambers of Commerce in Hanoi. "The Clinton visit was the first post-war visit by a US president, and it was back at a time when Vietnam hadn't integrated into the world economy as much.

"George Bush is coming here to see a Vietnam that is now a friendly country of the US, and that has normalised relations with the US," he said. "The types of discussions he is going to have here are very different than the types of discussions Mr Clinton had here."

Mr Bush's schedule – devoted primarily to meeting other leaders attending the Asia-Pacific Economic Co-operation forum summit – also suggests the administration sees little symbolism in the visit.

While a US administration official said Mr Bush did hope to "open a new chapter in US-Vietnam relations", the failure of the US House of Representatives to approve a bill to normalise trade relations with Vietnam permanently has cast a symbolic shadow over the visit, and raised the prospect that Hanoi will join the World Trade Organisation with US companies unable to take full advantage of its market opening.

Still, Hanoi is keen to strengthen further its relationship with Washington, which is better than ever before. Although two-way trade is now at $9bn (€7bn, £4.8bn) – making the US Vietnam's largest trading partner – "the potential re-mains huge between the two countries," Nguyen Tang Dung, the Vietnamese premier, said. "It is the consistent policy of the government of Vietnam to move forward, and push relations with the Americans."

Washington, too, is also keen to explore how to further links with a country strategically located on China's southern border, despite its concerns about the communist-ruled country's lack of political freedom and human rights violations.

Hanoi has sought to address some of Washington's preoccupations, particularly on religious freedom, leading to its removal this week from Washington's list of countries that repress religious worship.

DOJ_NMG_0095720

Hanoi and Washington have also recently begun tentative military-to-military co-operation – with US warships docking at Vietnamese ports and senior Vietnamese military officers going to the US for study and training. "There is, I think, overall a very good sense that Vietnam is moving on the right path, that we ought to be engaged on it," said Derek Mitchell, a senior fellow in international security at the Center for Strategic and International Studies.

Yet the administration is torn over how far to pursue the ties, given what Washington sees as a clash over some key values. As Mr Mitchell puts it: "There is a debate within the administration, of course, of how strategic can Vietnam be, given it is 'communist Vietnam'."

Seoul Backs UN Vote Attacking N Korea (FT)

By Anna Fifield

Financial Times, November 17, 2006

South Korea on Thursday said it would vote in favour of a United Nations resolution condemning North Korea for its human rights record, an about-face from its traditional practice of avoiding antagonising its neighbour.

The shift comes as Ban Ki-moon, the former foreign minister, prepares to take over the running of the UN, a move that has contributed to Seoul's realisation that it cannot stay silent about what it sees as one of the world's worst human rights situations.

The General Assembly was expected to vote late on Thursday on the resolution drafted by the European Union, the US, and Japan that urges Pyongyang to "fully respect all human rights and fundamental freedoms, and expend its full co-operation to the [UN's] special rapporteur" on North Korean human rights.

South Korea's foreign ministry said: "The government has decided to approve the resolution, and expects the decision to make contributions to the improvement of human rights as a universal value and serve as a stepping stone to facilitate concrete dialogue and co-operation between North Korea and the international community in the field of human rights, which is needed more urgently after the nuclear test."

Song Min-soon, the incoming foreign minister, said on Thursday that the nuclear test and missile launches contributed to the change in position. Meanwhile, Kim Jang-soo, the incoming defence minister, said that "North Korea is a direct threat", according to the Associated Press.

Seoul abstained from three previous UN votes on North Korean human rights to avoid jeopardising its attempts to foster closer economic and political ties with its neighbour, a pattern that irked many in the EU and the US who have been pushing for international condemnation of Pyongyang's rights record.

The development comes amid public dissatisfaction with the government's "sunshine policy" of engagement after last month's nuclear test and increasing divisions among policymakers over how to respond.

Officials in the foreign ministry are understood to be promoting taking a tougher line on human rights but to be encouraging the resumption of humanitarian aid suspended after the July missile launches.

US Panel Seeks Broader Sanctions Against China (AFP)

By P. Parameswaran

AFP, November 17, 2006

A US Congress-appointed panel sought broader sanctions against Chinese firms proliferating unconventional weapons and wanted Beijing to inspect ships plying to or from nuclear-armed North Korea's ports.

The United States-China Economic and Security Review Commission said in its annual report that current sanctions against Chinese companies that proliferate equipment and technology related to weapons of mass destruction should be "broadened and harmonized for increased effectiveness."

The 12-member bipartisan panel wanted Congress to urge the government "to seek agreement with China to carry out inspections at sea of ships bound to or from North Korean ports, and establish a US-China joint operation to inspect for contraband shipping containers" to or from the Stalinist state.

They were among 44 recommendations in the commission's 234-page report to Congress. It was written after eight hearings this year and a flurry of meetings, including with US defense and Chinese government and Communist Party officials and scholars.

DOJ_NMG_0095721

Noting that China had contributed at least indirectly to North Korea's nuclear weapons program and aided Iran's atomic activities, the commission warned that "Chinese proliferation threatens US security and potentially could place at risk US troops" operating in East Asia and the Middle East.

In June, the United States imposed sanctions on four Chinese companies linked to providing support for Iran's Aerospace Industries Organization, a key actor in developing Iran's missile program.

All of the firms had been sanctioned previously under US laws.

"Chinese companies and government organizations continue to proliferate weapons, weapons components and weapons technology," the report said.

"Some of these transfers violate China's international nonproliferation agreements, harm regional security in East Asia and the Middle East, and are a measure of China's failure to meet the threshold test of international responsibility in the area of nonproliferation," it said.

Following UN Security Council sanctions in October against North Korea for a nuclear weapons test, China said it would not be involved in interdicting North Korean ships on the open seas, but did agree to inspect cargo passing through its territory.

Washington has acknowledged that China has begun inspecting trucks traveling across China's border to North Korea.

The commission's chairman, Larry Wortzel, in releasing its report Thursday, said that "while China is a global actor, its sense of responsibility has not kept up with its expanding power."

As the world moved to address problems such as proliferation of ballistic missile technology and weapons of mass destruction, "the Chinese government has, at the least, stood in the way, and in some cases actively contributed to the underlying problems," said commission vice chairman Carolyn Bartholomew.

The commission urged Congress to instruct the US government to insist that China take "more significant measures" to denuclearize the Korean peninsula and counter North Korean proliferation activities.

China is the major source of aid and trade for impoverished North Korea.

The commission also asked the US director of national intelligence to establish a more effective program for assessing the implications of China's military modernization and development.

The report said that notwithstanding China's "commendable efforts" to persuade North Korea to remain involved in multilateral talks aimed at ending Pyongyang's nuclear weapons program, Beijing has "refused to use its leverage effectively."

It said that China also had refused to cooperate in efforts by a number of nations to persuade or force Iran to halt its military nuclear program.

Attach Conditions To U.S.-Vietnam Trade (USAT)

By Aimee Phan

USA Today, November 17, 2006

For many Vietnamese-Americans, a trial last week in Vietnam was their worst nightmare realized.

Three Vietnamese-Americans were convicted on terrorism charges last Friday. Along with four Vietnamese nationals, they were found guilty of plotting to use radio equipment to call for a public insurgency against the Communist regime. The defendants were accused of having ties with the Government of Free Vietnam, which Hanoi regards as a terrorist organization. According to its website, the California-based pro-democracy group claims to advocate peaceful protest against the current regime.

What does the verdict say to other Vietnamese-Americans, many of whom have returned on occasion to visit their homeland? It says that should they return again to Vietnam, even for a visit, that they remain vulnerable to the whims of the Communist regime.

The defendants were sentenced to 15 months with 14 months time served. One of the American citizens has already been deported to the USA; the nationals will remain under house arrest.

The trial's timing has drawn global attention, especially because President Bush is scheduled to visit Hanoi today for the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation Summit. On Monday, the House defeated a bill that would have permanently eased U.S.

trade restrictions against Vietnam. While Republicans plan to revive the bill, several members of Congress have cited concerns about Vietnam's record on human rights.

The case gives the Bush administration an opportunity to leverage trade relations with Vietnam in exchange for improved human rights policies. The fact that these defendants were held for more than a year before being charged, without chance of bail or access to the evidence used against them, only validates fears among Vietnamese-Americans that Vietnam is still a hostile environment and doesn't yet deserve normalized relations with the United States. The case also raises the question of what constitutes an act of terrorism. In Vietnam today, terrorism apparently includes merely voicing a view critical of the government.

In its eagerness to join the World Trade Organization and strengthen U.S. ties, Vietnam claims to have moved past the war. But such rhetoric rings painfully insincere in light of this case. Views of dissent are apparently still seen as dangerous.

Vietnamese refugees made the USA their home to escape the political persecution that still occurs in Vietnam. Now they'd like to see the United States use its diplomatic influence to press Vietnam to reconsider these detrimental policies.

U.S. Economic Leadership (WP)

The Washington Post, November 17, 2006

THE ANNUAL summits of the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation forum became a fixture in the 1990s partly because the United States hoped to use them to open Asian markets. But President Bush's presence in Vietnam for this year's APEC gathering highlights faltering U.S. economic leadership. Mr. Bush hoped to arrive bearing Congress's blessing for Vietnam's accession to the World Trade Organization. But this prize has eluded him. Meanwhile, the APEC summit has rekindled hopes of progress on the Doha round of international trade talks. But the U.S. ability to participate constructively in those talks will soon expire, because Mr. Bush's trade-promotion authority runs out next summer. A Democratic Congress seems unlikely to renew it.

The Vietnam deal in particular demonstrates the perversity of congressional obstructionism on trade. U.S. negotiators have helped to secure access to Vietnam's markets as a condition for its joining the World Trade Organization. The negotiation is complete, and Vietnam will join the WTO irrespective of what Congress says. But Congress does have the power to shoot itself in the foot: If it refuses to ratify the deal, other WTO members will enjoy the market access that Vietnam has promised while the United States is denied it. An attempt to pass enabling legislation failed in the House this week, and a second attempt was pushed into December.

Congress is also sending confused signals on a trio of trade preferences due for renewal. One preference bill would extend trade concessions to four Andean countries -- Colombia, Peru, Bolivia and Ecuador -- that will otherwise expire at the end of this year. Another would help textile producers in Africa and Haiti. Yet a third would extend the Generalized System of Preferences, which helps more than 100 countries. Colombia's president, Alvaro Uribe, said last week that the risk of nonrenewal has already caused U.S. apparel companies to switch orders away from his country. Colombia is a pro-American democracy struggling against drug lords. This is not the way to treat it.

The preference bills are threatened by a minority in Congress who represent vulnerable textile regions and a majority that is supportive but lethargic. But even if Congress eventually bestirs itself to pass these measures, a fiercer battle will be joined on free-trade pacts that Mr. Bush has negotiated with Peru and Colombia. Both deals build on the market access granted by the preferences and end the periodic scramble for renewal; both would offer the United States new export opportunities. But the Democrats want to use their new majority status to write in tougher labor and environmental provisions. Reopening these deals will delay and possibly kill them, and the premise for doing so is wrong: The elected leaders of Peru and Colombia don't need the threat of trade sanctions to care about environmental damage or harsh labor practices that affect their citizens. By holding up trade deals that could raise living standards and provide alternatives to slash-and-burn agriculture, the Democrats will help neither workers nor the environment.

The world's trading system has been progressively opened since 1945, largely thanks to U.S. leadership. This has been one of the great achievements of the American era; denying the economic evidence that trade boosts growth is like denying the scientific evidence for climate change. Because the expansion of trade has coincided with a rise in inequality, many American voters are understandably skeptical of its benefits. But the Democrats must respond to that concern by implementing tax and spending policies that distribute prosperity more evenly, not by abandoning the nation's role as the chief driver of trade liberalization.

Russia's Role In Asia (WT)

By Vladimir Putin

The Washington Times, November 17, 2006

Since 1998, Russia has been a full-fledged member of the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation (APEC). In the run-up to the APEC summit in Vietnam, I would like to share my views about the road traveled by this multilateral association and, naturally, about the prospects for our cooperation.

In the 17 years since the creation of the forum, it has grown into one of the most representative and established organizations to promote integration in Asia and the Pacific. Today, APEC member nations comprise the world's most dynamically developing economic zone, and our experts predict that the forum's leading positions will become even stronger.

As a Eurasian power, Russia's plans for social and economic development (particularly in Siberia and the Far East) are closely linked with active participation in regional integration. For us this is a natural and strategically necessary approach.

First of all, we appreciate APEC's expertise in working out rules for trade, economic and investment cooperation. Needless to say, cooperation in this sphere is largely guided by World Trade Organization criteria. Russia has not yet joined the WTO, but we closely watch its activities and take part in them whenever possible, specifically by joining in efforts to reduce transaction costs and excessive state regulation of the economy, and to improve national economic legislation.

We understand APEC's goals of consolidating the fundamentals of the market economy and invigorating public-private partnership with a view to encouraging medium-sized and small businesses and promoting social development. We are very interested in the formation and proper functioning of various free trade zones within APEC. We are thoroughly studying APEC countries as models for improving our domestic investment environment, as well as their experience in fighting corruption. They are of practical importance for our reforms, which are aimed at building up and diversifying Russia's foreign economic contacts.

We fully share the economic and social aspirations of APEC's members. In this respect, we value the forum's assessment of Russia's individual action plan in APEC.

At the upcoming summit in Hanoi, we are going to discuss a plan of action to implement the already approved "roadmap" for achieving the Bogor goals. We have high expectations for this project, and we hope that it will become a major step towards building a system of free and open trade and investment in the region.

At the same time, it is obvious that the road to achieving these goals is not as easy as it might have seemed during the adoption of the Bogor Declaration and the Osaka Action Plan. We are well aware of changes in the world's political and economic situation and of new challenges. The latter, by threatening international security and stability, hinder normal economic development both worldwide and in individual regions. The APEC forum and its members should take into account these ongoing changes. I believe it is necessary to avoid a situation in which the rigid formulas set for the Bogor Declaration contradict the logic of global development and the real potentialities of the APEC economies.

APEC was formed primarily as an economy-focused multilateral mechanism, but real life is continuously placing issues of international and regional politics on its agenda.

One of its key goals is countering international terrorism. The APEC members and other countries of Asia and the Pacific are at different levels of development. It is no secret that terrorists are actively seeking a "temporary shelter" in some of the less prosperous regions. Therefore, along with measures to eliminate hotbeds of terrorism, it is essential to completely eradicate the social roots of terrorism — poverty, hunger and chronic unemployment. In general, it is important to bridge the gap in the social and economic development of nations.

I am convinced that APEC will provide us with quite a few opportunities to achieve this goal. We must help the poorest countries in their efforts to encourage public-private partnership, investment and other economic activities. To this end, APEC should primarily use its own funds, as well as money provided by international organizations and financial institutions for specific projects.

The humanitarian and ideological aspects of the struggle against terrorism are no less important. APEC's initiative to promote dialogue between cultures and religions is especially significant in this respect. Asia and the Pacific is a region of unique cultural and ethnic diversity, and it should develop immunity to the ideology of confrontation between civilizations, as well as to nationalism and extremism. I am certain that APEC's spirit of trust, tolerance and partnership will help fulfill this task. I believe it is highly symbolic that Indonesia and Russia, with their unique multi-ethnic populations professing different religions, have played a major role in drafting this initiative.

It is necessary to continue efforts to eliminate funding for terrorism. APEC has been clear enough in setting this goal, which is further evidence of its ability to adapt itself to the realities of today. I would like to emphasize Russia's preparedness to take an active part in working with its partners to reach this goal.

We are also open to cooperation with APEC in the fight against organized crime, drug trafficking and arms smuggling. I am sure that our countries' law-enforcement bodies can do more than simply exchange relevant information. We should plan and implement coordinated actions against criminals.

It is extremely important to ensure the security of transportation and information. This is one of the major conditions for trade and telecommunications, which are vital for the vast Asia-Pacific region. Governments and the business community are equally interested in ensuring their normal functioning and dependable protection against criminals.

Russia recently made a specific contribution to cooperation in this sphere by putting forward an initiative in the framework of APEC's counterterrorism task force. This proposal calls for creating a system to protect key energy facilities that would allow for a prompt response to emerging threats.

International energy security plays a key role in economic development. We acknowledge that this is an urgent matter for many APEC members due to rising global oil prices.

As a major supplier of energy to world markets, Russia is open to cooperation in this sphere. We are convinced that the terms should be beneficial for all partners. They should rest on the mutual responsibility of energy producers and consumers, a fair distribution of risks between them and an exchange of assets in the energy sector. I'd like to mention that the plan of action approved at the Group of Eight (G-8) summit in St. Petersburg provides for measures to enhance the transparency, predictability, and stability of energy markets, and to improve the investment climate as a whole. Along with these measures, it is important to develop energy-saving technologies, and to diversify types of energy sources and their transportation routes. It is also necessary to take practical steps to ensure the safety of the energy infrastructure, help energy-starved countries and tackle environmental problems.

All these issues are particularly important now that APEC is increasingly interested in having a new, more reliable energy system. Russia is prepared to take an active part in implementing this large-scale initiative. Moreover, we are going to propose and implement a number of specific infrastructure projects, specifically, the construction of oil and gas pipelines to supply Asia and the Pacific with hydrocarbons from eastern Russia. I believe that APEC has the capability to guarantee continuous delivery of energy to the region.

In addition, cooperation in APEC opens up new possibilities in the fight against infectious diseases. It is in our common interest to establish an effective system for exchanging information and making coordinated decisions in order to combat epidemics and pandemics. We fully support the development of an APEC partnership to create an early-warning system for emergencies in the region and jointly deal with their aftermath.

We are extremely interested in APEC's interaction experience in innovation, especially in developing nanotechnologies and exchanging information in such high-tech areas as IT and biotechnologies. Russia is committed to invigorating cooperation in these and other spheres, which will determine scientific and technical progress in the near future. It goes without saying that the APEC nations should pay greater attention to the development of cooperation in education.

In conclusion, I'd like to emphasize that we are optimistic about APEC's future. We are capable of meeting new challenges and steadily moving towards our common development goals. The main topic of the forthcoming summit in Vietnam — "building a dynamic community for sustainable development and prosperity" — clearly shows the direction of this movement.

DOJ_NMG_0095725

Russia, having made the important decision to work with APEC, intends to take a vigorous part in addressing future challenges together with other members.

I am convinced that APEC, which has already achieved impressive results, is capable of accomplishing much more for the benefit of our nations and for the promotion of peace, stability and progress in our shared region.

Vladimir Putin is president of Russia.

Don't Give Up On Russia (WP)

By Jim Hoagland

The Washington Post, November 17, 2006

For George W. Bush, meeting Vladimir Putin is no longer an uplifting opportunity to look into the Russian leader's eyes and glimpse a kindred soul. Their encounters have become exercises in damage limitation or unavoidable bits of scheduling during international conferences.

In private talks with aides and foreign leaders in recent months, Bush has voiced profound disillusionment with Putin, according to a half-dozen foreign and U.S. officials aware of the details of such conversations.

"We have lost Putin," Bush is reported to have said in several conversations. "Putin fears democracy more than anything else," the president added sadly in one comment describing the Russian, whom Bush had praised enthusiastically after their first summit in June 2001 as "straightforward and trustworthy" and a partner for "a new approach for a new era."

Bush and his aides work hard to observe diplomatic formalities and to keep signs of this disillusionment out of public view. So the two leaders exchanged smiles and a hug when Bush briefly stopped over in Moscow this week on his way to the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation summit in Hanoi, where Bush and Putin are due to meet again on Sunday.

But the thrill is gone -- just as earlier attempts by Bush's father and Mikhail Gorbachev, and by Bill Clinton and Boris Yeltsin, to base White House-Kremlin ties on personal relations ended in disappointment and frustration on both sides. American and Russian presidents seem condemned to challenge and then confirm the maxim that nations have interests, not friends.

As recently as May -- when Vice President Cheney delivered a forceful but seemingly personal denunciation of Russia's backsliding on democratic freedoms -- Bush was still emphasizing the need to work with Putin. But by the time of the Group of Eight summit hosted by Putin in July, Bush had begun to echo in private Cheney's darker public vision, and he amplified on it later in closed-door sessions held in September at the opening session of the U.N. General Assembly and elsewhere.

And when Putin cavalierly dismissed the assassination of Russian dissident journalist Anna Politkovskaya last month, Bush made his own statement of concern about the killing rather than let an earlier, weaker State Department reaction stand as the U.S. response.

The turn by Bush has been cumulative rather than sudden, as I understand it, and is fueled primarily by the president's reluctant but hardening conviction that Putin has no desire or intention to make Russia's society more democratic. Russian equivocation on the joint U.S.-European effort to prevent Iran from developing nuclear weapons is another important factor in the downturn.

It is easy to understand why Bush has dropped his earlier enthusiasm for Putin. But Washington and Moscow have two looming opportunities to put political and trade relations on a sounder footing and make their relationship less vulnerable to personal ups and downs.

At the NATO summit in Riga, Latvia, at the end of this month, Bush may be tempted to go back on a tentative compromise that Washington has struck with its European and Canadian allies concerning future alliance membership for Georgia and Ukraine. The United States has agreed not to push for the meeting to adopt a clear membership plan for the two former Soviet republics and to settle instead for a more cosmetic "intensified dialogue" with Georgia and silence on Ukraine.

The compromise still makes sense. Cooling the escalating tensions between Russia and Georgia should be the urgent priority, especially after Georgia's unsteady handling of recent border incidents and the publicizing of the discovery of a bumbling Russian spy ring in Tbilisi. The collapse of Ukraine's reform government robs that country of any national consensus on NATO membership.

DOJ_NMG_0095726

The second opportunity will provide an early test in foreign policy for the new Democratic majorities in the U.S. House and Senate. The administration has reached a bilateral agreement with Russia on the latter's application to join the World Trade Organization. But Congress must drop the symbolic Cold War restrictions on trade contained in the 1974 Jackson-Vanik law for the new accord to come into effect.

Jackson-Vanik, which attempted to exert pressure on the Soviet Union to permit Jewish emigration to Israel, is a carryover from a time gone by. Its sentimental value is far less than the irritation it creates in a relationship that needs more ballast, not more burrs.

Bush's clearing vision of Putin's flaws and the American leader's candor with his peers are welcome developments. But they make it even more important for the United States and Russia to seize opportunities that reinforce a relationship that cannot for long be dominated by personal ties. Just ask George H.W. and Gorby, or Bill and Boris.

Nuclear Deal With India Wins Senate Backing (NYT)

By Thom Shanker

The New York Times, November 17, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 16 — The Senate gave overwhelming approval late Thursday to President Bush's deal for nuclear cooperation with India, a vote expressing that a goal of nurturing India as an ally outweighed concerns over the risks of spreading nuclear skills and bomb-making materials.

By a vote of 85 to 12, senators agreed to a program that would allow the United States to send nuclear fuel and technology to India, which has refused to sign the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty.

The agreement, negotiated by President Bush and Prime Minister Manmohan Singh of India in March, calls for the United States to end a long moratorium on sales of nuclear fuel and reactor components. For its part, India would divide its reactor facilities into civilian and military nuclear programs, with civilian facilities open to international inspections.

Critics have been unwavering in arguing that the pact would rally nations like North Korea and Iran to press ahead with nuclear weapons programs despite international complaints and threats. Opponents of the measure also warned that the deal would allow India to build more bombs with its limited stockpile of radioactive material, and could spur a regional nuclear arms race with Pakistan and China.

Senator Richard G. Lugar, the Indiana Republican who is chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, hailed the measure's passage as "one more important step toward a vibrant and exciting relationship between our two great democracies."

His endorsement was significant, coming from a senator respected for efforts in nonproliferation and whose name is part of a sweeping program to secure nuclear bomb-making materials in the former Soviet Union. He also expressed "thanks for a truly bipartisan effort" to Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr., the Delaware Democrat set to become Foreign Relations chairman in the new Congress.

While advocates of the measure said it would be an incentive for India to refrain from nuclear tests, denunciations came quickly from a minority of senators who opposed it, as well as from critics in the House.

"It is a sad day for U.S. national security when the Senate passes a sweeping exemption to our nonproliferation laws that will allow India to increase its annual bomb-production capacity from 7 to over 40 bombs a year," said Representative Edward J. Markey, co-chairman of the House Bipartisan Taskforce on Nonproliferation. He said the measure "sends the wrong signal at a time when the world is trying to prevent Iran from getting the bomb."

After the vote, the White House issued a statement from President Bush praising passage of the bill.

"The United States and India enjoy a strategic partnership based upon common values," the statement said. "The U.S.-India Civil Nuclear Cooperation agreement will bring India into the international nuclear nonproliferation mainstream and will increase the transparency of India's entire civilian nuclear program."

The Senate rejected several amendments that sponsors said would clarify or narrow the deal, including one that would have required India to halt all military relations with Iran. The legislation, as passed, does contain a new provision that requires the president to declare that India has joined multinational efforts to contain Iran's nuclear program before the United States-India nuclear deal moves forward.

DOJ_NMG_0095727

The Senate legislation now must be matched to the House version, which passed in July by a vote of 359 to 68; both chambers then must approve the final language. Even with Senate approval, the package will not move forward until both houses agree to specifics of a nuclear-cooperation accord with India. A complementary deal between India and the International Atomic Energy Agency also must be reached.

When the plan was announced, India pledged to classify 14 of its 22 nuclear reactors as civilian facilities. That would put those reactors under international inspections for the first time. But other reactors would remain under Indian military jurisdiction, and not open to inspectors.

After India and Pakistan conducted surprise nuclear tests about eight years ago, the Clinton administration imposed economic sanctions on both countries. But the Bush administration's effort to enlist allies for its global antiterrorism campaign brought an end to those sanctions.

Senate Endorses U.S.-India Nuclear Deal (AP-Y)

By Foster Klug, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 17, 2006

The Senate on Thursday overwhelmingly endorsed a plan allowing the United States to ship civilian nuclear fuel and technology to India, handing President Bush an important victory on one of his top foreign policy initiatives.

Senior lawmakers from both political parties championed the proposal, which reverses decades of U.S. anti-proliferation policy, saying it strengthens a key relationship with a friendly Asian power that has long maintained what the United States considers a responsible nuclear program. The vote was 85-12.

Sen. Richard Lugar, R-Ind., called the plan "a lasting incentive" for India to shun future nuclear weapons tests and "to cooperate closely with the United States in stopping proliferation."

Bush, in a statement issued during a trip to Asia, praised the Senate for endorsing his plan, saying it will "bring India into the international nuclear nonproliferation mainstream and will increase the transparency of India's entire civilian nuclear program."

His remarks were echoed by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, in Vietnam with the president for a meeting of Asia-Pacific leaders. "This really does open up an extraordinary new era, both in U.S.-Indian relations, but also I think for the many interests that will served, from the economic point of view, from an energy point of view and from a nonproliferation point of view," she said.

Democratic Sen. Joseph Biden of Delaware said the endorsement pushes America "a giant step closer" to a "major shift in U.S.-Indian relations. "If we are right, this shift will increase the prospect for stability and progress in South Asia and in the world at large," he said.

Even with the strong approval by the Senate, however, several hurdles loom before India and the United States could begin civil nuclear trade.

First on that list, lawmakers in the House, which overwhelmingly endorsed the plan in July, and the Senate must now reconcile their versions into a single bill before the next congressional session begins in January. That bill would then be sent to Bush for his signature.

Critics argued that the plan would ruin the world's nonproliferation regime and boost India's nuclear arsenal. The extra civilian nuclear fuel that the deal would provide, they say, could free India's domestic uranium for use in its weapons program. Pakistan and China could respond by increasing their nuclear stockpiles, sparking a regional arms race.

Sen. Byron Dorgan, D-N.D., called the agreement "a horrible mistake" that "provides a green light" for India to produce more nuclear weapons. "I believe one day we will look back at this with great regret," he said.

During debate Thursday, supporters beat back changes they said would have killed the proposal by making it unacceptable to India. Critics said the changes were necessary to guard against nuclear proliferation.

Sen. Barbara Boxer, D-Calif., unsuccessfully proposed a condition that would have required India to cut off military-to-military ties with Iran before allowing civil nuclear cooperation.

Rep. Ed Markey of Massachusetts, a Democratic critic in the House, said the Senate's endorsement of the proposal "sends the wrong signal at a time when the world is trying to prevent Iran from getting" a nuclear bomb. The plan, he said, would set "a precedent that other nations can invoke when they seek nuclear cooperation with countries that also refuse to abide by nonproliferation rules."

The bill carves out an exemption in American law to allow U.S. civilian nuclear trade with India in exchange for Indian safeguards and inspections at its 14 civilian nuclear plants; eight military plants would be off-limits.

Congressional action is necessary because U.S. law bars nuclear trade with countries that have not submitted to full international inspections. India built its nuclear weapons program outside the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty, which provides civil nuclear trade in exchange for a pledge from nations not to pursue nuclear weapons.

There are other necessary steps before U.S.-Indian nuclear cooperation could begin. An exception for India must be made by the Nuclear Suppliers Group, an assembly of nations that export nuclear material. Indian officials also must negotiate a safeguard agreement with the U.N. nuclear watchdog.

And once technical negotiations on an overall cooperation agreement are settled between India and the United States, the U.S. Congress would then hold another vote on the overall deal.

US Senate Approves India Nuclear Deal (FT)

By Jo Johnson And Farhan Bokhari And Edward Luce

Financial Times, November 17, 2006

The US Senate on Thursday night approved the Bush administration's historic deal to legalise nuclear trade with India, an important step in the ending of a 30-year-old technology denial regime.

The deal was approved in a 85-12 vote after the Republican-led Senate defeated several amendments that India had said would kill the deal, including a requirement that New Delhi end military cooperation with Iran.

Several more critical approvals - by Congress, the International Atomic Energy Agency and the 45-nation Nuclear Suppliers Group - are needed before the agreement can take effect. But the Senate vote means India is getting closer to being able to purchase US nuclear fuel, reactors and related technology.

The approval came despite concerns that the deal would encourage India to expand its nuclear weapons arsenal and spur a regional arms race with nuclear rivals Pakistan and China.

Washington is especially concerned that China's President Hu Jintao will give the green light to an ambitious expansion of Beijing's controversial nuclear co-operation with Pakistan during his visit to Islamabad next week.

The delicacy of south Asia's nuclear balance was underscored on Thursday as Pakistan test-fired a nuclear capable medium-range missile, a day after peace talks with New Delhi.

The medium-range missile, which can hit targets at a distance of 1,300km, was launched to mark the end of military exercises being held at an undisclosed location, an army statement said. Pakistani army chiefs described the test as routine.

Under the US-India accord, reached during President George W. Bush's visit to India this year, New Delhi would be allowed access to US civilian nuclear technology in return for a pledge to open its non-military nuclear facilities to international inspections.

However, Manmohan Singh, India's prime minister, on Thursday reiterated New Delhi's concern that elements of the bill would be unacceptable to New Delhi. The bill would allow members of the Nuclear Suppliers Group to provide nuclear fuel to India in exchange for India agreeing to submit most of its civil nuclear plants to international safeguards.

Washington has rejected Pakistan's requests for similar treatment to India, with Mr Bush describing the two rivals as "different countries with different needs and different histories".

Islamabad has been pushing for a similar deal from China for well over a year, but there remain doubts as to whether Beijing will risk international goodwill by supplying fresh technology to a country with the weakest of proliferation records.

China has helped Pakistan build two nuclear energy reactors at Chashma in the Punjab province, while an older Canadian-supplied nuclear energy reactor exists in Karachi, the southern port city. Western officials say Pakistan has successfully built up other nuclear facilities near Islamabad, the capital and at locations in the Punjab, where it produces fissile material for use in nuclear warheads.

A Pakistani official said future supplies of nuclear reactors from China would come with safeguards according to international standards applied by the Vienna based International Atomic Energy Agency.

"If the US can supply nuclear energy reactors to India under what it says are adequate safeguards, why can't that logic apply to Chinese reactors for Pakistan," the official said, on condition of anonymity.

When Pakistani president Pervez Musharraf visited Beijing in February, both sides announced they would "continue strengthening co-operation in the peaceful use of nuclear energy".

India Nuclear Deal Advances (LAT)

By Henry Chu

The Los Angeles Times, November 17, 2006

NEW DELHI — The U.S. Senate on Thursday overwhelmingly approved a civil nuclear cooperation deal with India aimed at improving ties between the world's two largest democracies.

Officials in both nations hailed the 85-12 vote on the controversial accord, which would give India access to American nuclear fuel and technology.

In return, India would allow United Nations inspections of its civilian reactors, though not its military facilities.

"We welcome the passage of the bill on Indo-U.S. civil nuclear cooperation in the U.S. Senate by an overwhelming majority. This, undoubtedly, reflects the very broad bipartisan support which this initiative enjoys," Indian Foreign Minister Pranab Mukherjee said in a statement this morning.

But mindful that House and Senate versions of the legislation must be reconciled, he added: "We must await the final version before drawing any conclusions on the legislation."

In Washington, Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.) said Thursday the historic deal would "increase the prospect for stability and progress in South Asia and in the world at large."

The Indian government had watched the bill's progress for months. Indian Prime Minister Manmohan Singh has staked much of his foreign policy on strengthening ties with the U.S., and the nuclear deal forms the cornerstone of that effort.

But the legislative process is not over. After the Senate and House versions of the bill are reconciled, the final bill would need the signature of President Bush, who has lobbied intensely on its behalf. Finally, Congress would be asked to approve a treaty formalizing the pact.

If turned into law, the agreement would overturn decades of U.S. policy on curbing nuclear proliferation.

India has refused to sign the worldwide Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty, leading to the nation's isolation on the nuclear issue for 40 years. In 1998, India and archrival Pakistan shocked the world by conducting dueling nuclear test explosions.

Critics say that lifting long-established nuclear sanctions against India would reward New Delhi's noncompliance with international norms at a time when Washington is trying to rein in nuclear activity in Iran and North Korea.

Detractors also contend that India could buy nuclear fuel from the U.S., then divert some of its domestic uranium to weapons. An arms race in South Asia could ensue.

"I believe one day we will look back at this with great regret," said Sen. Byron L. Dorgan (D-N.D.).

Supporters say India has proved itself a responsible nuclear power. Some U.S. officials have also pushed the deal as a way to counter China, a historical rival of India.

There are already signs that Beijing may retaliate: On a visit to the subcontinent next week, Chinese President Hu Jintao is expected to announce a similar civil nuclear cooperation accord with Pakistan.

India was concerned this year as U.S. lawmakers began proposing restrictive amendments to the nuclear deal that New Delhi considered unacceptable.

The Democratic sweep in the U.S. midterm election also raised concerns that the bill would fail to get passed before the year was out, which would send it back to the drawing board.

DOJ_NMG_0095730

But Bush telephoned Singh earlier Thursday to assure the Indian leader of his continued support for the deal. And in the Senate vote, all of what Indians termed the "killer amendments" were defeated, including one that would have required India to stop producing weapons-grade nuclear material.

California's Democratic senators split on the deal, with Dianne Feinstein voting for the bill and Barbara Boxer opposed.

Senate Approves Deal With India Over Nuclear Fuel (WSJ)

By Jay Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, November 17, 2006

WASHINGTON -- In a major foreign policy and commercial diplomacy victory for the Bush administration, the Senate overwhelmingly passed a resolution that will allow the U.S. to begin sharing nuclear fuels and technologies with India.

President Bush has made the establishment of a strategic partnership with New Delhi a cornerstone foreign policy objective for his administration, while American businesses have seen the deal as a gateway to improved trade and investment relations with the world's second-most populous country. U.S. government officials believe assisting India in its economic and military development will allow the South Asian nation to combat Islamic extremism and serve as a major counterweight to China's growing power across Asia.

Mr. Bush hailed the bill's 85-12 passage during his trip to Vietnam yesterday, announcing in a statement that it will "bring India into the international nuclear nonproliferation mainstream and will increase the transparency of India's entire civilian nuclear program."

The Senate move, which comes as Mr. Bush heads into a meeting with Asian leaders, offsets somewhat the setback he suffered earlier this week, when the House blocked quick passage of a free-trade agreement with Vietnam.

Despite the deal's easy passage through the Senate, congressional officials said a number of roadblocks still need to be cleared before the U.S. can begin shipping nuclear fuels to the subcontinent. The House passed a different version of the pact, and the two chambers need to try and reconcile the versions before they adjourn in December.

And Washington still needs the Nuclear Suppliers Group, an international body that regulates the trade in nuclear fuels, to provide New Delhi with clearance. After that, the Bush administration and the International Atomic Energy Association still must reach an agreement with New Delhi over the inspection regime that's required in order for the transfer of nuclear fuels.

Still, U.S. industry is already reacting positively to the Senate's move. A number of U.S. corporations, such as General Electric Co. and Boeing Co., are expected to benefit from the new initiative in India.

"India's nuclear energy market -- estimated to require $100 billion in foreign direct investment -- will open for U.S. companies," said Ron Somers, president of the U.S.-India Business Council.

Senate Backs White House Plan For India Nuclear Deal (WP)

By Dafna Linzer

The Washington Post, November 17, 2006

The Bush administration won overwhelming Senate support yesterday for its plan to create a broad strategic partnership with India that reverses decades of U.S. nonproliferation policies and requires changes in laws aimed at limiting the spread of nuclear weapons.

The Senate voted 85 to 12 in favor of legislation that would carve out an India-specific exception to laws that forbid transfers of nuclear technology to countries such as India that have not signed the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty. Senate passage brings the administration a step closer to completing its deal with India.

Advocates of the plan, including many Democrats with close ties to the India lobby, see it as a way to cement ties with a rapidly modernizing, friendly democracy whose economic and military strength could one day rival China's.

Although the effort has garnered little attention outside Washington, it has the potential to radically alter U.S. foreign policy for decades. Bush administration officials say they believe it will accelerate India's rise as a regional counterweight to China and provide the United States with a new foothold in Asia.

DOJ_NMG_0095731

R. Nicholas Burns, the administration's top negotiator on the India deal, welcomed the bipartisan support late yesterday and called the agreement "one of the most important foreign policy initiatives of the last several years."

But the plan, still being negotiated by U.S. and Indian officials, has fierce opponents among arms control experts, some of whom argue that it will weaken efforts to rein in countries such as Iran and North Korea while potentially triggering an Asian arms race.

"The benefits of the deal have been overstated, while the downsides are significant," said Daryl Kimball, director of the Arms Control Association. "The administration and Congress are gambling that the downsides will not occur."

Under the deal, India would receive badly needed nuclear fuel and technology to meet the energy needs of its 1.1 billion citizens. But that arrangement would also allow the New Delhi government to divert its existing nuclear infrastructure to produce additional weapons.

Rep. Edward J. Markey (D-Mass.), who had fought passage of a similar bill in the House in July, lamented that the deal "will allow India to increase its annual bomb-production capacity from seven to over 40 bombs a year."

But Sen. Richard G. Lugar (R-Ind.) called the plan "a lasting incentive" for India not to test nuclear weapons and "to cooperate closely with the United States in stopping proliferation." The deal does not prevent India from testing, however, and nowhere does it obligate India to adopt U.S. nonproliferation goals.

India's close relationship with Iran, meanwhile, has irked some on Capitol Hill. Iran's foreign minister met yesterday in New Delhi with India's prime minister. The countries have close military, economic and political ties and are in discussions over a proposed gas pipeline from Iran to India.

In January, congressional leaders requested a secret intelligence assessment of India's nuclear program, the potential effects of the deal and New Delhi's ties to Tehran. Intelligence officials said they provided a paper in April, but staff members on Capitol Hill said it did not address Iran or any aspect of the deal.

Two senators, Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.) and Russell Feingold (D-Wis.), offered amendments to the bill yesterday that would have forced India to choose between the United States and Iran when it comes to military cooperation, terrorism and nuclear issues. Both were defeated after India said it would consider them deal-breakers.

The House and Senate will sort out minor differences in their bills before bringing legislation to the full Congress for a vote. The deal with India, however, is far from complete.

Negotiators need to finish talks that have been mired in disagreement. India must separate its military and civilian nuclear infrastructure and reach a separate agreement with U.N. inspectors. The deal also needs approval from an international consortium that controls nuclear exports. Officials say it could be a year before the deal is brought back to Congress for a final vote.

Zapatero Unveils New Middle East Initiative (FT)

By Victoria Burnett

Financial Times, November 17, 2006

Spain, France and Italy plan are to present a new Middle East peace initiative to their European partners at an EU summit in December, José Luis Rodríguez Zapatero, Spanish prime minister, said on Thursday.

Spain hopes to gain the backing of Germany and Britain for the initiative, calling for an immediate ceasefire, the formation of an internationally recognised Palestinian unity government and a peace conference.

“We cannot remain impassive in the face of the horror that continues to unfold before our eyes,” Mr Zapatero told reporters during a summit of Spanish and French leaders in Girona, Spain.

“Peace between Israel and the Palestinians means, to a great extent, peace at an international level,” he said.

Mr Zapatero’s government has struggled to carve out a role on the international stage, following the withdrawal of troops from Iraq after his election in 2003, despite the presence of Spanish troops in Afghanistan and Lebanon. His most high–profile international initiative, reviving the “alliance of civilisations” to foster better relations between Western and muslim countries, has been dismissed by critics at home as wishy-washy.

DOJ_NMG_0095732

Jacques Chirac, French president, said Mr Zapatero had proposed the joint initiative when they met at the beginning of the summit, according to [a news service]. The two had arranged to call Roman Prodi, the Italian prime minister, to discuss the initiative.

Mr Chirac said France would "act jointly" with Spain, Italy and other European countries to "try to initiate indispensable moral and political reforms in the Middle East."

The peace initiative would include an exchange of prisoners, talks between the Israeli and Palestinian leaders and an international mission to monitor the proposed ceasefire.

Blair Sees Chance For Progress On Middle East Conflict (WP)

By Kevin Sullivan And Mary Jordan

The Washington Post, November 17, 2006

LONDON, Nov. 16 -- Prime Minister Tony Blair on Thursday offered hope for progress on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, saying that "sensible Arab and Muslim countries" now see "strategic reasons" for finding a solution and that new initiatives could come within weeks.

"This is an opportunity for us if we are prepared to seize it now," said Blair, citing leaders of Saudi Arabia, Egypt and Jordan as among those who "want to make progress" on an issue he called the "crux" of problems in the Middle East.

Blair, in an interview with The Washington Post at his 10 Downing Street office, declined to provide specifics but said British officials were holding private talks with Middle Eastern governments as well as the Bush administration about measures "to move this forward."

The prime minister is also planning a trip in the next few weeks to the Middle East, which he said was facing a "critical moment."

Blair, who has been President Bush's chief foreign ally on Iraq, said he had no regrets about the 2003 invasion that toppled the government of Saddam Hussein, even though the continuing war has cost him dearly in British public opinion.

"If you left Saddam there, you would have had a whole stack of different problems, and in the end you'd have had to have dealt with Iraq at some point," said Blair, who spoke with passion and certainty about his policies despite growing demand in Britain and the United States for a reassessment of Iraq strategy.

Discussing remarks he made Tuesday during a closed-door video conference with the Iraq Study Group, the bipartisan panel in Washington reviewing Iraq policy, Blair said that any solution to Iraq must begin with progress on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

"Israel-Palestine is the one issue that, unresolved, allows extremists to gain purchase on the more moderate elements of the Muslim and Arab world," he said, sipping coffee next to the marble mantelpiece in his office.

Blair, who has said he will step down before next September after serving since 1997, said Islamic extremists are using the Israeli-Palestinian conflict as a propaganda tool, "so there is a huge additional dimension to its importance."

He said the "next few months are critical" on the Israeli-Palestinian issue: "My worry is there is increasing not just poverty and despair on the Palestinian side but also disintegration, and that is very dangerous."

"So we either decide that we are going to take this moment and use it to drive forward, or obviously there's a danger that the whole region takes a wrong turn," he said.

Blair brushed aside a question about whether he was being unrealistic to think significant progress was possible toward a solution that has eluded a long succession of world leaders. He said focusing on the Israeli-Palestinian problem was "the only realistic thing to do."

Blair said that critics complained for years that sectarian violence in Northern Ireland was too intractable to be solved but that peace accords have ended most violence there.

He said that on the Israeli-Palestinian problem, people generally agree on the long-term solution -- two independent states -- but the difficulty is in hammering out the details.

"Everybody accepts that there's got to be two states," Blair said. "Now, there are issues like Jerusalem, refugees . . . which are very difficult." But "it's not beyond the wit of man" to devise a territorial solution, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0095733

"I believe totally in supporting Israel's security," Blair said. "But the truth is the ultimate security lies in a viable and democratic Palestinian state and in resolving the issues with Israel's neighbors."

Blair said Iran has been a divisive force in the Middle East, backing radical elements of Hamas in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and the Hezbollah militia in last summer's war with Israel. He has also said Iran's backing of Shiite militias in Iraq has been destabilizing there.

Blair said moderate leaders in the region now "can see that the way that Iran has been manipulating these disputes in the region changes the dynamics of power." He said that beyond the fact that many neighbors in the region have sympathy with the Palestinian cause, they now also believe it is in their strategic interest to counter what he called a "cocktail of elements of extremism and fanaticism."

Despite the Iraq war and the other conflicts, Blair said he saw reasons for optimism in the Middle East.

"You go to these Gulf states and you see the changes they're making in their democracy, the changes in their economy," the prime minister said, citing the United Arab Emirates as an example. "There is a way of moving forward in the Middle East that is about step-by-step greater democracy, opening up their economy and presenting themselves to the world in a modern and moderate light."

As the Middle East "is in the process of decision about its future," Blair said, "we have got to be in there, since we've got the right policy. I mean, what do people choose when they're given the chance? They choose to live in free, democratic societies. So we've got the best case."

Asked if he thought the Democratic Party's victory in last week's U.S. congressional elections signaled growing momentum for a reduction in U.S. troops in Iraq, Blair said he was sure Bush "will see this through."

"I don't think you will see the administration backing away from fulfilling what it said it would do," Blair said. "There should never be any doubt, whether it's in terms of myself or the president. We have said that we will stay as long as the Iraqi government needs us to do so."

Blair also said that a key goal in Iraq was to continue to "plug any gaps in the armed forces and their training," because "the Iraqis want to take greater responsibility, and we have got to empower them to do so."

Blair said a friend who recently traveled to Iraq told him that with all the obvious problems, there was a "danger that you move from having been unduly optimistic to unduly pessimistic."

He said it was understandable that as Iraq makes the difficult transition from decades of "brutal repression" under a dictator to democratic rule, "you will have all sorts of poison that then flows out."

But people in Iraq, he said, are committed to creating a "nonsectarian future" because "the alternative is no future."

Blair also made an impassioned plea for the United States to lead the world on climate change, an issue that Blair has championed despite reluctance from the Bush White House.

"There's a big opportunity for the administration and for America on climate change," he said. "What you guys should do is come up with a sensible plan and framework" that encourages business to invest in environmental technology innovations and wins support from emerging powers such as China and India.

"No country is going to mess up its economy to meet some agreed target," Blair said. But private industry will "quickly spot an opportunity" if new markets are created for environmentally friendly technologies, he said.

Blair noted that Bush made a "pretty bold" statement about America's "addiction to oil" in his last State of the Union address.

Now, he said, Bush should follow up with "a framework that can help cure that addiction," then pitch it to the rest of the world, saying, "Come on, everybody has got to do this."

Israeli Response To Gaza Rockets: Official Restraint, Civilian Flight (NYT)

By Ian Fisher

The New York Times, November 17, 2006

SDEROT, Israel, Nov. 16 — The biggest reaction on Thursday to the death of an Israeli woman killed by a rocket shot from Gaza did not come from the military, as it usually does. Instead, this desert town that has been hit the hardest by the recent rocket fire packed up en masse to take advantage of an offer from one of Israel's richest men for a free week at the beach.

DOJ_NMG_0095734

"The children are frightened — very frightened," said Galit Abduraam, 38, curbside with her three children waiting for a bus out of town.

"It's not just now," she said. "It's four or five years. The children have nightmares. They don't sleep. They get aggressive. They don't study."

Despite calls from some Israelis for an invasion of Gaza after the woman's death on Wednesday, Prime Minister Ehud Olmert signaled that he would respond with restraint. He told reporters on his flight home from the United States that while Israel would continue targeted attacks, a large-scale assault would not necessarily solve the problem of the crude homemade Qassam rockets fired by Palestinian militants into Israel nearly every day.

"There are many opinions on how to deal with the Qassam fire," he said. "We have to remember that this war will not be over in one blow."

This is a delicate time in negotiations among Palestinian leaders who are trying to form a unity government of professionals and technocrats. Mr. Olmert's remarks seemed to indicate that a new Israeli offensive would not add to the already-deep difficulties of striking a deal.

Just back from visits to Egypt and Jordan, the Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, arrived in Gaza on Thursday for another round of talks. He spoke with Prime Minister Ismail Haniya, who is a member of Hamas, the militant group that controls the government.

The intention in forming a new government that would not be beholden directly to any faction is to try to restart the flow of millions of dollars in badly needed foreign assistance that was cut off after Hamas took power in March.

The new government could also benefit Israel. The talks include discussion of the status of Cpl. Gilad Shalit, the Israeli soldier captured in June near Gaza, and the international pressure for the Palestinians to renounce violence, including halting the rocket fire.

Since the beginning of the year, the Israeli military says, 1,000 Qassams have landed in Israel. Palestinians call the rocket attacks legitimate resistance to Israeli military actions. Israeli military efforts to stop the rocket fire have killed about 300 Palestinians, many of them civilians, since Corporal Shalit's capture.

The death on Wednesday of the Israeli woman, a 57-year-old émigré from Russia, was the first from the rockets here in 16 months. But that comes as no comfort to residents of this poor town of 20,000, many of them Moroccan and Russian immigrants, near the border with Gaza.

School is canceled frequently, and residents complain of constant fear.

"Even when the toilet lid falls, it makes us jumpy," said Ariel Cohen, 44, who was waiting for a bus with his wife and their daughter, May, 7, who had been in the same nursery class as a 4-year-old boy killed by a Qassam in 2004.

After the death on Wednesday, hundreds of families decided to take up an offer made Thursday by Arkady Gaydamak, a Russian businessman known for his charitable works here but wanted in France for arms dealing and tax evasion, for an all-expenses-paid vacation in the southern beach city of Eilat. During the war with Lebanon this summer, Mr. Gaydamak paid to relocate thousands of people out of range of rocket fire in Israel's north.

By early evening, 17 buses had taken away more than 800 people. An organizer working for Mr. Gaydamak said that buses would continue to arrive for everyone who wanted to go.

The military said three Qassams fell near Sderot on Thursday, injuring no one but damaging a kibbutz.

Palestinian Rivalry Rings Up Cost Of Guns (WT)

By Joshua Mitnick

The Washington Times, November 17, 2006

NABLUS, West Bank -- An arms race by rival Palestinian militants has nearly doubled the price of guns in anticipation that fighting in the Gaza Strip between Hamas and Fatah militias will spread to the West Bank.

In recent months, the cost of an M-16 short-barrel rifle has surged to 9,000 Jordanian dinar, or about $13,000, from 5,000 dinar. Bullets cost a little more than a dollar, about twice the price in Israel, said Abu Ali, who claims to be the No. 1 arms dealer in the West Bank.

DOJ_NMG_0095735

Mr. Ali, who uses a pseudonym for fear of arrest by the Israeli army, is a member of the Fatah-linked Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigade. He said he gives discounts to fellow Aqsa members and that he refuses to sell to rivals from Hamas, who buy their guns elsewhere.

"Hamas is buying a lot of weapons and they will pay anything for them," said Mr. Ali, 27. "People don't want money and they don't want food. They want to prove their existence on the street."

Mr. Ali declined to talk about his work at a public cafe.

So instead, the Palestinian militant hopped into a stolen sedan and drove a reporter to an empty industrial area on the outskirts of the city, where he pulled out a military-issue pistol with "Israel Military Industries" engraved on the barrel.

"Whatever you want I can get," he said.

Since Hamas took over the Palestinian Authority in March, tension between Hamas- and Fatah-affiliated militias has frequently exploded into street warfare.

The crisis has been sharpened by the strain of an international aid boycott of the Hamas government.

Government salaries of more than 140,000 public-sector employees, most of them linked to Fatah, have gone unpaid. While teachers and bureaucrats walked off the job, security officers have staged violent protests, and the government has ceased to function.

As the vacuum of lawlessness that has existed in the Palestinian territories for years grows even wider, rival security outfits as well as gunmen from mafialike clans are moving to fill the gap.

As the inscription on Mr. Ali's pistol indicates, the source of most of the weapons is Israel. The dealer says he acquires guns from Arab Israelis as well as dealers from Israel's criminal underworld.

Just after dusk at the city municipality, the echo of gunfire mingled with normal din of car horns. It's a sound that's become part of Nablus' background noise, explained Mayor Adly Yaish.

"When we are happy we shoot. When we are angry we shoot" he sighed. "At funerals we shoot, and at weddings we shoot. It's not good, of course."

Of all the West Bank cities, Nablus and its refugee camps are known as the most resilient stronghold of Palestinian militancy. Israel's army has forbidden Palestinian police from carrying guns in the city for fear they might be used against Israeli soldiers during the frequent raids in the city.

And so, militants are left free to openly brandish their weapons in carjackings and robberies. Nablus residents insist there are two types of weapons in the city: Those used in "national" attacks against Israel and those used in criminal activity.

Mr. Yaish, the mayor, said he is worried that the guns will be used in a new way. Speculation that Hamas wants to establish its own security force in the West Bank is fueling concern that internecine fighting of recent months in Gaza may spread to the West Bank, where Fatah is dominant.

"I am working very hard to prevent this from happening," said the mayor, who explains he speaks to both Hamas and Fatah. "In Nablus we can solve our problems without force."

But that principle might be difficult to explain to militants in their teens and twenties for whom guns have become a sort of youth culture. In the warrens of the Balata refugee district, Ibrahim Muroufi takes his prized possession, an M-16 rifle with a sniper scope, and lays it across his lap.

Opposite the 22-year-old Aqsa Brigades member, a computer monitor flashes a slide show of young men in a variety of poses with guns: Reclining on a bed, peering down from a balcony in ambush, and against a picture studio's illustrated backdrop of a mansion foyer.

"This is part of my hobby and identity," said Mr. Muroufi. "If I were to get a million dollars, I would spend it entirely on weapons."

Mr. Muroufi's mother explained why Nablus parents can't stand in the way of children who take up arms: "My children carry arms because there is no security. If I could carry a weapon, I would, too."

U.S. Aid Ship Cures Public Opinion (WT)

The Washington Times, November 17, 2006

Public opinion polls conducted in two of the more populous Muslim countries showed that humanitarian aid from a U.S. Navy hospital ship had healed more than health problems. When people were made aware of the mission, it left a positive perception of the United States. These findings will encourage more such missions, officials said.

The polls, by the Washington group Terror Free Tomorrow, showed that 87 percent of Indonesians and 53 percent of Bangladeshis who had heard of the hospital ship USNS Mercy's mission to provide medical aid had a better opinion of the United States. The results were announced yesterday at the National Press Club.

Kenneth Ballen, president of Terror Free Tomorrow, which promotes fighting terrorism by winning popular support, said there was a need to hear the voice of the people.

"We hear the voice of radicals and extremists because they are the loudest. ... We need to get in there and see what people really think," he said.

The polls surveyed 1,209 persons in Indonesia and 1,010 in Bangladesh, both with a margin of error of plus or minus three percentage points. People from a variety of economic and social dispositions were surveyed in various parts of the countries, Mr. Ballen said. The Indonesian poll was conducted by the agency Lembaga Survei Indonesia.

Humanitarian efforts "undermine ideological support for terror," said Karen Hughes, undersecretary of state for public diplomacy.

"There is a misunderstanding about America," she said. "People don't realize that the United States is the No. 1 donor of medicine and food to the Palestinian people."

The USNS Mercy finished a five-month mission in September to Indonesia, Bangladesh, Philippines and East Timor. Navy personnel and volunteers from Project Hope, a health care aid organization, were among the medical providers that cared for 61,000 patients, performed 1,000 surgeries and gave 10,500 immunizations.

Some of the crew and volunteers visited the same areas they served after the December 2004 tsunami and the March 2005 earthquakes in Southeast Asia.

The polls also showed that American aid after the natural disasters led to a more favorable opinion of the United States. Adm. Michael G. Mullen, chief of naval operations, said he was committed to continuing missions with civilian volunteer organizations.

The Navy employs two hospital ships, the USNS Mercy and Comfort. The USNS Mercy has 1,000 beds, 85 intensive care units and 12 operating rooms.

Adm. Mullen said he would explore ways to deploy one ship in the Pacific and one in the Atlantic. "Latin America and Africa are in the next round."

Rice Praises Peacekeeping Efforts (NYT)

By Helene Cooper

The New York Times, November 17, 2006

HANOI, Vietnam, Nov. 17 — By agreeing in principle to allow a joint United Nations-African Union peacekeeping force into the war-stricken Darfur region, Sudanese President Omar Hassan al-Bashir has a chance to rehabilitate its image in the rest of the world, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said.

Speaking to reporters here at the annual meeting of the Asia Pacific Economic Cooperation, Ms. Rice hailed the deal struck in Addis Ababa by U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan and Mr. Bashir, which reversed the Sudanese government's longstanding refusal to let United Nations troops into Darfur. A small African Union peacekeeping force has been unable to quell the violence in Darfur, where more than 200,000 people have been killed in brutal ethnic and tribal warfare since 2003.

For months, the Bush administration has been leaning on Sudanese officials to accept a U.N. force, but to no avail.

"I think it certainly is a real opportunity to resolve what is an extremely difficult problem," Ms. Rice said, "and to get back on a road where innocent people can be protected and the Sudanese government has a chance to make right with the international system."

Sudan Says It Will Accept U.N.-African Peace Force In Darfur (NYT)

By Robert F. Worth

The New York Times, November 17, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Nov. 16 — The Sudanese government on Thursday agreed in principle to allow a joint United Nations-African Union peacekeeping force into the war-stricken Darfur region, reversing its longstanding refusal to let United Nations troops in.

The agreement, reached after a day of talks with United Nations officials in Addis Ababa, the Ethiopian capital, raised hopes for a more effective peacekeeping effort in Darfur, where more than 200,000 people have been killed in brutal ethnic and tribal warfare since 2003. A small African Union peacekeeping force has been unable to quell the violence.

It is not clear how soon the new force can enter Darfur. Two major issues must still be worked out before the agreement becomes final: the number of troops, and how the commander will be selected.

A document issued by the parties in the talks — members of the Security Council, the Arab League, the African Union and a number of African leaders — specified a force of 17,000 soldiers and 3,000 police officers. The issues will be taken up at a meeting scheduled for next Friday in Brazzaville, Congo Republic.

"This is welcome news, after working tirelessly to find a solution for Sudan," said Richard A. Grenell, a spokesman for John R. Bolton, the American ambassador to the United Nations.

Andrew S. Natsios, the American special envoy for Sudan, was at the meeting in Addis Ababa.

The agreement was a breakthrough. Sudan's president, Omar Hassan al-Bashir, had repeatedly rejected requests by Western leaders for a United Nations force in Darfur, a vast arid region in western Sudan. Fighting has grown worse in recent weeks, despite a peace accord signed in May by Sudan and the main Darfur rebel group.

It was not clear what made the Sudanese leaders change their minds. But a United Nations official who was present said the Chinese ambassador to the United Nations, Wang Guangya, had played a role in persuading Sudan's foreign minister, Lam Akol, that there was no hidden agenda in the effort to introduce a stronger peacekeeping force. The official spoke on condition of anonymity, citing diplomatic protocol.

The agreement is something of a personal triumph for Kofi Annan, the departing United Nations secretary general. He introduced the idea of a hybrid force and lobbied African leaders for days before convening the meeting.

Sudanese rebels said Thursday that government troops and militias had killed more than 50 people in an attack in northern Darfur, [a news service] reported. Sudanese officials told Jan Egeland, the United Nations under secretary for humanitarian affairs, that all of his proposed destinations for a three-day tour of Darfur were too dangerous to visit.

The agreement calls for more money, troops and equipment to be given to the African Union force, whose mandate expires on Dec. 31, to supplement a $21 million package that is already being delivered with the permission of the Sudanese government. But the core proposal is the new joint force, which is to be "predominantly African in character" while including "command and control structures" provided by the United Nations.

The agreement notes that all parties agreed to take into account "the security situation along the Chad-Sudan and Central African Republic borders," where violence has spilled over from Darfur.

The conflict in Darfur pits non-Arab tribes against the Arab-dominated government of Sudan, which has armed deadly militias that have massacred civilians. The government says the violence has been exaggerated for political reasons.

Agreement Reached On Darfur Peacekeepers (AP)

By Les Neuhaus

AP, November 17, 2006

African, Arab, European and U.N. leaders agreed in principle Thursday to a joint African Union-United Nations peacekeeping force for Sudan's Darfur region.

Sudan, which has strongly opposed allowing U.N. troops in the country, did not give the plan its unreserved approval because officials needed to consult with their superiors, said the country's U.N. ambassador, Abdul Mahmoud Abdelhaleem.

The force could be as large as 27,000, including the existing 7,000-member AU peacekeeping force in Darfur, but the leaders did not lay out a timetable for the force to begin work partly because Sudan had some reservations.

DOJ_NMG_0095738

U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan said the additional personnel could include as many as 17,000 soldiers and 3,000 police officers.

A timetable for the expanded force to begin work was not announced partly because Sudan retained some reservations, including the question of who would be in charge.

"The next step is for the U.N. and AU to call a meeting of the non-signatories (of the Darfur Peace Agreement) ... and the government of Sudan. It should take place in the next couple of weeks to resolve outstanding issues by the end of the year," Annan told reporters.

The U.N. Security Council voted in August to replace the African Union's 7,000 troops, an underpowered force, with 20,000 U.N. peacekeepers. But Sudanese President Omar al-Bashir has so far refused to allow their deployment, saying they would be "neocolonialists."

The agreement was announced at a meeting in Ethiopia that brought together senior officials from the AU, the Arab League, the European Union, Sudan, the United States, China, Russia, Egypt, France and a half-dozen African countries.

"The United States welcomes the successful outcome of this historic meeting," Andrew Natsios, the U.S. special envoy to Sudan, said in a statement.

The expansion of the existing AU force will take place in three phases, said Annan, who had wanted to try to stop the bloodshed in Darfur before he leaves office on Jan. 1.

An African Union Peace and Security Council meeting will be held in the Republic of Congo on Nov. 24 during which Sudan is expected to present its final views, Annan said.

The senior British government representative at the meeting, International Development Secretary Hilary Benn, called on the Sudanese government to "accept the clear view of all the others present."

Benn called the joint U.N.-AU focus on Sudan "the best opportunity we have to bring this crisis to an end. In the mean time, we need an effective cease-fire, with all the parties committing to stop the fighting."

In recent days, pro-government militia forces known as janjaweed have stepped up attacks on villages in Darfur, killing dozens of people, international observers said Wednesday. In one raid, janjaweed militiamen — backed by government troops — forced children into a thatched hut, then set it ablaze, killing parents who tried to rescue the children, rebels said.

After years of low-level clashes over water and land in the vast, arid Darfur region, rebels from ethnic African tribes took up arms against Sudan's Arab-dominated central government in 2003. Khartoum is accused of unleashing the janjaweed. The militiamen are accused of many of the atrocities in a conflict that has killed some 200,000 people and chased 2.5 million from their homes.

The conflict has destabilized a wide region that includes parts of neighboring Chad and the Central African Republic. The chaos has been exploited by rebels from Sudan, Chad and the Central African Republic, and ethnic violence mirroring attacks in Darfur has been seen in Chad in recent weeks.

The Sudanese army has denied any connection to janjaweed attacks, saying the claims were politically motivated.

The U.N. humanitarian chief, who was visiting Darfur, said he had been told by people made homeless by the conflict that the withdrawal of non-governmental organizations from some areas had left them with fewer services and more exposure to violence.

"This is my fourth visit to Darfur, and I have never before seen such a bad security situation," Jan Egeland said from El Geneina, capital of West Darfur, according to a statement. "There are too many armed elements in and around the camps threatening the inhabitants and preventing us from going in."

"Aid workers in West Darfur cannot move on the roads because they are being attacked and their vehicles are being stolen," Egeland said.

Human Rights Watch has called for a major increase in the Darfur peacekeeping force to stop the growing number of attacks on civilians.

The New York-based advocacy group said it has documented renewed aerial bombing of civilians both in Darfur and inside neighboring Chad since late October.

The aid agency Doctors Without Borders, or Medecins Sans Frontieres, also reported that thousands of people have fled their homes and refugee camps in Darfur. The agency said it was increasingly difficult to provide aid to the victims because of the violence.

Sudan Closing Off Darfur To Outside World (CSM)

By Katharine Houreld

The Christian Science Monitor, November 17, 2006

The African Union patrol was only seven miles from Sirba, the site of one of the latest Darfur massacres, when they were forced to turn back. Nearly 400 Arab militiamen in Sudanese government uniforms, with new Land Cruisers and weapons, blocked the dusty track.

Tuesday's incident was only the latest in a crackdown on access for international observers, journalists, and humanitarian organizations - a pattern that is becoming wearily familiar to those working in Darfur.

"The timing is no coincidence," says Leslie Lefkow of Human Rights Watch. "[Sudan is] stemming the flow of information from Darfur while it continues to commit massive crimes and run a military campaign."

As outgoing UN chief Kofi Annan began a major push to stem the escalating crisis during high-level meetings in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, Thursday, the Sudanese government told top UN humanitarian official Jan Egeland that all his proposed destinations on a three-day trip to Darfur are too insecure to visit this weekend.

Last week, the Norwegian Refugee Council announced it was being forced out of Darfur after its permit to operate had been indefinitely suspended for the fifth time, making working conditions "impossible." Other foreign aid workers say they have been denied permission to reenter the country after leaving to attend a family emergency or to seek medical treatment. Killings mount

Thirty villagers were reported killed this week in Sirba, but no outside investigators have been able to enter the town to confirm the reports.

Sudanese rebels accused government troops and militias Thursday of killing more than 50 people in another attack. Two weeks ago, 63 people were reported killed in Jebel Moon, and their bodies buried in the desert.

In that case, investigators were able to access the massacre site, and found that more than 20 of the victims were children. Some of them had been shot through the head. Survivors described Arab men in uniforms, with Thuraya satellite phones, new vehicles, and animals, similar to the group seen only a few miles away barring the road to Sirba.

The government-backed militias have been blamed for hundreds of atrocities since local, non-Arab tribes first took up arms to protest government neglect and the arming of Arab tribes three years ago. Since then, an estimated 200,000 people have died and 2.5 million have fled their homes.

After the government signed a peace deal with one of the three rebel factions last May, the militias, known as the janjaweed, were supposed to be disarmed. Instead, the government appears to be using them as a proxy force to avoid accusations of cease-fire violations. But accurate reporting of militia movements, and alleged massacres, is becoming increasingly difficult. Crackdown on journalists, aid workers

Journalists able to secure a visa face a bewildering array of permits and paperwork; the Sudanese government must be informed in advance of any travel in Darfur. Officials insist on listening to interviews; they intimidate interviewees, and have attempted to confiscate notebooks.

"I can take any of [your permits] I want ... you're going to hell," one official hissed at this reporter. "Do you think this is a free country?" Last week, all permits for journalists to travel to the region were being denied.

The African Union (AU) monitoring force of nearly 7,000 soldiers is also frequently stymied in its investigative attempts. Officials say fuel is stolen, government permission for them to leave their bases is refused, and their soldiers have been killed when convoys were attacked.

During the one-day talks in Ethiopia with UN, EU, and Arab League officials Thursday, Mr. Annan pushed for a "hybrid" force of AU and UN peacekeepers to be allowed into Darfur. But early indications were that Sudan would reject this.

DOJ_NMG_0095740

Even humanitarian organizations, charged with delivering food, water, and medicine to destitute Sudanese, are under attack. When Doctors Without Borders spoke out about rape cases last year, its two most senior staff were arrested. Since then, aid agencies say the situation has worsened.

"It's disgusting. They are holding their own people hostage to shut us up," complained one aid worker bitterly. "If we speak out, we get thrown out. Then who will help these people?"

Tens of millions dollars and a Herculean effort have managed to stabilize key humanitarian indicators like the infant mortality and malnutrition rates, and aid agencies are reluctant to risk their hard-won gains by criticizing the government for atrocities.

All aid workers interviewed for this article agreed to speak only on condition of anonymity.

But it's not only the government that is piling on the pressure. Thirteen humanitarian workers have been killed since last May's peace deal, which pitted signatory and non-signatory rebel groups against each other. As the fighting intensifies along the Chadian border and in the north, all sides in this conflict want vehicles and the shiny white 4x4s used by aid groups are a tempting target.

Carjackings of both aid vehicles and commercial trucks are rampant. In a single day last month, nine vehicles were snatched. Convoys have also been attacked and employees beaten up or sexually harassed, say aid workers here.

The breakdown in security means vast swaths of northern Darfur are no-go areas for groups providing food, medicine, and clean water for tens of thousands of displaced villagers. "It's become very dangerous to work here," says another aid worker, whose organization has suffered repeated attacks. "Before, we could negotiate with the rebels for safe access, but now we don't know who controls what territory any more."

Pinned on the wall behind her was a series of maps showing humanitarian access for Darfur month by month. The inaccessible areas, colored orange, are spreading like spilled ink.

Misery Spirals In Burma As Junta Targets Minorities (WP)

By Anthony Faiola

The Washington Post, November 17, 2006

CAMP EITUTA, Burma -- In a burgeoning encampment here on Burma's eastern frontier, Hay Nay Tha, a 30-year-old mother of three, awakens in the darkness most nights to the sound of her children's screams.

"They keep having nightmares about our journey here," she said.

That journey, Hay recalled, began when she was four months pregnant and government soldiers torched her village and forced local farmers off their land. It ended four weeks later, after her husband died of malaria en route to this camp. She and her children arrived here this summer dehydrated and exhausted. Hay soon went into early labor with a stillborn son.

"To be honest," the copper-skinned woman said, shyly gazing down at her hands, "I am having nightmares, too."

Nightmares of all kinds are rife in this camp, where new clusters of villagers arrive almost daily, a consequence of Burma's largest military offensive against its own people in more than a decade, according to aid groups and Western diplomats. The offensive has targeted minorities such as Hay, a member of the restive Karen ethnic group, which has long maintained a measure of autonomy.

According to estimates by relief groups, Burmese forces have burned down more than 200 civilian villages here in Karen state, destroyed crops and placed land mines along key jungle passages to prevent refugees from returning to their home villages. Dozens of people have died, and at least 20,000 civilians have been displaced over the past eight to 10 months.

"What is now going on in Burma are crimes against humanity," said Sunai Phasuk, head Burma consultant for New York-based Human Rights Watch. "The military government has significantly stepped up their systemic policy of violence against the ethnic Karen with this offensive. We're talking about a mounting disaster."

Burma's military leaders have historically been secretive about their actions. But observers say they are attempting to build a broad security cordon around their new capital near the inland city of Pyinmana, located only a few miles from the border of Karen state. The result has been an extraordinary use of force to clear out existing villages in the area.

Since seizing control of the country in 1988, Burma's military junta has taken a series of harsh measures to secure its grip on power, and over the past several months, it has appeared to step up its arrests of opposition figures. Win Ko, a leading member of the National League for Democracy, was arrested last month and sentenced to three years in prison after staging a petition drive to free political prisoners. The party's leader, Aung San Suu Kyi, winner of the 1991 Nobel Peace Prize, remains under house arrest.

Observers say the junta has reserved its most brutal treatment for Burma's eastern ethnic groups, including the Karenni, the Shan and the Mon, as well as the Karen, the largest minority in the region.

A fiercely independent group of approximately 3 million people, the Karen speak a separate language from most Burmese, use their own ancient writing system and have traditionally opposed the military junta. Two decades of sporadic government campaigns have already driven hundreds of thousands of Karen and other refugees into neighboring Thailand, where at least 150,000 now live in official camps and an estimated 1.5 million dwell illegally.

Although the military has long fought the Karen National Liberation Army -- a seasoned militia of about 10,000, armed with aging assault rifles -- it has mostly seemed content to stage small, periodic sieges against mountain strongholds in Karen state's northwest. These sieges have typically taken place only during Southeast Asia's dry seasons.

But this year, the government's campaign has extended through the rainy season and assumed far larger dimensions, appearing to be a final assault aimed at smashing the resistance. Over the past 10 months, sources familiar with Burmese military actions say, its forces have pushed into major Karen strongholds, building 12 new permanent army bases.

Burmese government officials did not return phone calls seeking comment from their embassy in Washington. But observers say the campaign is almost certainly tied to a desire to extend security around the new capital, which is meant to serve as a protective jungle fortress for the junta. The Burmese have already begun moving government offices there from Rangoon, the old capital, and are finishing work on a sprawling military bunker.

Economic development appears to be another motivation for the offensive, according to observers. Burma, a country that was once one of Southeast Asia's richest nations and is now among its poorest, has sought to create revenue by signing a deal with Thailand to build multiple dams on the picturesque Salween River, which runs through Karen state. As the Burmese military attempts to exert its control over the river, it has moved into other Karen strongholds.

"The new capital and the dam projects have become an incredibly destructive pretext for the Burmese military to take control of Karen state using indiscriminate force," said Jack Dunford, executive director of the Thailand Burma Border Consortium (TBBC), a U.S.-funded relief group based in Bangkok. "I fear this may be the beginning of the end there."

An increasing number of Karen civilians fleeing the violence have made their way here to Eituta, an emergency camp perched on a muddy hilltop overlooking Burma's border with Thailand. The rows of primitive bamboo huts are protected by a battalion of armed Karen soldiers.

With Eituta's population topping 1,500, and growing at a rate of about 10 percent a month, Karen authorities here are making plans for a second camp nearby.

Although the Thai government has adopted a more lenient policy on Burmese refugees in recent years, aid groups say the bureaucratic process of admitting new arrivals has been slowed by the sudden uptick in the number of Karen seeking asylum. With the new military offensive, the number of arrivals at the already over-crowded official Karen refugee camps in Thailand has jumped 60 percent, to almost 900 a month, according to the TBBC.

The situation has effectively created a precarious limbo for the displaced people at Eituta, located only two hours by foot from the nearest Burmese military outpost. Almost two-thirds of the refugees here are children younger than 12, many of whom are sick with malaria and dysentery.

Relief organizations have cut out a section of the dense jungle canopy to build a small medical clinic. But the wounds of many children here run deeper than any medicine can cure.

On a recent day at the camp, a foreign journalist with a video camera approached an ethnic Karen man and a smiling 2-year-old girl sitting on straw mats in their hut. Suddenly, the girl began screaming uncontrollably. "She thinks it's a gun," said her father, Saw Say Nay, pointing to the video camera.

DOJ_NMG_0095742

Saw, a farmer, fled here with his family of four last month. Like many displaced Karen, they had been living in hiding in the jungle since the summer, when Burmese troops began constructing a base near their village of Sayztaing Gyi, about 40 miles from the new capital.

"They were going village by village, forcing men and women into labor," he said. "Then they started burning villages, so we packed what we could and escaped into the jungle. From the trees, we saw them set our homes on fire. They burned our crops. They left us with nothing."

Thin and languid from malaria, Saw said he found out there was no going back after one villager tried to return, only to lose his leg when he stepped on a freshly laid land mine.

"We don't know what to do," he said. "My heart wants to go back, but I know it is not safe for my family. I don't know if we can go to Thailand. I don't know if they will accept us. So we are here. We have nowhere else to go."

Royal Wins French Socialists' Nomination (AP)

By Angela Charlton

AP, November 17, 2006

Segolene Royal got a running start Thursday to her campaign to become France's first female president, decisively beating two rivals to wrap up the nomination for the main opposition Socialist Party in a single round of voting.

The win, which party officials announced with about 40 percent of votes counted, spared Royal a second round against her two rivals from the party's old guard — Former Prime Minister Laurent Fabius and former Finance Minister Dominique Strauss-Kahn.

It also meant she can head into the April vote claiming the oft-divided opposition party is fully behind her.

"The results show rather clearly the fact that there will only be one round, and we can say that Segolene Royal is already the candidate for the Socialist Party," said Stephane Le Foll, chief of staff to the party's general secretary.

By the final tally, Royal had collected 60.62 percent of votes, while Strauss-Kahn won 20.83 percent and Fabius gained 18.54 percent, Le Foll said. About 82 percent of the 219,000 party members eligible to vote cast ballots.

Strauss-Kahn and Fabius conceded defeat, their spokesmen said.

Royal, 53, has sought to tap into broader voter disillusionment with politics after two terms under conservative President Jacques Chirac marred by corruption scandals and stagnation.

However, her unorthodox views have also alienated many people within her party, and her opponents say she won't be able to unite the divided French left.

"Tomorrow, I'll have the job of bringing them all together — including those who didn't vote for me," Royal said in the victory speech. "I am counting on them."

The Socialists, who dominated the French political scene a generation ago, have been searching for direction since former Prime Minister Lionel Jospin's embarrassing third-place finish in the last presidential vote, in 2002.

The party also has been licking its wounds since the national referendum on the European Union Constitution last year, which caused a massive rift in the party — and French voters overall rejected it.

Though a spectrum of candidates from far left to far right are gearing up to run in the presidential election, the centerpiece of the race is likely to be a battle between Royal and the front-runner on the mainstream right — Interior Minister Nicolas Sarkozy.

A poll published Thursday showed respondents equally split between the two. In a first round of voting, Sarkozy would edge out Royal by 34 percent to 30 percent, the poll said — but in a runoff, they would be at 50-50. The IFOP agency conducted the poll Nov. 9-11 by telephone among 948 respondents. No margin of error was given.

The Socialists, who ran the government under Jospin from 1997 to 2002, made one of their biggest marks with passage of the so-called 35-hour workweek law, which conservatives say has hurt the economy.

Critics say the Socialists have no feasible recipes for facing a globalizing economy or revitalizing growth. The party manifesto calls for expanding use of the much-maligned workweek law, re-nationalizing utility Electricite de France, and punishing companies that move jobs abroad.

But Royal's supporters say she is of a different breed — a sleek lawmaker who has shaken up the political scene in a nation disenchanted and in need of change. Many say a female president is the tonic needed.

"That would do us some good," said Socialist party member Philippe Chleq, 72, one of the 68,000 party members who joined since June, after voting. "There is so much machismo in politics, it's disgusting. She'll help change that."

Socialists Back Woman In Race To Lead France (NYT)

By Elaine Sciolino

The New York Times, November 17, 2006

PARIS, Friday, Nov. 17 — Ségolène Royal moved a step closer to becoming the first female president of France early Friday, crushing her two male rivals for the Socialist Party nomination in next April's election.

With most of the vote in, Ms. Royal, 53, a regional president and former minister, won 60.6 percent of the vote of the party's nearly 219,000 members in an unusual primary.

Her closest rival, Dominique Strauss-Kahn, 57, a former finance minister, received 20.8 percent of the vote, and Laurent Fabius, 60, a former prime minister, 18.5 percent.

The tally in France ended around 1:30 a.m. and will be complete after overseas territories finish voting.

"I am living intensely this moment of happiness," Ms. Royal said after the preliminary results were announced. Thanking the party's "grass roots" members, she added, "The fact of receiving this momentum, of being chosen in this way, this is something extraordinary. I think that the French people have written this story."

The victory helped validate Ms. Royal's standing as the only candidate capable of beating the right's frontrunner, Nicolas Sarkozy, the Interior Minister who is seeking his UMP party's nomination for the 2007 presidential election.

An Ipsos opinion poll released on Thursday found Ms. Royal and Mr. Sarkozy statistically tied if they were to face off in a second round of voting, after other candidates had been eliminated.

Ms. Royal's victory followed months of mudslinging and maneuvering in a campaign that pitted her against the party's older, more established — and male — "elephants," whom she had dared to challenge.

Campaigning on a platform of "rupture" with the status quo, she has also capitalized on her femininity while accusing her competitors of chauvinism.

"Gazelles," she said last May, "run faster than elephants."

Responding to voters' disillusionment with traditional elitist politics, she is promising more power to the people, giving local governments more authority, subsidizing small businesses, creating affordable housing and encouraging citizens to submit their ideas online, for example.

Even her opponents agree that her looks help. Published photos of her in a turquoise bikini while on vacation last summer underscored her youthfulness and glamour, while in poll after poll, her telegenic smile and elegant profile have appealed to a French public yearning for a new style of leadership.

Ms. Royal, president of the Poitou-Charentes region in the west, has also cultivated an image as a grass-roots nurturer, taking her campaign to the countryside to listen to concerns about social issues such as educational reform and youth crime.

With a portfolio that includes stops at three second-tier ministries — Environment, School Education and Family and Childhood — Ms. Royal has been criticized as lacking the experience and gravitas to lead a country that is a nuclear power and has the world's sixth-largest economy.

Her inexperience in foreign policy issues surfaced last week when she said during the last campaign debate that Iran should never be allowed to have a civilian nuclear energy program. As her opponents quickly pointed out, Iran enjoys that right as a signatory to the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty.

But the party members' enthusiasm for Ms. Royal seemed to trump any slips on policy issues.

DOJ_NMG_0095744

"Her victory means that the Socialist Party is still under the shock of April 2002 and is looking above all for a candidate who can win," said Dominique Reynié, a professor of political science at the Institut d'Études Politiques in Paris. "Much more important than a doctrine or a program is the look of a champion."

In the April 2002 presidential election, the Socialist candidate, Prime Minister Lionel Jospin, was eliminated in the first round, trailing even the far-right National Front candidate, Jean-Marie Le Pen.

Going into the primary, Ms. Royal enjoyed a strong lead in the polls, although she had lost ground steadily in recent weeks to Mr. Strauss-Kahn, largely because of his performance in their six policy debates, three of which were televised.

Ms. Royal was helped by the withdrawal from the race in September of Mr. Jospin, a fixture in French politics for nearly three decades.

The three candidates, all deputies in the National Assembly, voted in their home districts on Thursday. Mr. Strauss-Kahn continued to campaign on Wednesday, even though his 86-year-old mother had died the day before.

The fourth of eight children, Ms. Royal was born in Dakar, Senegal, where her father was an army colonel, and earned admission to the elite École Nationale d'Administration.

It was there that she met François Hollande, her partner of 25 years and the father of her four children. The head of the Socialist Party who is believed to have harbored presidential aspirations of his own, Mr. Hollande has remained neutral.

Ms. Royal was repeatedly attacked in the campaign as naïve and inexperienced. In addition to questioning her foreign policy background, her opponents and other critics mocked her proposal to create "citizens" juries to pass judgment on the work of elected officials, calling it dangerously populist, costly and irrelevant. At one rally in Paris last month when she discussed the issue, she was booed repeatedly.

During one debate, she defended her call for a less centralized, more representative form of government, saying: "Democracy is like love. The more there is of it, the more it grows."

She has also been criticized by her rivals for playing the woman card. At a rally in Paris last Monday, she quoted Mr. Strauss-Kahn as having said after their final debate that "she would have done better to stay at home instead of reading from her recipe cards."

Asked by Europe 1 radio Wednesday whether she was a liar, Mr. Strauss-Kahn replied, "That, or she is ill informed."

While opinion polls put her far ahead as the vote approached, it had been impossible to say whether those projections would be borne out in Thursday's primary. Only party members who pay about $25 a year to register officially were allowed to vote in the primary. Their views had never been polled because the Socialist Party refused to give its membership list to polling institutes. In addition, a full third of the party's members joined this year after a campaign to register new and younger members, using the Internet as a recruiting tool.

There have been two Socialist primaries before, but they were low-key affairs and they did not follow a campaign to enroll new members or televised debates similar to those in the United States.

In January, the UMP party will choose its candidate in a primary for the first time.

Despite Mr. Sarkozy's overwhelming lead in the polls, there are signs that 12 years might not be enough for President Jacques Chirac. In an interview in the magazine Le Nouvel Observateur, his wife, Bernadette, suggested that he might seek an unprecedented third term.

As a former president, the 73-year-old head of state has the right to sit on the country's Constitutional Council once he is no longer president.

"Yes, he'll take it up," Mrs. Chirac said of the council. "In five years' time."

Mr. Chirac himself has said he will not make his intentions known before next March.

France's Segolene Royal Wins Socialist Party's Nomination (WSJ)

By David Gauthier-villars

The Wall Street Journal, November 17, 2006

PARIS -- Segolene Royal won the French Socialist Party's nomination to run in next year's presidential elections.

DOJ_NMG_0095745

After a day of voting by French Socialist party card-carrying members, "it's now certain" that Ms. Royal will win the nomination without a further run-off vote, Stephane Le Foll, chief of staff for the Socialist Party's head secretary, told reporters. Mr. Le Foll declined to give a percentage by which Ms. Royal was expected to win, but said some 75,300 votes had been counted out of a total 180,000 ballots cast.

Ms. Royal's victory takes her one step further to her ambitions of becoming France's first woman president. The 53-year-old mother of four has transformed herself from a junior politician into a serious contender for the president's job over the past year. Her nomination highlights France's deep desire for change after nearly twelve years of economic stagnation and sagging morale under the rule of current President Jacques Chirac.

"It shows Socialist militants are also ready for change," said Jean-Louis Bianco, a Socialist lawmaker as the votes were being counted at the party's headquarters in Paris. Mr. Bianco added that he expects Ms. Royals' rivals in the primaries -- Dominique Strauss-Kahn and Laurent Fabius -- to now rally behind Ms. Royal.

The center-right, ruling UMP party, led by current Interior Minister Nicolas Sarkozy, is expected to choose its candidate early next year. Recent polls have suggested that Ms. Royal and Mr. Sarkozy would tie if the first round of the presidential election was held today, collecting between 30% and 35% of the votes each.

Socialists Pick New Face For French Presidency (WP)

By John Ward Anderson

The Washington Post, November 17, 2006

PARIS, Nov. 17 -- Riding a wave of popular disgust with France's political status quo, SÃ©golÃ¨ne Royal on Thursday used an Internet-fueled, personality-driven campaign to capture the Socialist Party's nomination for president and boost her bid to become France's first female head of state.

Royal, 53, an unmarried mother of four and glamorous protege of French presidential icon Francois Mitterrand, capitalized on her image as a fresh-faced cyber-candidate, running an insurgent's campaign to shake up the stodgy, male-dominated world of French politics. Party officials declared her the winner as vote-counting continued early Friday.

Le Monde newspaper estimated that she captured about 61 percent of the vote in turning back challenges from two party stalwarts -- former finance minister Dominique Strauss-Kahn and ex-prime minister Laurent Fabius, who both garnered about 19 percent, Le Monde projected.

Royal will carry the Socialist banner in the crowded first round of France's presidential race on April 22, when more than a dozen contenders are likely to vie for the Elysee Palace. The top two vote-getters will run against each other in the final ballot on May 6.

Political analysts expect the final matchup to pit Royal against the current interior minister, Nicolas Sarkozy, 51, the presumptive candidate of the center-right Popular Movement party, or UMP, which has not decided how it will choose its nominee. Polls show the pair -- who are transforming French politics by borrowing U.S.-style tactics -- statistically tied in a second-round face-off.

"Voters want to go to a new generation of politicians and forget all the past," said Pierre Giacometti, the head of Ipsos polling company. "The impression is that Sarkozy and Royal are a new frontier and represent a new vision and a new political epoch in the Fifth Republic."

About 219,000 registered Socialist Party members were allowed to vote in Thursday's election, and roughly 80 percent cast ballots, the party reported. Royal's victory -- she needed more than 50 percent to win -- was a clear signal that members wanted to rally behind a single candidate and avoid a potentially divisive second round.

Even so, political analysts and opinion surveys suggest that Royal will face a tough challenge uniting the left for the first round of the general election so that it does not splinter its vote and hand a victory to the hard right. That happened to the Socialists in the last presidential contest, in 2002, when the left's vote was so divided that it suffered a humiliating first-round defeat to anti-immigration candidate Jean-Marie Le Pen and his National Front party. Le Pen, who is gearing up to run again, was crushed in the second round by the current president, the UMP's Jacques Chirac.

Chirac has not declared whether he will run, but it seems unlikely. His lackluster stewardship of France in recent years coincided with a sense of political and economic decline, a loss of international stature and a deep national malaise. In a recent poll, only 2 percent of those surveyed wanted him to run for a third term.

French disenchantment with politics-as-usual opened the door for Royal, whose primary campaign avoided deep policy debates and focused instead on her main selling points, which she referred to again and again on the campaign trail: the fact that she is a woman and polls that show she is the only candidate able to beat Sarkozy.

"I am the only one who can win against the right. I embody the profound change that people are crying out for," she declared at a campaign stop last weekend. "For the symbolic father of the nation to be a woman -- now that's a revolution."

France has never had a female president, and only one woman has served as prime minister -- Edith Cresson, whose 11-month term in the early 1990s was widely considered a disaster.

"She is, in a way, a symbol of hope, she's modern -- not the same old politicians everyone grew up with since they were babies -- and she's a woman and a mother and unapologetic about it," said Nicole Bacharan, an analyst at the Institute for Political Studies in Paris. "The discontent in the U.S. with the White House and Congress and Republicans and Democrats -- it's exactly the same here."

Although Royal has written four books and held three cabinet posts -- education, environment, and family and children -- critics disparage her credentials, and many on the left question her adherence to Socialist doctrine, calling her a populist whose candidacy represents a victory of style over substance. She was accused of cynically overplaying the gender card -- using her femininity to attract voters on the one hand, attacking her critics as chauvinists on the other. She recently began reminding audiences that when she announced her candidacy, one of her opponents, Fabius, sneered: "Who will look after the children?"

She has offered a series of headline-grabbing proposals, such as boot camp for juvenile delinquents and "citizen juries" to monitor French politicians. She has criticized one of the Socialist Party's sacred cows -- the 35-hour workweek approved when the party controlled Parliament in 1998. But she has offered few ideas for tackling France's most pressing problems -- particularly immigration, crime and unemployment.

But after she had spent months on the campaign trail, sporting bright, well-tailored suits and colorful blouses, Royal's sharp contrast with the country's traditionally dour politicians won over much of the French public. She achieved rock-star status and typically is referred to by her first name only, or its shortened form, SÃ©go. Supporters said they made a personal connection with her.

"I don't care if SÃ©golÃ¨ne has experience or not, she's the only one I can trust," said Adrien Blanc, 40, a restaurant waiter in Paris who joined the party this year.

"I've had enough of the old party elephants," said Damien Beacco, 25, employing the term commonly used to describe longtime party power brokers. "SÃ©golÃ¨ne is different. Whenever she speaks, it creates momentum and entails change, no matter how shocking her proposals may be."

In what was considered a breach of journalistic decorum and a violation of the privacy rules surrounding politicians, two glossy magazines in August ran pictures of Royal at a beach in a turquoise bikini with her partner and father of her children, Socialist Party leader Francois Hollande. The celebrity magazine VSD ran her photo alongside a JFK-like picture of Sarkozy running bare-chested on a beach, with the headline "Duel in the sun."

Analysts said the willingness of candidates to tolerate and at times court such media coverage is a sign that French politicians are increasingly reaching out to the public.

Both Royal and Sarkozy have sophisticated Internet campaigns. Royal's candidate blog and Web site are credited with attracting many of the estimated 80,000 new members who joined the Socialist Party this year.

Royal also was stung by the new campaign tactics. In an incident remarkably similar to one that dogged the failed reelection effort of Sen. George Allen (R-Va.), Royal was captured on video criticizing French schoolteachers -- a key Socialist constituency -- for not working hard enough. The video was posted on the Internet, where it was reportedly viewed thousands of times. Tape recordings also circulated of Socialists booing and heckling her at closed party meetings.

Ireland Sees Spike In Foreign Workers (WT)

By Anthony Healy

The Washington Times, November 17, 2006

DUBLIN -- First-time visitors to Ireland may be surprised to find that the comely colleen serving Guinness in the local pub is, in fact, Polish.

After several centuries of a hardscrabble life that has seen Irish men and women emigrating around the world, taking their culture and legends with them, a decade of rapid economic growth has made the land of shamrocks a primary destination for hordes of immigrants, mainly from Eastern Europe.

Foreign nationals now account for 10 percent of the population, twice as many as just two years ago, forcing the government for the first time to begin drafting a formal immigration policy to deal with the influx.

"Make no mistake, we are in competition with other economies for go-ahead people with experience or qualifications that are in short supply at home," said Michael McDowell, the minister for justice, who must find a way to balance the nation's deep-seated traditions with the "Celtic Tiger's" growing demand for skilled labor.

"Immigration policies are first and foremost about what is best for Irish society."

But recognition of the economic need for foreign workers has done nothing to ease the shock experienced by one woman on a visit to Dublin from rural Ireland. "I asked three people for directions, and not one of them spoke English," she complained.

Similar anecdotes about pubs where all the staff speak Polish are borne out by recent figures from the Central Office of Statistics.

More than 80 percent of the new immigrants are under age 44, and almost half come from states that joined the European Union in 2004. Large numbers are employed in the retail, agriculture and construction sectors, helping to fuel one of the fastest-growing economies in Europe.

The ethnic and linguistic mixing, confined a few years ago to the capital, now reaches into even the smallest and most remote towns and villages. Amid the wild scenery of Connemara in the far west of Ireland -- where John Ford filmed "The Quiet Man" -- is the Killary Adventure Center. All the bar staff and kitchen staff are Polish.

"It's good to be able to talk to each other in Polish," said Anna, who has been in Ireland for two years and intends to return to Poland "when I've saved some money." She asked that her last name not be used.

In the southeast of Ireland in Dungarvan, population 15,000, there is now a Polish Advisory Center, located just down the road from the Polskie Sklepy -- the Polish Grocer. The local movie theater recently hosted a Polish film festival.

The nation's main Internet service provider, Eircom, now provides its services in Polish, as do many large companies.

By far the largest bloc of new immigrants come from Poland and Lithuania, having received an automatic right to work in Ireland when their countries joined the European Union in 2004.

Stunned by the unexpected influx, Ireland has followed Britain in imposing tougher restrictions on citizens of Romania and Bulgaria when their nations join the EU in January.

Michael Martin, the minister for enterprise, trade and employment, has said it is time "to take stock, be cautious and concentrate on addressing the integration needs of those who have already come to live and work in Ireland."

It is not clear how the new legislation will affect the handful of Bulgarians and Romanians already living in Ireland -- people like Chris, a Bulgarian who overstayed a student visa, works in a supermarket while studying accounting, and has married an Irishman.

"It is very strange, is it not?" said Chris, who spoke only on the condition that her real name not be used. "In most countries in the world, the men chase the women, but in Ireland it is the women who chase the men."

Myanmar Is Left In Dark, An Energy-Rich Orphan (NYT)

By Jane Perlez

The New York Times, November 17, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0095748

SITTWE, Myanmar — In the balmy waters of the Bay of Bengal, just off the coast, an Asian energy rush is on. Huge pockets of natural gas have been found. China and India are jostling to sign deals. Plans are afoot to spend billions on new ports and pipelines.

Yet onshore, in towns like this one, not a light is to be seen — not a street lamp, not a glow in a window — as women crouch by the roadside at dawn, sorting by candlelight the vegetables they will sell for two cents a bunch at the morning market.

Paraffin and wood are major sources of light and heat. People receive two hours of electricity a day from a military government that is among the world's most repressive.

But attempts at outside pressure to prod the government to address its people's needs and curb abuses have faltered, in large part because China's thirst for resources has undermined nearly a decade of American economic sanctions. Critics say that Washington's policy has handed Myanmar, formerly Burma, to China. Still, as President Bush prepares to meet with leaders at the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation summit meeting in Vietnam on Nov. 17, one topic on his agenda will be how to keep up the pressure. He is not likely to find cooperation, not from rivals like China and Russia, or even countries like Singapore and Indonesia, which trade freely with Myanmar.

The Asian energy rush is the latest demonstration of how the hunt for oil and gas, and China's economic leverage, are reshaping international politics, often in ways that run counter to American preferences.

In many respects, with the rise of China's economic power and its unflagging support, the government here has become more entrenched than ever, people inside and outside the country say.

"What can we do about it?" said a well educated man here, when asked about the plans to sell the gas abroad in the face of the deprivation at home. "What good would it do to protest, what would we get?" People were too afraid of the 400,000-member strong army supplied by China, Russia and Ukraine to complain, he said.

In numerous encounters in Myanmar, where most speak with extreme caution to foreigners and almost always anonymously for fear of jail, people joked sardonically that China was the "big daddy" and that soon it would "own" Myanmar. "China is a good friend of the government, not of the people," one woman said. "They are like brother and brother-in-law."

The Bush administration has pledged that it will not let up on its sanctions against the government until it releases the opposition leader, Daw Aung San Suu Kyi, who has been under house arrest for 11 of the past 17 years.

Mrs. Aung San Suu Kyi's political party won an overwhelming victory in elections in 1990, and Washington insists that the government recognize those results, and release an estimated 1,100 political prisoners.

The Bush administration says it plans to file a Security Council resolution at the United Nations in coming weeks condemning the government for its human rights abuses, and tightening sanctions further.

The United Nations under secretary general, Ibrahim Gambari, met with the junta leader, Gen. Than Shwe, on Nov. 11 in Myanmar and urged the government to mend its ways on forced labor and political prisoners. The meeting ended inconclusively, United Nations officials said.

With so much energy and other resources at stake, and given its preference to shun outside interference in internal politics, China's leaders are seemingly unbothered by what is happening inside Myanmar.

China's National Development Reform Commission approved plans in April to build a pipeline that would carry China's Middle East oil from a deep water port off Sittwe across Myanmar to Yunnan, China's southern province. This would provide China with an alternative to the Strait of Malacca, which it now depends on for delivering its oil from the Middle East.

Though no date has been announced for work on the new pipeline across Myanmar, the military appeared to be getting ready to build the deep sea port on the island of Ramree, to the south of here, local people said.

In another sign of the importance of Myanmar to China, the chairman of the China National Offshore Oil Corporation, Fu Chengyu, said in a speech this year that the company would focus its investment in the medium term on two countries: Myanmar and Nigeria. Cnooc engineers are currently exploring for oil on Ramree, and the company has rights to other oil deposits in central Myanmar, according to Myanmar government reports.

India, thirsty for energy to fuel its own fast-growing economy, sees Myanmar as a place where it needs to contain China. In the late 1990s, democratic India switched its policy toward Myanmar from antagonism to friendship.

And Thailand, Southeast Asia's largest economy, spends about $1.2 billion a year for Myanmar's natural gas, giving the military government badly needed hard currency.

In conversations with people in a number of towns, a portrait emerged of a universally unpopular, deeply corrupt government. People told of worsening poverty, a collapsed education system and a health care system that could deal only with those who paid. Tuberculosis, malaria and AIDS were rampant, they said.

The government's budget for its AIDS program in 2004 was $22,000, according to a recent health survey by John Hopkins University Medical School.

The junta leader, Gen. Than Shwe, 73, whose early military training was in psychological warfare, was described by many here as a master manipulator of his minions. He insisted, apparently out of fear of a coup, that the capital be moved this year from Yangon, formerly Rangoon, to a new site in the jungle, Naypyidaw.

The move, costing millions of scarce dollars, was in step with the general's belief that he marched in the footsteps of the old Burmese kings — the name of the new capital means "Royal City." Then, as now, there was a fierce line between the rulers and the ruled.

For the first time, health workers said they were discovering severe malnutrition among children in urban centers, a true anomaly in a lush country that was once the world's biggest exporter of rice.

In Mandalay, the second-biggest city, almost naked children with distended stomachs scrounged on the riverfront. In one village on the Thwande River on the west coast, nomadic families were too strapped for food to offer any to visitors, a traditional courtesy in Myanmar.

"Why is there severe malnutrition in this Garden of Eden? Because people are poor," said Frank Smithuis, a physician who has worked in Myanmar since 1994 and heads the Doctors Without Borders, Holland, medical programs. "People are going from three meals to two meals to one meal. One meal a day just isn't enough."

In the village of Leat Pan Gyunt, south of Sittwe, villagers said they could afford to send their girls to school for only three years. The local school consisted of one dirt-floored room for all grades from first to eighth. The desks were planks of wood supported on two bricks.

Afraid of protests by students, the government dispersed the University of Yangon to sites outside the capital.

At the new Magway University, the medical students were learning surgery from books and videos, without working on human corpses because the government refused to pay for formaldehyde, two people familiar with the situation said.

In contrast to the deepening poverty — Myanmar's per capita income is calculated at $175 a year, far below neighboring Bangladesh — the military leaders were amassing fortunes, people said.

The latest evidence was a video leaked to a Web site, www.irrawaddy.org, based in Thailand, of the recent opulent wedding of General Than Shwe's daughter, Thandar Shwe. The video showed the bride, with her father alongside her, decked out in a necklace of six ropes of large diamonds, her hair looped with diamonds as well.

For those educated people who want change, the path is treacherous.

"I don't want to waste myself in jail," said one woman, who had two relatives imprisoned. "They were not the same when they came out."

In a similar vein to the dissidents in Eastern Europe in the 1980s, the woman said she believed change had to come from inside the country. But unlike Poland under Soviet rule, no unions are allowed in Myanmar, and most kinds of formal associations are considered suspect.

She said she held classes at her home on how to be more confident, how to strategize. She was trying to spread her classes to Buddhist monasteries and Christian churches, she said.

"Only education can change people because people don't know anything," she said. "Only about 10 percent of the people know what is going on." Sometimes she was in such despair, she said, that she believed that the only way to win against the government was "to think like them."

"But we can't think like them," she added, "nobody thinks like them."

Not all opposition groups that work outside the country believe that Washington's hard line is serving the best interests of Myanmar or the United States.

DOJ_NMG_0095750

With its policy of isolation, the Bush administration was allowing China, and to a lesser extent, India, to have a free hand in Myanmar to the exclusion of the United States, said Aung Naing Oo, who spent a year at the John F. Kennedy School of Government at Harvard University and who is the author of several books on Myanmar.

"The geopolitical situation favors the Burmese military," he said. "China and India both want to support it, and the Asian nations have no teeth."

Still, on a recent trip to Vietnam, a delegation of Myanmar officials heard something that astounded them, he said. They went to find out why Vietnam had become so suddenly prosperous.

"The Vietnamese said one word: 'The Americans.' The Burmese could not believe that after fighting a war Vietnam was friendly with the United States."

The Green Leap Forward (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

The New York Times, November 17, 2006

A friend of mine here wakes up every morning and does his own air quality test — as many Beijing residents do: He looks out his 24th-story window and checks how far he can see. On a rare pristine day, when the wind has swept Beijing, he can see the Fragrant Mountain rising to the northwest. On a "good" pollution day, he can see the China World building four blocks away. On a bad day, he can't see the building next door.

Shortly before I arrived in Beijing, China had been host of a summit meeting of 42 African leaders. Time magazine reported that Beijing officials had "ordered half a million official cars off the roads and said 400,000 more drivers had 'volunteered' to refrain from using their vehicles" in order to clean up the air for their African guests. No sooner were they gone, however, than all the cars returned and Beijing's air went back to "unhealthy." China's Environmental Protection Administration, Time noted, recently estimated the annual number of premature deaths in China caused by air pollution at 358,000.

No, China's officials are not in denial about their environment. But they also have not fully come to grips with how big a project it will be to take this incredible locomotive of an economy and clean up the engine without stopping the train.

I would argue that the same kind of bruising effort it took for Deng Xiaoping to move China from communism to capitalism will be required to move China from its polluting model of capitalism to a sustainable one. Mao almost destroyed China with his Cultural Revolution to make it more red, more communist. Without a new cultural revolution to make China more green, more sustainable, the Chinese growth juggernaut will destroy itself.

"To reverse this kind of situation we can't just make speeches," Pan Yue, China's vice minister for environmental protection, told me. "It will only come from a shift of attitudes from the very top to the very bottom. My job is to educate and encourage this shift, so that officials don't just think about economic growth as G.D.P. growth, but also factor in environmental health."

Three big shifts will be needed. The first is addition by subtraction. China can't go on trying to solve its energy problem by building the equivalent of two 600-megawatt coal-fired power plants a week. China needs California-style virtual efficiency "power plants" — E.P.P.s. These E.P.P.s are companies formed to identify and implement ways to save energy — from better lights to better designs to more efficient appliances — in a particular region. E.P.P.s sell the kilowatt-hours they save to the power grid at a fraction of the cost the grid would have had to invest to generate that same power with a coal-fired plant. The idea is to have profit-driven companies focused on adding power — by saving it where it is not needed so there will be more capacity where it is needed — without having to build more smokestacks. China is exploring E.P.P.s.

Second, China has set ambitious environmental targets. But it has to better persuade officials at every level that meeting not only their growth targets but also their "green" targets will determine if they advance or not.

China's 10th five-year plan, which began in 2000, called for a 10 percent reduction in the sulfur dioxide that produces acid rain. When that plan concluded in 2005, air pollution in China had increased by 27 percent. The 11th five-year plan calls for a 20 percent improvement in energy consumption for every percent of G.D.P. growth and a 10 percent reduction in pollution, now from a higher base.

This time, Beijing is stipulating exactly how much each province and locality and the top 1,000 factories have to improve. So far, though, the first year has seen another increase in air pollution. Until local officials start getting fired en masse for missing their green targets, you won't see big change.

Finally, China's leaders are going to have to allow more press freedom and public participation, because the best environmental watchdogs are local newspapers and farmers. Beijing, to its credit, has begun to allow citizens to take part in environmental impact assessments and to bring environmental lawsuits. But this needs to go further.

I repeat: China's leaders do get it. But moving this place to a new sustainable model will take more than ordinary leadership. It will take a giant leader who by sheer force of will moves the whole system against all the entrenched habits and interests. It will take a green Deng Xiaoping. Nothing else will suffice. Otherwise, every day here will feel like midnight at noon.

Don't Close The Door On Free Trade In The Andes (WSJ)

By Mary Anastasia O'Grady

The Wall Street Journal, November 17, 2006

Sometimes it seems that our elected representatives in Washington are not all that bright. Either that or they don't always act with the best interests of the American people in mind.

Take the opposition on Capitol Hill to the pending free trade agreements between the U.S. and Peru and Colombia. The Bush administration has already signed the FTA with Peru and is expected to sign the Colombia FTA by the end of next week. But to be implemented, both pacts need to be ratified by the U.S. Congress. Right now, with the Democratic leadership opposed and some Republicans unwilling to back the president, that looks doubtful.

Just how the defeat of these two trade pacts is supposed to benefit American democracy, security or living standards is a riddle. The opposite is true: If a U.S. goal is to increase stability and prosperity abroad and to make the homefront safer and living standards higher for Americans, killing the U.S.-Peru deal is dumb. Knocking off the agreement with Colombia is even dumber.

Consider U.S. economic interests alone. Forget the fact that these two countries, with a combined population of more than 72 million people and per capita gross domestic products in 2003 of less than $2,200, would greatly benefit from more liberalized trade. Assume for a moment that Washington doesn't give a hoot about Third World hardship. Even if all this is true, and American politicians are only interested in serving Americans, ratifying these two trade agreements is still the only rational thing to do.

The U.S. economy is already relatively open to both Peruvian and Colombian imports under the Andean Trade Preferences Act. Since 1991 both countries have enjoyed duty-free access to the U.S. market for the vast majority of their products.

Since 2002 the ATP has been tied to "cooperation" in the U.S. war on drugs, which has meant an increase in violence and instability in the region in a senseless effort to end the supply of coca coming from the Andes. So our Andean friends have certainly "paid" for their preferential access to the U.S. Yet under the ATP there is no quid pro quo for trade liberalization on the part of Peru or Colombia. If the two free trade agreements are not ratified, it is likely the ATP will be renewed in the interest of the drug war.

A better U.S. policy, for all sides, would be to keep the U.S. market open to Peruvian and Colombian goods but also to open those domestic markets to American goods. That's what would happen under the FTAs. Under the U.S.-Peru agreement, 80% of U.S. exports of consumer and industrial products to Peru will be immediately duty-free once the deal is sealed and another 7% will become duty-free after five years. Nearly the entire economy will be open after 15 years. In the case of Colombia, 80% of U.S. exports of consumer and industrial products will be duty-free immediately and the rest of the duties will phase out over 10 years.

As it stands now, Peruvian and Colombian trade policies incorporate a "high level of protectionism," according to the 2006 Heritage-The Wall Street Journal Index of Economic Freedom. But both countries are already demonstrating an appetite for U.S. goods. U.S. exports to Peru, despite protectionism, are now more than $2 billion annually. In 2005, U.S. goods exports to Colombia were $5.4 billion. Inflation is low and the currencies stable in both countries and both boast young populations eager to become consumers in a globalized market. Access to this demographic is a U.S. exporter's dream.

Retail consumers are not the only market for U.S. businesses. Thomas Gales, Caterpillar Tractor's vice president for Latin America, has testified that Colombia and Peru are important destinations for his company's heavy equipment. With the elimination of import tariffs on machinery made in Caterpillar's East Peoria and Decatur, Illinois plants, he says Cat's competitiveness in the region will be further enhanced.

The American Farm Bureau Federation estimates that when the deal is fully implemented, exports to Peru (a market half the size of Colombia) could grow by $700 million annually. Both agreements also liberalize the service sectors.

If these export opportunities are not convincing enough, consider the risks to U.S. competitiveness of nixing the deals. If the U.S. doesn't negotiate free trade in these markets, the European Union, Japan and the rest of Latin America probably will.

For those who care about Latin American poverty, there are even better reasons to ratify the free-trade pacts. The most immediate beneficiaries of more trade with the U.S. will be the consumers in Peru and Colombia who will have more choice and better prices. Countries that open experience improvement in their export accounts, as access to inputs helps local producers improve competitiveness.

None of this matters to Big Labor, of course, which is out to kill both deals. Democrats on the hook to unions for the party's Election Day victory have already memorized Labor's script: Trade with Peru and Colombia cannot be allowed because those countries don't protect worker rights. Never mind that both have signed on to all International Labor Organization conventions.

Andrés Mejía-Vergnaud, of the Freedom and Progress Institute in Bogotá, points out that in the case of Colombia, opponents to the FTA are arguing against ratification because union leaders have been murdered. "But it's hard to see the connection between the killing of union leaders and the trade agreement," he says. "Remember that not only union leaders have been killed in Colombia: journalists, judges, business leaders, politicians, etc., all of us have been in danger here. It has to do with a generalized state of violence that the country has been going through, and has nothing to do with free trade. The crisis of unions in Colombia is also related to corruption and rapacity in public unionism. No wonder union leaders were once known here as the 'blue-collar oligarchy.'"

Colombia is not the only place where a Big Labor oligarchy has been known to call the shots for the rest of us. The Democratic-led Congress taking over in January is likely to experience a similar tyranny. That means that the only hope now for a step forward in U.S.-Latin American trade relations lies with Republicans, who would be wise to pass these FTAs before they leave the majority in December.

No More Delays For Kosovo (NYT)

The New York Times, November 17, 2006

For the past seven years, the tiny Balkan region of Kosovo has been in limbo. Administered by the United Nations, it is not an independent state. But it is no longer a province of Serbia. That ended after Serbia's rulers tried to kill or drive out Kosovo's ethnic Albanians — and NATO went to war to save them.

Limbos are not stable. And the U.N. mediator in talks on the region, Martti Ahtisaari, was expected to announce by the end of this year that it was time to start Kosovo on the path to closely monitored independence. Instead, he put off the decision until after Serbia's parliamentary elections — scheduled for January — for fear of bolstering Serbian ultranationalists. This postponement, only the most recent of many, should be the last.

After the 1999 war there has never been a realistic possibility of rejoining Kosovo and Serbia. Kosovo was supposed to earn independence by proving its willingness to govern responsibly and to protect its ethnic Serb minority. A lot more needs to be done on both those fronts.

But the United Nations has limited patience to keep administering Kosovo, and without the stability of statehood there will be no foreign investment and the beleaguered economy will not improve. Lack of economic prospects is feeding Albanian nationalism, and until Kosovo's status is settled, anger will remain close to the surface.

Even as it moves Kosovo toward statehood, the U.N. should keep a substantial military and advisory presence there, both to ensure the rights of the Serb minority and to encourage democratic development.

Belgrade will always object to Kosovo's independence. The best chance of moderating its reaction is the promise of eventual membership in the European Union and a clear warning that Europe will be watching how it treats its new neighbor. The Kosovars should be clear that donors and everyone else will be watching just as closely to see how they treat their own Kosovar Serbs.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Jurors Begin Weighing Perjury Case Against Man Who Knew Two Sept. 11 Hijackers (NYT)

By Ray Rivera

The New York Times, November 17, 2006

Lawyers gave closing arguments yesterday in the latest phase of a drawn-out legal battle involving a Jordanian immigrant accused of trying to mislead a grand jury investigating the Sept. 11 attacks.

Prosecutors say the immigrant, Osama Awadallah, who is on trial for the second time in Federal District Court in Manhattan, lied repeatedly when he told a grand jury in October 2001 that he did not know Khalid al-Midhar, who took part in the attacks, and when he denied writing Mr. Midhar's name in a school notebook.

"Mr. Awadallah didn't tell the truth over and over and over," said Karl Metzner, an assistant United States attorney. Mr. Awadallah's lawyer, Jesse Berman, countered by saying that his client never meant to give the grand jury wrong information, and did so only after enduring 20 days of incarceration that left him confused, frightened and paranoid.

The case began when perjury charges were filed against Mr. Awadallah five years ago. The charges were thrown out by one judge and reinstated by an appeals court. Mr. Awadallah's first trial, in the spring, ended in a hung jury.

Mr. Berman said that before his grand jury testimony, his client was a model of cooperation. He readily told investigators that he knew another of the hijackers, Nawaf al-Hazmi, and consented to searches of his apartment, car and computer, even supplying the password: Islam.

"He went above and beyond the call," Mr. Berman said. "Is this someone that's trying to mislead a grand jury?"

The jury, made up of nine women and three men, deliberated for about an hour late yesterday before breaking for the evening. They will resume deliberations this morning.

Mr. Awadallah, 26, is charged with two counts of perjury and faces a maximum of 10 years in prison and then deportation if convicted.

The five-day trial was held in the same dark-paneled courtroom where, in May, a jury became hopelessly deadlocked over Mr. Awadallah's fate, with all but one juror favoring conviction.

Mr. Awadallah, who has been free on bail in San Diego, sat quietly throughout yesterday's proceedings. Behind him in the sparsely filled gallery sat his older brother, Jamal, a San Diego businessman, and their father, Ismail, a retired halal butcher who had arrived the night before from Jordan.

As in the earlier trial, prosecutors did their best to close the distance between ground zero, which sits just blocks from the courthouse, and the five years since the attacks.

"He didn't just lie to a grand jury," Mr. Metzner said. "He lied just a month after the attacks, when so much was still unknown."

Mr. Awadallah has never been accused of plotting with the terrorists or having advance knowledge of the attacks. But Mr. Metzner told jurors that Mr. Awadallah's lies to the grand jury, coming in the days after the attacks with fear of more attacks permeating the air, could have sent investigators meandering down wrong and time-consuming paths.

The government's interest in Mr. Awadallah began after investigators discovered a scrap of paper with the name "Osama" and Mr. Awadallah's former telephone number in the glove compartment of a car that Mr. Hazmi had left at Dulles International Airport, near Washington.

At the time, Mr. Awadallah was a 21-year-old college student in San Diego, where Mr. Hazmi and Mr. Midhar had lived until about a year before they boarded American Airlines Flight 77, which crashed into the Pentagon.

DOJ_NMG_0095758

Under questioning by the F.B.I., Mr. Awadallah said he knew Mr. Hazmi, who worked at the same gas station and worshiped at the same mosque. He also said he remembered an acquaintance of Mr. Hazmi and described him physically but said he had never learned his name. When shown a picture of Khalid al-Midhar, Mr. Awadallah claimed not to recognize him.

After two days of interviews, Mr. Awadallah was detained as a material witness on Sept. 21, 2001, and was held in isolation at several jails.

In his first grand jury appearance nearly three weeks later, Mr. Awadallah again denied knowing anyone named Khalid. But after a long day of testimony, prosecutors showed him an essay booklet given to them by Mr. Awadallah's teacher of English as a Second Language. In it, written just four days after the terrorist attacks, was the passage: "One of the quietest people I have met is Nawaf. Another one, his name is Khalid."

Mr. Awadallah at first said the booklet appeared altered, because he would not have spelled "Khalid" that way. Mr. Berman said that his client realized his mistake shortly after testifying and alerted his lawyers to it, but that prosecutors chose not to call the grand jurors back into the room.

When Mr. Awadallah appeared again before the grand jury five days later, he acknowledged that the handwriting was his and that he now remembered meeting Mr. Midhar.

During the trial, Mr. Berman showed a chart of bruises on Mr. Awadallah's upper arms and the back of his neck, which he said his client had sustained at the hands of guards. The government has denied any mistreatment.

By the time Mr. Awadallah appeared before the grand jury, he was disoriented, exhausted and "freaked out," which is why he initially believed that the booklet had been doctored, Mr. Berman said.

His comments underscored the notion that, though Judge Shira Scheindlin of Federal District Court warned jurors otherwise, the government was on trial for its treatment of Mr. Awadallah.

In 2002, Judge Scheindlin threw out the perjury charges against Mr. Awadallah, calling them the fruit of an illegal detention and saying that the government used duress and coercion to get him to agree to interviews.

The charges were reinstated more than a year later after a federal appeals court overturned Judge Scheindlin's ruling.

Jury Weighs Fate Of Man Accused Of Lying About Sept. 11 Hijacker (FINDLAW/AP)

By David B. Caruso, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 17, 2006

(AP) - NEW YORK-For the second time, a jury is considering whether a foreign college student involuntarily sucked into the Sept. 11 terror probe tried to distance himself from the case by lying to a grand jury about how well he knew one of the hijackers.

Osama Awadallah was arrested in San Diego 10 days after the 2001 terror attacks when a slip of paper with his phone number on it was found in a hijacker's car. He spent the next 20 days jailed as a material witness while authorities tried to figure out what he knew.

Agents finally concluded that Awadallah was no terrorist and had only known hijackers Nawaf al-Hazmi and Khalid al-Mihdhar briefly, but he was charged with perjury over a contentious grand jury session in which he claimed he didn't remember al-Mihdhar's name.

The first trial on the perjury charge ended in a hung jury last spring.

In his closing argument at the retrial on Thursday, defense attorney Jesse Berman said Awadallah, who was 20 when he was arrested, was simply exhausted, confused and frightened during his grand jury testimony and didn't intend to mislead anyone.

"He was sincerely trying to be helpful," Berman said.

He accused FBI agents and prosecutors of deliberately provoking and upsetting Awadallah, who was handcuffed to his chair. In the weeks leading up to his testimony, Awadallah was kept in solitary confinement and was subjected to strip searches. He also claimed to have been beaten by his jailers.

"All the importance of the 9/11 investigation doesn't justify treating this man like a dog," Berman said.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Karl Metzner told jurors there was no evidence Awadallah was confused, forgetful or disoriented by mistreatment.

"He didn't make a mistake. He lied deliberately," Metzner said.

The smoking gun, he said, was an examination booklet that Awadallah had filled out for an English class a few days before his arrest.

In it, he had written, "One of the quietest people I have met is Nawaf. Another one, his name is Khalid." Metzner said that proved that Awadallah knew the hijackers better than he had let on.

"He decided he was only going to tell the grand jury as much as he thought he had to, and no more," Metzner said.

DOJ_NMG_0095759

Jurors began their deliberations Thursday evening. They went home for the night without having reached a verdict and were to continue their work Friday.

Awadallah, who was born in Venezuela and raised in Jordan, could face up to five years in prison if convicted, although U.S. District Judge Shira Scheindlin said during the case that she would be unlikely to sentence him to significant jail time. He also could be deported.

The trial focused on a strained exchange between Awadallah and his interrogators during his grand jury testimony of Oct. 10, 2001.

During the session, Awadallah acknowledged repeatedly that he knew al-Hazmi. The two had attended the same mosque and worked at the same gas station in San Diego.

He also described a second man who was often in al-Hazmi's company but said he couldn't remember his name. Asked if he knew anyone named Khalid, Awadallah said no.

A skeptical prosecutor then confronted Awadallah with the examination booklet.

Caught off guard, Awadallah initially claimed someone else had doctored the document. Five days later, he appeared before the grand jury a second time and acknowledged that the sentence was his. He said his earlier testimony had been confused.

Pentagon Wants War-crimes Compound At Guantanamo (MH)

By Carol Rosenberg

The Miami Herald, November 17, 2006

The Pentagon plans a Military Commissions compound at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, costing up to $125 million, a major undertaking meant to accommodate up to 1,200 people at the Navy base for the first U.S. war crimes trials since World War II, The Miami Herald learned Thursday.

If funded by Congress, it would be the largest single construction expenditure at Guantánamo since the Bush administration set up the offshore detention and interrogation center in January 2002.

No Defense Department official would speak about the project with his or her name attached.

But one Pentagon insider with knowledge of the plan said officials envision the fast-track construction of a major compound at an abandoned airfield that in the 1990s housed a tent camp for Cuban rafters. Years before it had been a dirigible hangar for U.S. military blimps.

Some of the details are specified in a "pre-solicitation notice," which has been posted on the Web for potential government contractors.

The proposed complex would have housing, dining and work space for anyone involved in the trials. The project seeks to have two courtrooms completed by July, and an option to build two more before 2008, said the Pentagon official, who requested he not be identified because he wasn't authorized to speak for the department.

The official did not know whether the Pentagon would seek authorization and funding from the so-called lame-duck Congress controlled by the Republicans, or wait until the Democrats take control of Congress in January.

"They're going to have to go to Congress," the official said, adding that the Navy posted the notice for would-be contractors Nov. 3, ahead of the general elections, ``really to give folks out there interested in that kind of work a heads up that something is coming."

Bill Sutey, military advisor on the staff of Florida Democratic Sen. Bill Nelson, a member of the Senate Armed Services Committee, said, ``As a matter of law, it would require an appropriation. It's not even authorized yet."

"To anybody it would beg questions about, What are we doing here? Why are we doing it this way? What is the requirement? Why is it going to cost that much? These are routine oversight questions and we will do this," Sutey said.

The U.S. Supreme Court in June shut down the administration's first effort to stage the commissions, declaring the formula unconstitutional.

Now, armed with a new Military Commissions Act approved by Congress, administration officials are rewriting rules for the trials. They could resume in early 2007 with suspected terrorists being charged, according to the chief prosecutor, Air Force Col. Morris Davis.

The Pentagon proposal estimates the cost of the project to be from $75 million to $125 million. It would include a courthouse with two courtrooms, a communications and closed-circuit center, a motorpool facility for up to 100 cars, housing for 800-1,200 personnel and a dining facility for up to 800 people.

To put the project in perspective, the annual operating costs at the detention center some miles away are about $100 million, according to Rear Adm. Harry Harris, the center's commander.

DOJ_NMG_0095760

Once the Pentagon makes a formal request, the first opportunity to fund the new complex would be to include in supplemental spending packages being prepared by Congress for votes after a Thanksgiving recess.

The Navy would administer the building contract for what the pre-solicitation notice calls a ``Legal Compound at U.S. Guantánamo Bay, Cuba."

It lists the site as McCalla Field, an area overlooking the bay itself -- a considerable distance from the bluff overlooking the Caribbean where the 430 or so "enemy combatants" are housed and interrogated in a facility called Camp Delta and ringed by barbed-wire.

A Camp Delta spokesman, Navy Cmdr. Robert Durand, said by e-mail Thursday that the Office of the Secretary of Defense is responsible for any Military Commissions activity, but he believed ``a supplemental budget appropriation request is going out soon."

Navy Lt. Cmdr. Chito Peppler, a Pentagon spokesman for Guantánamo, said he had no information to release on the proposed court complex.

Other spokesmen at Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld's Public Affairs division did not respond to inquiries about the proposed project.

Earlier efforts to stage the trials focused on alleged al Qaeda conspirators, among them Yemeni captive Salim Ahmed Hamdan, whose defense attorney, a Navy officer, challenged the formula in the civilian courts.

Since then, the CIA has sent to Guantánamo 14 suspected al Qaeda ringleaders -- among them alleged 9/11 mastermind Khalid Sheik Mohammed. Their presence at Guantánamo has heightened international interest in any prospective future war crimes trials.

Mohammed and the 13 other men had been interrogated and held in secret for three or more years, out of reach of the International Red Cross, and never charged with any crimes.

Report: Gitmo Detainees Denied Witnesses (AP-Y)

By Ben Fox, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 17, 2006

The U.S. military called no witnesses, withheld evidence from detainees and usually reached a decision within a day as it determined that hundreds of men detained at Guantanamo Bay were "enemy combatants," according to a new report.

The analysis of transcripts and records by two lawyers for Guantanamo detainees, aided by more than two dozen law students, found that hearings that determined whether a prisoner should remain in custody gave the accused little opportunity to contest allegations against him.

"These were not hearings. These were shams," said Mark Denbeaux, an attorney and Seton Hall University law professor who along with his son, Joshua, is the author of the report. They provided an advance copy of the report to The Associated Press late Thursday and planned to release it Friday on the Internet.

Their report, based on an analysis of records of military hearings of 393 detainees, comes as the U.S. government seeks to severely restrict detainee access to civilian courts, arguing that the Combatant Status Review Tribunals should be their main legal recourse.

Navy Cmdr. Jeffrey Gordon, a Pentagon spokesman, dismissed the findings as "recycled allegations," and noted the tribunals gave each detainee an opportunity to contest their designation as an enemy combatant.

"It is not a criminal trial and is not intended to determine guilt or innocence," Gordon said. "Rather, it is an administrative process ... to confirm the status of enemy combatants detained at Guantanamo as part of the Global War on Terrorism."

The military held Combatant Status Review Tribunals for 558 detainees at the U.S. Naval Base at Guantanamo Bay in southeast Cuba between July 2004 and January 2005 and found all but 38 were enemy combatants. Handcuffed detainees appeared before a panel of three officers with no defense attorney, only a military "personal representative."

According to the report, the representatives said nothing in the hearings 14 percent of the time and made no "substantive" comments in 30 percent. In some cases, the representative even appeared to advocate the government's position, the report said.

The report is based on transcripts of tribunals that the government first released earlier this year in response to a Freedom of Information Act lawsuit filed by The Associated Press as well additional records provided by lawyers for 102 Guantanamo detainees.

Twenty-one first-year law students at Seton Hall University in Newark, N.J., analyzed the documents to create a database analyzed by eight second- and third-year students.

Among their findings:

· The government did not produce any witnesses in any hearing.

DOJ_NMG_0095761

· The military denied all detainee requests to inspect the classified evidence against them.

· The military refused all requests for defense witnesses who were not detained at Guantanamo.

· In 74 percent of the cases, the government denied requests to call witnesses who were detained at the prison.

· In 91 percent of the hearings, the detainees did not present any evidence.

· In three cases, the panel found that the detainee was "no longer an enemy combatant," but the military convened new tribunals that later found them to be enemy combatants.

"No American would ever consider this to be hearing," Denbeaux said. "This is a show trial."

The U.S. military now holds about 430 men at Guantanamo on suspicion of links to al-Qaida or the Taliban and holds Administrative Review Boards for them once a year to determine whether they should still be held, released or transferred to another country.

The Military Commissions Act, which President Bush signed on Oct. 17, strips all non-U.S. citizens held under suspicion of being an enemy combatant of their right to challenge their detention in civilian courts with petitions of habeas corpus.

Friend Of 9/11 Hijackers Convicted As An Accessory To Murder (WP)

The Washington Post, November 17, 2006

KARLSRUHE, Germany, Nov. 16 -- A Moroccan man was convicted of being an accessory to murder in the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon, as a German appeals court ruled Thursday that evidence showed he knew that the plotters planned to hijack and crash planes.

The Federal Court of Justice found that a Hamburg court decided wrongly last year to acquit Mounir Motassadeq of direct involvement in the attacks, even as it convicted him of membership in a terrorist organization and sentenced him to seven years in prison.

Motassadeq, 32, was a close friend of hijackers Mohamed Atta, Marwan al-Shehhi and Ziad Samir Jarrah when they lived and studied in Hamburg. He has acknowledged training at an al-Qaeda camp in Afghanistan but has insisted he knew nothing of their plans.

"The defendant is guilty not only of membership in a terrorist organization, but also as an accessory to murder of the 246 passengers and crew members of the crashed aircraft," the federal court said.

It ordered the Hamburg court to reconsider his sentence. Motassadeq, who was not present for the ruling, now could face a maximum of 15 years in prison.

That could end a five-year saga that started with his arrest in Hamburg in November 2001 and has featured two trials -- although defense lawyers held out hope of taking his case to Germany's highest court.

Motassadeq, who already has spent a total of about three years in prison, has been free pending appeals since February, although he has had to hand in his passport to authorities and report regularly to police. An Associated Press reporter saw him leaving his Hamburg home in a car on Thursday.

No date was set for sentencing, and federal prosecutors said a Hamburg court later Thursday rejected their plea to return him to prison immediately. Prosecutors said they would appeal that decision.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Man With Nuclear Data, Cash Arrested At Detroit Airport (USAT)

By Donna Leinwand

USA Today, November 17, 2006

Federal agents continue to investigate a Dallas man arrested at a Detroit airport Tuesday after arriving on a flight from Amsterdam with nearly $79,000 in cash and a laptop computer that, according to court papers, contained information about nuclear materials and cyanide.

Sisayehiticha Dinssa will appear for a detention hearing before U.S. Magistrate Judge R. Steven Whalen at 1 p.m. Monday. He is charged with illegally concealing more than $10,000 in his luggage and with smuggling bulk cash into the USA. If convicted, Dinssa could be sentenced to five years in prison on each charge.

DOJ_NMG_0095762

Agents said Thursday they had no evidence to suggest Dinssa was involved in a terrorism plot, Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) spokesman Greg Palmore said. "The initial findings definitely are making us want to find out more about this," Palmore added. "We need to get clear about what this guy was up to."

Dinssa, a naturalized U.S. citizen originally from Ethiopia, arrived at Detroit Metro Airport's McNamara Terminal on Tuesday on a Northwest Airlines flight from Amsterdam, according to a sworn statement by ICE Special Agent Zachary Keen.

Dinssa, described in court papers as unemployed, told agents he had spent the previous months in Nairobi and had tried to start a taxi business, Palmore said. Dinssa was traveling through Amsterdam and Detroit on his way to Phoenix, Palmore said. "He wasn't very forthcoming."

Dinssa had been flagged by Customs and Border Protection inspectors for further screening after agents received information from authorities abroad that Dinssa had been "acting very strangely," Palmore said.

Inspectors found $78,883 on Dinssa and in his luggage — $60,000 more than Dinssa reported carrying when questioned by Customs agents, Keen wrote. A drug-sniffing dog smelled narcotics on the money, Keen added. No drugs were found, Palmore said.

Inspectors examined Dinssa's computer after they noticed he did not have a power cord for it, which they considered unusual, Keen wrote. Inspectors found downloaded files about cyanide and nuclear materials, Keen wrote.

"When questioned about the materials on his laptop, Dinssa stated that he was interested in learning about cyanide and nuclear materials," Keen wrote.

"There are a lot of missing pieces to the puzzle," Palmore said.

Dinssa's court-appointed public defender, Leroy Soles, could not be reached for comment at his office Thursday.

Airport Arrest Turns Up Nuclear Info (AP)

The AP, November 16, 2006

A man was arrested at Detroit Metropolitan Airport after officials say they found him carrying nearly $79,000 in cash and a laptop computer containing information about nuclear materials and cyanide.

Sisayehiticha Dinssa, an unemployed U.S. citizen, was arrested Tuesday after a dog caught the scent of narcotics on cash he was carrying, according to an affidavit filed in court.

When agents asked him if he had any cash to declare, he said he had $18,000, authorities said. But when agents checked his luggage, they found an additional amount of about $60,900. When they scrolled through his laptop, they said they found the mysterious files.

At a court hearing Wednesday, Dinssa was ordered held in custody until at least until Monday at the request of prosecutors.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Leonid Feller argued Dinssa was a potential risk to the community and federal agents want to get a warrant to search his computer more thoroughly, The Detroit News reported Thursday. U.S. Magistrate Donald Scheer approved Feller's request to detain him.

Dinssa, who is from Dallas, arrived in Detroit from Nigeria by way of Amsterdam and was headed for Phoenix, Feller said. He is charged with concealing more than $10,000 in his luggage, which carries a maximum penalty of five years in prison, the Detroit Free Press reported.

A message seeking comment was left Thursday with his lawyer, Leroy Soles.

Man Stopped At Port Of Entry With Large Cash Sums And Laptop With Nuclear Information (ABC)

By Pierre Thomas And Jason Ryan

ABC News, November 17, 2006

A U.S. citizen of Ethiopian descent was arrested as he came into the U.S. on a flight from Amsterdam on Tuesday.

Sisayehiticha Dinssa was arrested by Immigration and Customs Enforcement agents after he was flagged for secondary inspection on entry to the U.S. at the Detroit Airport and was found to be carrying more than $78,000 in cash. Customs officials became suspicious of Dinssa when a narcotics dog signaled the scent of drugs on the money in his possession.

Customs officers also discovered that Dinssa was in possession of a laptop computer for which he had no power source. During an initial look at the computer, "Inspectors discovered some files that had been downloaded with information about cyanide and nuclear materials," an affidavit from an ICE agent filed in the U.S. District Court in Detroit noted.

According to two senior U.S. government officials briefed on the matter, the files appear to be beyond what someone would normally download from the Internet. According to U.S. officials, Dinssa may have been researching the materials extensively.

Dinssa had claimed he was only carrying $18,000. It is undetermined if this is an alleged smuggling case or potentially something more sinister.

According to federal law enforcement sources, U.S. intelligence agencies and counterterrorism officials have been tasked to run down any leads on Dinssa in their databases. According to the court records, when questioned about the information on his laptop, Dinssa said that he was "interested in learning about cyanide and nuclear materials."

FBI agents and investigators from the U.S. Attorney's Office are expected to obtain a search warrant and examine the hard drive of the computer to determine the nature of the computer files. The Justice Department has asked that Dinssa be held in custody until he makes an appearance Monday in federal court for a detention hearing.

Calls by ABC News to a lawyer representing Dinssa have not been returned.

Muslim Detained By CIA Granted U.S. Visa (WT)

By Shaun Waterman

The Washington Times, November 17, 2006

A German Muslim whose detention and torture by the CIA prompted an apology from Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will be granted a visa to come to the United States, although he might still be refused entry.

"Khaled el-Masri was found inadmissible to the United States on the basis of ... terrorist activities, and issued a visa on the basis of a waiver from the Department of Homeland Security," a State Department official told United Press International.

The official declined to comment further, saying that the details of visa decisions were confidential.

Department of Homeland Security spokesman Russ Knocke also declined to comment on the case.

Under U.S. law, a visa does not give a foreigner the right to enter the United States -- something that is granted at the port of entry by inspectors working for the Department of Homeland Security.

"He could still be turned away" if he was on the U.S. watch list of known or suspected terrorists, said one official.

Mr. el-Masri, a German citizen of Egyptian origin, said in a lawsuit last year that he was stopped at the Macedonian border in December 2003 while on vacation, and handed over to U.S. officials, who beat and drugged him, and took him to a secret prison in Afghanistan, where he was detained without charge and subjected to "coercive interrogation" for five months.

His case has become a lightning rod for European criticism of the United States over secret CIA prisons and other practices, including secret imprisonment of terror suspects without trial.

Mr. el-Masri has always denied any link to terrorism, and German Chancellor Angela Merkel said last year that Miss Rice had apologized for what she called "a mistake."

The American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU), which is representing Mr. el-Masri in his lawsuit, welcomed the news that he would be granted a visa.

"You would hope that after wrongfully detaining this man, torturing him, and then dumping him in Albania, they would have decency to let him come into the country to meet his lawyers," said ACLU attorney Anne Beeson.

But when Mr. el-Masri sought to enter the United States last December under the visa waiver available for German visitors, he was denied entry.

His lawyers said that he was met by homeland security officials and taken to an interview room for what is called secondary immigration screening.

After explaining the purpose of his trip, Mr. el-Masri "quite rightly refused to cooperate with authorities ... until his U.S. lawyer was present," ACLU lawyer Steven Watt told UPI.

He was told he was inadmissible under the visa waiver program, but could apply for a visa.

Two federal officials confirmed at the time that Mr. el-Masri's name was on the secret U.S. watch list of known or suspected terrorists, the Terrorist Screening Database.

One of them told UPI that there was a high-level dispute last year between the State Department and another agency, which had originally "nominated" Mr. el-Masri to the list.

"State wanted him taken off," said the official, adding that the dispute had risen to what he called "a high level" within the agencies involved.

Group Will Sort Terrorism Alerts For Local Governments (WP)

By Karen DeYoung

The Washington Post, November 17, 2006

A new plan to improve information-sharing about terrorism, signed by President Bush this week and delivered to Congress yesterday, establishes a Washington-based "threat assessment group" that includes federal, state and local officials. It also aims to reduce more than 100 restrictive and confusing categories of "sensitive" federal information to a half-dozen or fewer so local-level officials can better understand what they are told.

DOJ_NMG_0095764

State and local governments and law enforcement officials have long complained of a lack of coordination among the federal agencies that send terrorism-related alerts, analysis and instructions. The new plan allows state and local officials to participate in deciding what players outside the federal government need to know and designates an online channel to distribute the information.

The 165-page plan complies with part of the intelligence reorganization mandated by Congress in 2004. Designed to avoid a repeat of failures that preceded the September 2001 al-Qaeda attacks, the legislation created the Office of the Director of National Intelligence and the National Counterterrorism Center to facilitate coordination within the federal intelligence community. The legislation also ordered creation of new systems to ensure that terrorism information was adequately shared among federal, state and local entities, resulting in the plan released yesterday.

The newly released plan "restructures the way we handle intelligence and other information so that state and local customers get products that they can use," said Thomas E. McNamara, whose office, under Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte, wrote it with input from across the government. A career diplomat with extensive national security and counterterrorism experience, McNamara was appointed by Bush early this year to fulfill the legislation's vague instruction to establish an "information sharing environment."

The intelligence community has long acknowledged that cooperation throughout government is crucial to catching potential terrorists in this country and preventing another attack. But a level of "cultural inertia" still exists at the federal level, McNamara said.

"A lot of people think that information-sharing . . . means that security and control of the information being shared will be diminished, and if security diminishes, that's a negative," McNamara said. "I'm trying to convince them that if this is done right, security will be at least as good and possibly better."

McNamara expects the new Interagency Threat Assessment Coordination Group, based at the National Counterterrorism Center and headed by the Department of Homeland Security, to be operating by year's end. It will include officials from Justice, Defense, Transportation and Energy, and from state government and local law enforcement.

Operating 24 hours a day, seven days a week, the group will receive real-time intelligence information and determine what needs to be distributed around the country. That is designed to avoid confusion that has resulted in the past when one agency, for example, distributed a nationwide threat assessment that contradicted another agency.

The plan sets a 120-day deadline for coming up with a streamlined list of "sensitive but unclassified" security classifications used by the federal government. Federal agencies have independently established more than 100 such categories of restricted information, many of them overlapping and most of them confusing to police and sheriffs departments that are expected to comply with them. McNamara said he was aiming for "six or fewer" categories.

Army Urged On Chemical Weapon Disposal (AP)

AP, November 16, 2006

Technologies used to destroy chemical weapons in Europe and Japan are faster than one in the U.S. and should be considered, the National Research Council said Thursday.

In a study requested by the Army, the council said the foreign systems are as safe and sometimes more environmentally friendly that those in use here.

Destruction of chemical weapons recovered from burial sites has been under way since the early 1990s. An international convention calls for them to be destroyed by next April.

"If the U.S. Department of Defense decides to expedite the destruction of the large amounts of chemical weapons still buried in many parts of the country, using one of these technologies will be essential," said Richard Ayen, chairman of the committee that prepared the report. He is retired director of technology at Waste Management Inc. of Houston.

The study suggested three technologies for use:

_The Controlled Detonation Chamber, developed by DeMil International Inc. of Alabama and used in Europe. It places explosives around the munitions and then detonates them in a tightly sealed chamber.

_The Detonation of Ammunition in a Vacuum-Integrated Chamber technology, developed by Kobe Steel in Japan. It works in a similar way.

_A system developed by Swedish company Dynasafe. It detonates munitions in a kiln heated to temperatures between 720 degrees and 1,080 degrees Fahrenheit.

The council is an arm of the National Academy of Sciences, an independent organization chartered by Congress to advise the government on scientific issues.

U.S. Citizenship Of Former Graduate Student Born In West Bank Revoked (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0095765

AP, November 17, 2006

FAYETTEVILLE, Arkansas: A former University of Arkansas graduate student from the Middle East lost his U.S. citizenship Thursday and was sentenced to 15 months in federal prison.

Arwah Jaber, who was born in the West Bank, was previously acquitted of an aiding-terrorism charge but convicted of lesser offenses, including obtaining his citizenship fraudulently. He also was sentenced to three years supervised probation upon completion of his prison term.

Jaber was arrested at the Northwest Regional Airport on June 14, 2005, as he prepared to leave on a trip to the Middle East. Prosecutors said he planned to join Palestinian Islamic Jihad, labeled by U.S. authorities as a terrorist organization.

Jaber obtained a doctoral degree in chemistry from the university while he awaited trial.

He was acquitted June 20 of attempting to provide material support to a terrorist organization. But the jury convicted Jaber of five lesser charges: obtaining his naturalization unlawfully, making false statements on passport and immigration applications, and two counts of making false statements on credit card applications.

Jaber said at his trial that he did not cite his Palestinian name, Orwah Houshia, in immigration papers — though he applied for credit cards using that name — because he had used Arwah Jaber on all his immigration papers up until then.

VaxGen Wins Extension On Anthrax Vaccine (WP)

By Renae Merle

The Washington Post, November 17, 2006

VaxGen Inc., a California biotechnology firm, said yesterday that the government had given it more time to conduct human testing of its anthrax vaccine, postponing a decision on whether the program should be canceled.

The Food and Drug Administration threw the effort into doubt earlier this month after calling a halt to testing in response to questions about the drug's reliability. The decision put the company in potential violation of its contract with the Department of Health and Human Services, which required testing to begin Nov. 13.

VaxGen said HHS has decided to extend the company's deadline for resolving the issue until Dec. 18. At stake is a contract potentially worth $1 billion.

Meeting that deadline will be difficult. The company has yet to hold a formal telephone or in-person meeting with the FDA.

Those meetings should occur no later than the middle of December, said Lance Ignon, VaxGen's vice president of corporate affairs. "HHS, it appears, has provided the necessary time for us to meet with FDA to try to discuss our data and try to find a pathway forward," he said.

VaxGen's anthrax vaccine effort, already years behind schedule, is the largest component of the Bush administration's Project BioShield, a $5.6 billion effort to counter bioterrorism threats. The firm has run into several technical problems, including a previous failed human test, and has struggled to fund its research. The contract calls for the company to be paid after it delivers the vaccine -- which is supposed to be enough for 25 million people, roughly the population in the New York and Washington metropolitan areas combined.

The latest problem centers on the vaccine's stability or the rate at which it would deteriorate while stockpiled. VaxGen has said it was encouraged by the improvements it made to the vaccine's stability, but that FDA still had concerns.

WAR NEWS:

Convoy Of Civilians Hijacked In Iraq (AP)

By Bassem Mroue

AP, November 17, 2006

The Pentagon said a convoy of civilians traveling near Nasiriyah was hijacked on Thursday, while earlier in the day the Shiite-led Interior Ministry issued an arrest warrant for the top leader of the country's Sunni minority. The move was certain to inflame already raging sectarian violence.

Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman said preliminary reports suggested there could be as many as 14 people captured and that the convoy included about 19 vehicles.

An official familiar with the incident said preliminary reports being checked by the military indicated that the attack occurred at a checkpoint near Nasiriyah and that four Americans were believed to have been taken captive.

The official, who requested anonymity because of the security situation in Iraq, said it appears that some of the convoy drivers had been released, and were being interviewed by the military. He said initial reports suggest that the attack occurred at a checkpoint in a location where normally there is no blockade.

DOJ_NMG_0095766

The convoy was being operated by the Crescent Security Group. The company works mostly in Iraq, and its operations are based in Kuwait.

Interior Minister Jawad al-Bolani, a Shiite, announced Thursday on state television that Harith al-Dhari was wanted for inciting terrorism and violence among the Iraqi people.

Al-Dhari, head of the influential Sunni Association of Muslim Scholars, is an extreme hard-liner who recently mocked a government offer of reconciliation in return for abandoning the insurgency. But the move against him threatens to drive many moderate Sunnis out of the political system.

Already, moderate Sunnis have been threatening for weeks to leave the government and take up arms. If that happens, it would likely lead to a full-fledged civil war and make it much harder for U.S. troops to withdraw from Iraq.

The warrant was issued on a day when at least 49 Iraqis died violently and the U.S. military announced the deaths of four more American soldiers. Sunnis and Shiites could not agree on whether all hostages had been released from a mass abduction in Baghdad two days earlier, and one man said he'd been beaten by the kidnappers.

Mohammed Bashar al-Faidi, spokesman for the Sunni association, condemned the warrant for al-Dhari's arrest.

"This government should resign before the Iraqi people force it to resign," al-Faidi told Al-Jazeera television from Jordan. "The association calls on its people to be calm."

Al-Faidi accused the interior minister "of supporting terrorism by covering for (Shiite) militias that are killing the Iraqi people."

Earlier this year, the Sunni association blamed the Interior Ministry for the killing of a nephew and cousin of al-Dhari. Their bodies were found in a bullet-riddled vehicle in Baghdad.

Al-Dhari regularly travels between Iraq and the Persian Gulf states, as well as Syria, Jordan and Egypt. He was believed to be in Jordan when the arrest warrant was issued Thursday night.

Al-Dhari, who is about 65, is an outspoken critic of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's Shiite-dominated government and the U.S. occupation. On Tuesday, President Jalal Talabani, a Kurd, called him a hard-liner with "nothing to do but incite sectarian and ethnic sedition."

There is precedent for an arrest warrant leading to violence in Iraq.

In April 2004, a U.S. warrant against radical anti-American Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr prompted a two-week uprising by his Mahdi Army militia. Hundreds were killed.

Al-Maliki, despite heavy pressure from the United States, has done nothing to wipe out the Mahdi Army. Its benefactor, al-Sadr, is a key backer of the prime minister.

The Mahdi Army was believed responsible for kidnapping scores of people from a Higher Education Ministry office building in Baghdad on Tuesday. The aftermath of that mass abduction has turned into a propaganda war.

On Thursday, the Sunni higher education minister called the Interior Ministry "a farce" for not preventing the crime and claimed more than half the 150 victims were still in the hands of Shiite abductors.

But National Security Adviser Mouwafak al-Rubaie, a Shiite, said everyone had been freed and accused Arab satellite broadcasters and Western media of hostile reporting to incite sectarian hatred in Iraq.

Within hours, however, Brig. Gen. Abdul-Karim Khalaf, spokesman for the Interior Ministry, was amending that account, saying all the Higher Education Ministry employees were free but that others taken from the building were still hostages. He gave no numbers.

A Sunni who said he was among those abducted and released claimed his arm was broken by the kidnappers. He said he saw them kill at least three hostages after taking them to empty houses in Baghdad's Sadr City Shiite slum, a stronghold of the Mahdi Army.

The man, who goes by the name Abu Kadhim, or father of Kadhim, would not allow use of his full name for fear of further trouble with the Mahdi Army, which he blamed for his torture and 2 1/2 days in captivity. He disputed Khalaf's claim that police had freed the kidnap victims.

"Thursday, they just opened the doors and dragged us into trucks. Then they dumped us on Canal Street," Abu Kadhim said. That street runs along the Army Canal just west of Sadr City.

"I was lucky," he said. "They only beat me with a wooden club. Others were handcuffed and hanged from the ceiling by their wrists. They were beaten with iron bars. Others, building guards, had cotton shoved in their mouths and tape wound around their heads. They suffocated. One was shot in the back. The managers in the building and people with higher degrees, masters and doctorates, were in a different room. I could hear them screaming like women. Then it was quiet. I think they died."

Abu Kadhim's story could not be independently confirmed. He was interviewed by telephone.

In Thursday's deadliest attack in the capital, gunmen fired on a bakery, killing nine people, police said. Such attacks are usually carried out by Sunni militants since most bakeries in the capital are run by Shiites.

The U.S. military announced that three Task Force Lightning soldiers assigned to 3rd Brigade Combat Team, 1st Cavalry Division, were killed Wednesday in Diyala province northeast of Baghdad, one by small arms fire and two by a roadside bomb. A soldier from the Army's Multinational Corps-Iraq was killed Tuesday by small arms fire during an operation in Baghdad.

The deaths raised the number of American war dead to 2,862. So far this month in Iraq, 44 American service members have been killed or died.

Another Day Of Heavy Violence In Iraq (LAT)

By Louise Roug

The Los Angeles Times, November 17, 2006

BAGHDAD — Five more American soldiers have been killed in Iraq, the U.S. military said, and gunmen, rockets and roadside bombs killed at least 17 Iraqis and wounded 25 others Thursday.

For Iraqis in the capital, the violence began at 7 a.m., when a roadside bomb killed a policeman and injured three others in an eastern part of town. Twenty minutes later, armed men sprayed a bakery with gunfire, killing nine people and injuring two in central Baghdad.

A second bomb went off near a municipal court building on the eastern side of the city less than two hours later, killing one person and injuring eight others.

A third bomb injured four just before noon in the city center. Ten minutes later, a fourth bomb went off near a garbage collection point east of the Tigris River, killing one and injuring three others.

Later in the afternoon, explosives hidden in a motorcycle went off near a gas station in central Baghdad, killing one and injuring another. Four other bombs killed four people in separate attacks.

South of the capital, meanwhile, British forces were barraged by rockets and mortar fire; no one was killed in the attacks.

This morning, the U.S. military said a soldier was shot to death Thursday in the volatile Diyala province north of the capital. The other four Americans were killed in previous days.

In two separate attacks Wednesday in Diyala, one U.S. soldier was fatally shot and two others were killed by a roadside bomb. One more soldier was shot and killed in Baghdad on Tuesday, according to military statements.

At least 2,864 U.S. troops have died in Iraq since the 2003 American-led invasion, according to icasualties.org.+

The American military also announced the killing of nine suspected insurgents in Yousifiya, south of the capital. U.S.-led forces saw the suspected rebels hiding in nearby woods and called in air support. Several of the men killed in the aerial assault were wearing suicide vests, according to the U.S. military.

About 1,000 Iraqi soldiers searched villages south of the northern city of Kirkuk, where Iraqi and American troops have been targeted in the past.

Violence In Iraq Called Increasingly Complex (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, November 17, 2006

Attacks in Iraq reached a high of approximately 180 a day last month, reflecting an increasingly complicated conflict that includes sectarian clashes of Sunni and Shiite militias on top of continuing strikes by insurgents, criminal gangs and al-Qaeda terrorists, according to the directors of the CIA and the Defense Intelligence Agency.

"No single narrative is sufficient to explain all the violence we see in Iraq today," Gen. Michael V. Hayden, the CIA director, told the Senate Armed Services Committee on Wednesday.

Attempting to describe the enemy, Lt. Gen. Michael D. Maples, the DIA director, listed "Iraqi nationalists, ex-Baathists, former military, angry Sunni, Jihadists, foreign fighters and al-Qaeda," who create an "overlapping, complex and multi-polar Sunni insurgent and terrorist environment." He added that "Shia militias and Shia militants, some Kurdish pesh merga, and extensive criminal activity further contribute to violence, instability and insecurity."

In unusually harsh terms, the two intelligence directors spelled out how quickly the violence in Iraq has escalated this year, from about 70 attacks a day in January to about 100 a day in May and then to last month's figure. "Violence in Iraq continues to increase in scope, complexity, and lethality" despite operations by the Iraqi government and the U.S.-led coalition, Maples said. He described "an atmosphere of fear and hardening sectarianism which is empowering militias and vigilante groups, hastening middle-class exodus, and shaking confidence in government and security forces."

"The longer this goes on, the less controlled the violence is, the more the violence devolves down to the neighborhood level," Hayden added. "The center disappears, and normal people acting not irrationally end up acting like extremists."

Although the Bush administration continues to emphasize the role of al-Qaeda in Iraq, Maples described the current situation as "mostly an intra-Arab struggle to determine how power and authority will be distributed," with or without the U.S.

presence. Al-Qaeda and foreign terrorist numbers were put at roughly 1,300, while Hayden, pressed by senators, estimated the number of insurgents in the "low tens of thousands." Maples estimated the number of Iraqi insurgents, including militias, at 20,000 to 30,000, and said there are many more who supply support.

Asked about the brazen kidnapping in Baghdad on Tuesday of some 100 employees in the Sunni-led Ministry of Education by an apparent Shiite group in commando uniforms using Interior Ministry vehicles, Hayden said the CIA station chief in Iraq said it showed that the battlefield "is descending into smaller and smaller groups fighting over smaller and smaller issues over smaller and smaller pieces of territory."

Hayden said he believes that the turning point in the fighting came in February with the bombing of the Askariya mosque in Samarra. The destruction of the revered Shiite site by Sunni-based al-Qaeda terrorists unleashed what Hayden described as "historic forces" that have created "the satanic level of violence" of today.

"Sectarian violence now presents the greatest immediate threat to Iraq's stability and future," he said.

Underlying the sectarian fighting are not only deep-rooted religious differences, but also the more recent political history of Shiite suffering under the iron rule of Saddam Hussein and his Sunni- and Baathist Party-dominated government.

The Shiites, who make up more than half of Iraq's population, now want to make certain they control the new Iraqi government and to assure themselves that the Hussein group never regains power. "This fear of a return to Baathism is almost palpable among Shia elites," Hayden said.

As a result, the Shiites have maintained control of the Interior Ministry and the police. "Militias often operate under protection or approval of Iraqi police [when they] attack suspected Sunni insurgents and Sunni civilians," Hayden said. In addition, "radical Shia militias and splinter groups stoke the violence."

At the same time, Hayden said, there are fissures within the Shiite groups, and their "power struggles . . . make it difficult for Shia leaders to take actions that might ease Sunni fears." Adding to the problem is Iran, which is supporting even competing Shiite factions. "Iranian involvement with the Shia militias of all stripes . . . has been quite a new development," Hayden said.

Iraq's Government Issues Warrant For Sunni Cleric (LAT)

By Louise Roug And Borzou Daragahi

The Los Angeles Times, November 17, 2006

Baghdad, Iraq — Iraq's Shiite-led government issued an arrest warrant Thursday for the country's leading Sunni Arab cleric, accusing him of colluding with insurgents, a potentially explosive charge that could exacerbate tensions between the country's warring sectarian groups and further divide a fragile national government.

The move against Harith Dhari, the head of the Muslim Scholars Association, comes two days after an audacious daytime kidnapping in Baghdad ruptured the government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, setting Sunni politicians against Shiites.

In an appearance on state-run TV late Thursday evening, Interior Minister Jawad Bolani, a Shiite, announced that Dhari was wanted for inciting violence. "The government's policy is that anyone who tries to spread division and strife among the Iraq people will be chased by our security agencies," Bolani said.

Dhari has been a vocal, sometimes sarcastic, critic of the government, questioning the legitimacy of Saddam Hussein's criminal trials, and ridiculing the government's reconciliation efforts.

"The political process that the security of Iraq is depending on is a failing process so that is why the security is failing and deteriorating," he said on al Arabiya television on Nov. 11.

The warrant against Dhari virtually is certain to rekindle threats of a boycott of the government by Sunni Arab politicians. Sunnis have warned that such a walkout would have dire consequences, further entrenching an already brutal cycle of civil war and pushing more ordinary Sunnis toward the insurgency. It would also be a lethal blow to a coalition government that U.S. policymakers had hoped would pacify Iraq's often hostile sects and ethnic groups.

U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad spent months persuading mainstream parties representing the once-dominant Sunni Arab minority to join the Shiite-led government. But in recent months Shiite militiamen using the cover of the official security apparatus have waged a nightly subterranean war against Sunnis, whose bodies show up in drainage ditches with gunshot wounds, burn marks and other signs of torture every morning.

On Thursday, some Sunnis sounded like they already had passed their breaking point with the government.

"(The move) represents the bankruptcy of the sectarian government following one scandal after the other," association spokesman Mohammed Bashar Faidi told Al-Jazeera television. "The decisions of this government are worthless because it only rules the Green Zone."

Faidi charged Bolani with "supporting terrorism by covering for militias that are killing the Iraqi people," and told another regional channel that Dhari was in Jordan when the arrest warrant was issued.

DOJ_NMG_0095769

Although a ranking cleric, Dhari does not have the stature of Shiite Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani. But among Sunnis, he has emerged as a vocal representative of Sunni defiance and anger, and has become a leader of the fractious community.

Earlier in the week, Iraq's Kurdish President Jalal Talabani described Dhari as a hard-liner with "nothing to do but incite sectarian and ethnic sedition."

Violence and crime on the streets of Baghdad Thursday did not help matters. At least 17 people were killed by bombs and gunmen in the capital. In addition, gunmen dressed as police commandos kidnapped 15 people from a tea shop in a mixed neighborhood in central Baghdad, according to authorities.

Earlier in the week, a similar mass kidnapping of academics from a Sunni-led education ministry office intensified a mounting political crisis. Witnesses said that gunmen dressed in government-issued uniforms carted away as many as 150 people. Sunni politicians charge that as many as 80 are still missing -- a claim denied by al-Maliki and the Interior Ministry, which said everyone had been released unharmed.

Al-Maliki has promised to disarm and disband the Shiite militias wreaking havoc on the street. But Sunnis say the government has not done enough, particularly in failing to pursue leads provided by those who had been released in this week's kidnapping.

"The government hasn't moved a finger to investigate," said Salim Abdullah Jabouri, a spokesman for Iraq's main Sunni Arab party, which is part of the ruling government coalition. "The government is either weak or in collusion with the kidnappers or has lost control of the militias."

Sunnis say the lack of concessions they've obtained for their followers has built up sentiment for a government pullout.

Sunnis have been frustrated in their attempts to reduce the influence of Shiite militias, win guarantees that Iraq won't be partitioned and reverse laws that discriminate against former members of Saddam's Baath Party, which was dominated by Sunnis.

They've also demanded a release of the many Sunnis held in prisons on vague charges of colluding with the insurgency. They angrily accuse the Shiite-dominated government of using the legal and security apparatus for sectarian ends.

The Sunni bloc "has never done anything good for us," said Sheik Mehdi Sumaydai, a prominent Sunni cleric who does not favor pulling out of the government but says he is under increasing pressure from his followers to adopt more radical anti-government views.

"We are receiving a big pressure from our followers, who are calling and contacting us every day to withdraw from the process," said Nourdin Hiyali, a Sunni lawmaker. "But the leaders have a different way of thinking, as this will drive the country into very bad civil war."

If Sunni political parties abandoned the government, it could unravel months of effort by U.S. diplomats and push ordinary Sunnis closer to the camp of the insurgent groups, lawmakers warn.

"When the people we represent see us leaving the political process, they will join the resistance," said Sheik Hareth Obeidi, a Sunni member of parliament. "And this will be a disaster for Iraq."

Iyad Samarai, the No. 2 person in the main Sunni political party, said no decisions had been made about bolting. "Some of the people say, 'Well, we don't have to anything to lose and we don't want to stay with the government,'" he said. "Others say, 'We should try to improve the situation.' Both views exist."

Al-Maliki will convene the Cabinet next week to resolve the deepening political divisions and the threatened Sunni walkout, a member of his coalition said Thursday.

Redha Jawad Taqi, head of the main Shiite party's political section, agreed this week's abductions had worsened the political crisis, but said al-Maliki had summoned political leaders to try and solve it.

"We need more discussions between Shias and Sunnis, Sunnis and Kurds," Taqi said. "Because if the ship sinks, we all sink."

Interior Ministry Issues Warrant For Sunni Leader (WT/AP)

By Bassem Mroue

The Washington Times, November 17, 2006

BAGHDAD -- The Shi'ite-led Interior Ministry issued an arrest warrant yesterday for the top leader of the country's Sunni minority -- a move certain to inflame already raging sectarian violence in Iraq.

Interior Minister Jawad al-Bolani, a Shi'ite, said Harith al-Dhari was wanted for inciting terrorism and violence among the Iraqi people. His message was carried on Al Iraqiya state television.

DOJ_NMG_0095770

Mr. al-Dhari, head of the influential Sunni Association of Muslim Scholars, is an extreme hard-liner who recently mocked a government offer of reconciliation in return for abandoning the insurgency. But the move against him threatens to drive many moderate Sunnis out of the political system.

The warrant was issued on a day when at least 49 Iraqis were killed and the U.S. military announced the deaths of four American soldiers. Sunnis and Shi'ites could not agree on whether all hostages had been released from a mass kidnapping in Baghdad on Tuesday, and one man said he'd been beaten by the kidnappers.

Mohammed Bashar al-Faidi, spokesman for the Sunni association, condemned the warrant for Mr. al-Dhari's arrest.

"This government should resign before the Iraqi people force it to resign," Mr. al-Faidi said from Jordan. "The association calls on its people to be calm."

Mr. al-Dhari regularly travels between Iraq and the Persian Gulf states, as well as Syria, Jordan and Egypt. He was thought to be in Jordan when the arrest warrant was issued last night.

Mr. al-Dhari is an outspoken critic of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's Shi'ite-dominated government and the U.S. occupation. On Tuesday, President Jalal Talabani called him a hard-liner with "nothing to do but incite sectarian and ethnic sedition."

There is precedent for an arrest warrant leading to violence in Iraq.

In April 2004, a U.S. warrant against radical anti-American Shi'ite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr prompted a two-week uprising by his Mahdi Army militia. Hundreds were killed.

The Mahdi Army was thought to be responsible for kidnapping scores of people from a Higher Education Ministry office building in Baghdad on Tuesday. The aftermath of that mass abduction has turned into a propaganda war.

Yesterday, the Sunni higher education minister called the Interior Ministry "a farce" for not preventing the crime and claimed more than half the 150 victims were still in the hands of Shi'ite abductors.

But National Security Adviser Mouwafak al-Rubaie, a Shi'ite, said everyone had been freed and accused Arab satellite broadcasters and Western press of hostile reporting to incite sectarian hatred in Iraq.

Within hours, however, Brig. Gen. Abdul-Karim Khalaf, spokesman for the Interior Ministry, was amending that account, saying all the Higher Education Ministry employees were free but that others taken from the building were still hostages. He gave no numbers.

A Sunni who said he was among those abducted and released claimed the kidnappers broke his arm. He said he saw them kill at least three hostages after taking them to empty houses in Baghdad's Sadr City Shi'ite slum, a stronghold of the Mahdi Army.

The man, who goes by the name Abu Kadhim, or father of Kadhim, would not allow use of his full name for fear of further trouble with the Mahdi Army. His story could not be independently confirmed.

Shiite-Led Iraqi Ministry Seeks Arrest Of Top Sunni Cleric (WP)

By Sudarsan Raghavan

The Washington Post, November 17, 2006

BAGHDAD, Nov. 16 -- The Iraqi government on Thursday ordered the arrest of the country's most influential Sunni cleric for allegedly inciting violence and supporting terrorism, a move by the Shiite-led administration that could inflame the sectarian tensions already disfiguring the capital and other parts of Iraq.

Interior Minister Jawad al-Bolani declared on state television late Thursday that an arrest warrant had been issued for Harith al-Dhari, leader of the Association of Muslim Scholars, one of the most outspoken defenders of Iraq's minority Sunni Arabs after the U.S.-led invasion.

"We have proof that he is involved in terrorism," said Brig. Abdul Karim Khalaf, an Interior Ministry spokesman, without elaborating. "Wherever he is -- inside the country or outside the country -- the Iraqi courts will bring him to justice."

In recent weeks, Dhari had angered Shiite leaders by declaring on al-Arabiya television that the trial of ousted president Saddam Hussein was illegitimate, mocking efforts at national reconciliation and expressing support for al-Qaeda. He also said Shiite militias belonging to political parties had infiltrated "the majority of the security apparatuses at the Interior Ministry."

Dhari, a vocal critic of the Shiite-led government and its American backers, travels frequently outside Iraq and could not be reached for comment Thursday. He was believed to be in neighboring Jordan.

"The warrant that was issued is evidence that this government has lost its balance and that it is announcing its bankruptcy," Mohamad Bashar al-Faidy, a spokesman for the Association of Muslim Scholars, which represents Iraq's Sunni clergy, told al-Jazeera television Thursday night. He added that Dhari was not surprised by the warrant because he has been targeted before by the government.

DOJ_NMG_0095771

The move came as cracks emerged within Iraq's six-month-old unity government over the numbers of government employees taken in a mass kidnapping on Tuesday and whether some were tortured and killed. It also occurred on a day when the U.S. military announced that four soldiers were killed, bringing the total number of American deaths in the country to at least 45 this month.

Much of the day's other violence was directed at Shiite Muslims. Gunmen erected fake checkpoints in a Sunni neighborhood and seized Shiite passengers off minibuses, and nine Iraqis were gunned down in a bakery, a business typically run by Shiites.

In southern Iraq, a convoy of civilians traveling near Nasiriyah was hijacked Thursday, the Associated Press reported. Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman said preliminary reports suggested there could be as many as 14 people captured, and ABC News reported that four of those captured were believed to be Americans.

While Sunni Arabs revere Dhari, Shiite political leaders describe him as a hard-liner who is deepening sectarian divisions with his caustic rhetoric and vocal support for the Sunni insurgency.

Alaa Maki, a prominent Sunni political leader, said late Thursday that the arrest warrant suggested that the government was "ignorant politically" or had an agenda. "It's a politically weak decision coming from a weak government," said Maki, a senior official in the Iraqi Islamic Party, a leading Sunni Arab group. "It comes at a time when we need to calm down the situation, when we need to minimize tensions."

"Sheik Dhari is not calling for sectarianism and violence, and he's not calling for terrorism. The government has made a wrong judgment in this case," Adnan al-Dulaimi, a leader of the Iraqi Accordance Front, another Sunni coalition, told al-Jazeera on Thursday night. "We consider Dhari one of the best symbols of the Sunni leaders."

In explaining the arrest warrant, Bolani, the interior minister, said that "the government's policy is that anyone who tries to spread division and strife among the Iraqi people will be chased by our security agencies. . . . We have to prove for everyone that the government is national and it is going forward with major steps to achieve security and to achieve its political program."

In November 2004, U.S. troops raided the homes of Dhari and another senior official of the scholars association, triggering clashes in Baghdad near the association's headquarters and a mosque widely known for its militancy. Less than a year later, in June 2005, U.S. and Iraqi troops again raided Dhari's home.

A prominent Sunni member of Iraq's parliament, Saleh al-Mutlak, said he planned to ask parliament to shut down until the government revokes the warrant.

Several Sunni leaders called the order to arrest Dhari an attempt to deflect attention from the government, which is under enormous pressure to find the kidnappers of scores of Iraqis from a Higher Education Ministry building on Tuesday, one of the biggest mass abductions since the U.S.-led invasion. In the bold daylight raid, about 80 gunmen, dressed in police commando uniforms and driving police vehicles, abducted as many as 150 men.

On Thursday, Abed Thiyab, the minister of higher education, who is Sunni, said that some of the captives had been tortured and killed and that as many as 80 remained in the hands of their captors.

But Iraq's national security adviser issued a statement saying that only 50 Iraqis had been kidnapped and that all had been released. The Interior Ministry also declared all the captives were free, and the office of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki dismissed suggestions that any were tortured.

Military May Ask $127B For Wars (USAT)

By Richard Wolf

USA Today, November 17, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Bush administration is preparing its largest spending request yet for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, a proposal that could make the conflict the most expensive since World War II.

The Pentagon is considering $127 billion to $160 billion in requests from the armed services for the 2007 fiscal year, which began last month, several lawmakers and congressional staff members said. That's on top of $70 billion already approved for 2007.

Since 2001, Congress has approved $502 billion for the war on terror, roughly two-thirds for Iraq. The latest request, due to reach the incoming Democratic-controlled Congress next spring, would make the war on terror more expensive than the Vietnam War.

Sen. Kent Conrad, D-N.D., who will chair the Senate Budget Committee next year, said the amount under consideration is “$127 billion and rising.” He said the cost “is going to increasingly become an issue” because it could prevent Congress from addressing domestic priorities, such as expanding Medicare prescription drug coverage.

Rep. Jim Cooper, D-Tenn., who put the expected request at $160 billion, said such a sizable increase still “won't solve the problem” in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0095772

Bill Hoagland, a senior budget adviser to Senate Republicans, said: “At a minimum, they were looking at $130 (billion). If it goes higher than that, I'm not surprised.”

The new request being considered for the war on terror would be about one-fourth what the government spends annually on Social Security — and 10 times what it spends on its space program.

The White House called the figures premature. “They don't reflect a decision by the administration,” said budget office spokeswoman Christin Baker. “It is much too early in the process to make that determination.”

Before the Iraq war began in 2003, the Bush administration estimated its cost at $50 billion to $60 billion, though White House economic adviser Lawrence Lindsey had suggested in 2002 that it could cost as much as $200 billion.

Growing opposition to the war contributed to Democrats' takeover of the House and Senate in this month's elections. Pennsylvania Rep. John Murtha, an early critic of the war who lost his bid Thursday to be the House Democratic leader, vowed to use his clout as chairman of the House panel that reviews the Pentagon budget “to get these troops out of Iraq and get back on track and quit spending $8 billion a month.”

“The war's been an extraordinarily expensive undertaking, both in lives and in dollars,” said Senate Budget Committee Chairman Judd Gregg, R-N.H.

The new request is top-heavy with Army and Air Force costs to replace and repair equipment and redeploy troops, Hoagland said. That's why the 2007 cost is likely to top the war's average annual price tag.

Overall, he said, “we're easily headed toward $600 billion.” That would top the $536 billion cost of Vietnam in today's dollars. World War II cost an inflation-adjusted $3.6 trillion.

Leon Panetta, President Clinton's former chief of staff and a member of a bipartisan panel studying recommendations on Iraq for President Bush, said the Pentagon needs $50 billion to $60 billion to “restore the units that are being brought back here, to re-equip them and get them back to a combat-readiness status.”

Now, How To Put Iraqis In Charge (CSM)

By Peter Grier

The Christian Science Monitor, November 17, 2006

WASHINGTON

On Capitol Hill, there is near agreement on at least one aspect of Iraq policy: the Iraqis themselves need to shoulder more of the burden of stabilizing their country. But this consensus breaks down over the obvious follow-up question. How?

Many Democrats, newly emboldened by their election victories, favor an approach that might be labeled "tough love." It goes something like this: If the US plans a phased pullout of troops within four to six months, the Iraqi government will face up to what has to be done.

"This is not precipitous; it is a responsible way to change the dynamic in Iraq," said Sen. Carl Levin (D) of Michigan, soon to be chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, at a Wednesday hearing.

But the White House - and the top generals of the US military - favor a strategy that they consider more nurturing. The US needs to intensify efforts to train the Iraqi armed forces to fight for themselves, according to Gen. John Abizaid, US commander in the Middle East. A scheduled US pullout might simply cause Iraq's sectarian factions to prepare for chaos to come.

The gap between these approaches suggests that despite the recent shift in US politics, in Washington there are heated debates over Iraq yet to come.

"I believe in my heart of hearts that the Iraqis must win this battle with our help," General Abizaid told the Senate Armed Services Committee. The Iraq debate, post-midterms

Democrats don't ascend to control of the House and Senate until next year. But the promise of future power can lead to assertiveness in the present, and this week, with Congress back in session, Democrats were not shy about pressing their case for a change in strategy in Iraq.

Both the Senate and House armed services panels held full-dress hearings on Iraq Wednesday, the first such inquiries in months. At both, the established fault lines between party members, and among them, were on full display.

Senator Levin for instance, a Democratic party elder on military policy, kept pressing the idea of a phased pull-out, despite General Abizaid's objections. On the opposite end of the spectrum, Sen. John McCain (R) of Arizona, a likely front-runner for the 2008 GOP presidential nomination, waved about his proposal: an increase in troops of at least 20,000 to help bring stability to Baghdad.

Not that General Abizaid liked Senator McCain's ideas any better than those of Senator Levin.

Such an increase in US strength would have a very negative effect on public opinion in Iraq, noted Abizaid. And he questioned whether the US military was large enough overall to commit to a larger force in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0095773

"When you look at the overall American force pool that's available out there, the ability to sustain that commitment is simply not something that we have right now with the size of the Army and the Marine Corps," said Abizaid.

And in a remarkably sharp comment about the political atmosphere in Washington, the top US military commander in the Middle East commented that some aspects of the search for alternative strategies seemed to him unseemly.

When I come to Washington, I feel despair [here]," Abizaid told the Senate panel. "When I'm in Iraq with my commanders, when I talk to our soldiers, when I talk to the Iraqi leadership, they are not despairing," General Abizaid insisted.

That said, comments this week from other US officials suggests that the intelligence community, at least, takes a dark view of the current Iraqi situation.

Iraqi insurgent attacks against US and coalition forces have increased from about 70 per month in January to 180 in October, according to the director of the Defense Intelligence Agency, Lt. Gen. Michael Maples. The rate of attacks on Iraqi civilians has increased fourfold over that same period of time.

"The perception of unchecked violence is creating an atmosphere of fear and hardening sectarianism, which is empowering militias and vigilante groups and reducing confidence in government and security forces," General Maples told the Senate Armed Services Committee.

Gen. Michael Hayden, director of the Central Intelligence Agency, was no more sunny.

"We're now face to face with whole societies that are in profound, and, frankly, volatile transitions, and whose fate will directly affect ... the security of the United States," said General Hayden. Political consequences for Democrats

Given this situation, the newly empowered Democrats face a difficult political and substantive situation, says Loren Thompson, a defense expert and chief operating officer at the Lexington Institute think tank in Washington.

If they force a redeployment of US troops, they may get blamed for any resulting violence in Iraq. Yet if they don't force a redeployment of US troops, when 2008 rolls around they and their candidates will have partial ownership of whatever the US situation in Iraq is at that time.

Sen. Levin and his cohorts are right in at least pressing the US military leadership for some sort of figures in regard to how long continued training of Iraq forces might take.

Otherwise the training mission "becomes an open-ended justification for sticking around," says Thompson.

Debate Grows Over Beefing Up U.S. Force In Iraq (WP)

By Josh White

The Washington Post, November 17, 2006

The debate about how to proceed in Iraq, which in the past few months has focused on withdrawing U.S. troops, now includes serious discussion about adding more forces to the fight.

Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) repeatedly suggested this week that the United States needs thousands more troops in Iraq, and members of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group have discussed similar ideas as they prepare a much-anticipated policy recommendation. Members of Congress raised the concept on Wednesday in hearings with the region's top U.S. military commander.

In a speech last night to Republicans, McCain, who is considering a presidential bid in 2008, reiterated his desire for more troops to solve a "dire" situation.

"Without additional combat forces, we will not win this war," McCain said, describing inadequate U.S. troop numbers to clear insurgent strongholds, stem sectarian violence and train Iraqi security forces. "We need to do all these things if we are to succeed. And we will need more troops to do them."

Military officials and defense experts, however, said yesterday that significantly escalating the number of U.S. combat troops in Iraq is largely implausible because it would severely strain the military, would be unsustainable for more than a few months and would offer no discernable long-term benefit.

On Wednesday, Gen. John P. Abizaid, who leads the U.S. Central Command, testified on Capitol Hill that he believes sending in a large contingent of infantry troops would be a mistake, in part because it could dissuade Iraqi troops from taking the lead in security operations. Abizaid said he plans over coming months to introduce a more robust training effort -- involving additional U.S. trainers and advisers to help boost the numbers and capabilities of Iraqi forces -- so Iraq can defend its homeland and thus transition toward a U.S. exit.

"It's easy for the Iraqis to rely upon us to do this work," Abizaid said. "I believe that more American forces prevent the Iraqis from doing more, from taking more responsibility for their own future."

About 140,000 U.S. troops are in Iraq, many stationed in the areas around Baghdad where violence has been most severe. Military officials said yesterday that a boost of 20,000 infantry troops -- five or six brigades -- would do little to change the nature of the insurgency or the sectarian strife and that commanders are not considering such a move.

DOJ_NMG_0095774

"If you put 20,000 soldiers in Baghdad, they can provide a modicum of security where they have a physical presence," said a military officer familiar with discussions on the matter. "We could flex and bend, and we could do a spike. But we can't do a steady state with that many more troops. Additional troops could do a particular job for a finite period of time, but that doesn't solve the long-term problem of holding those areas."

Military officials and experts said yesterday that they think such a plan could work only temporarily because the Army and Marine Corps are stretched thin by ongoing conflicts. They said a large number of troops sent into Iraq would be hard to sustain over time without dipping significantly into the National Guard and reserves.

The argument for increasing troop numbers is that it might stop the cycle of violence and thus halt Iraq's drift toward civil war. The problem is that military analysts say there are not enough forces available to do that.

Under the troop-to-population ratios used in historical counterinsurgency campaigns, some of which had aspects of civil wars, the United States and its allies in Iraq would need at least 500,000 and perhaps more than 1 million troops, military experts say. No one thinks those numbers will be available anytime soon, even if the training of Iraqis is greatly expanded and accelerated.

Michael Vickers, director of strategic studies at the Center for Strategic and Budgetary Assessments, said a surge could have enormous costs down the road, when U.S. officials would need to rotate fresh troops into Iraq. He also doubts the value of having more troops even temporarily.

"In the past year, we've had between 125,000 and 140,000 troops there, and the daily attacks have almost tripled," Vickers said.

Americans have soured on the war in part because U.S. casualties have continued to mount, particularly in October and the first half of this month. Simply having more troops on the ground, or repositioning troops already in Iraq to the Baghdad area, has proven deadly.

"One of the ironies, of course, is that the more soldiers you have there, the more soldiers you have in harm's way," said Edwin Dorn, a professor at the University of Texas and a former undersecretary of defense for personnel and readiness. He said a major surge would require shipping to Iraq soldiers who just recently returned. "Sending people back into the fight who were just there would seriously harm morale."

Some experts said a short-term surge could create a window for Iraqi forces to develop and take over, but they said it would have to be temporary. Retired Lt. Col. Conrad Crane, the lead author of the Army's soon-to-be-finished counterinsurgency manual, said it is unlikely a short-term surge in combat forces would be decisive.

Instead, Crane supports Abizaid's idea of increasing training efforts.

"If his goal is to increase capacity and capabilities, that's the right way to go," Crane said. "The long-term solution is to get the host nation to be able to secure their own freedom and their own liberty and future."

Time To Fix What Four Years Of War Has Broken (MCT)

By Joseph L. Galloway

McClatchy Newspapers, November 17, 2006

Former secretary of state James Baker and his independent commission are searching for a new strategy for Iraq, and legislators of both parties will soon begin looking for a compromise answer to the same knotty problem. But it's past time to start repairing the damage the Bush administration's way of war has done to our Army and our Marine Corps.

Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld hasn't cleaned out his desk yet, and the colonels and generals are still mentally dancing in a joyous conga line through the corridors of the Pentagon's E-Ring, but there's work to be done, and none of it is more important than fixing what four years of war in Iraq and Afghanistan has broken.

The Senate has yet to confirm Robert Gates to replace Rumsfeld, but whatever his faults - and there are more than a few - he's likely to earn swift bipartisan approval, if only because Rumsfeld won't leave until he's on deck.

The fate and the future of the U.S. Army and Marine Corps desperately need to be addressed. Doing so will take many years and many billions of dollars.

Our nation, which is defended by about seven-tenths of 1 percent of its 300 million people, today devotes just about 5 percent of its gross domestic product to defense spending. When Jack Kennedy was president, military spending totaled almost 10 percent of GDP.

The Army, and its National Guard and Reserve, have been worn down - some would say worn out - by the endless deployments of troops on one-year combat tours to Iraq and Afghanistan. Many professional soldiers and their families are now enduring their second or third trips to Iraq, certain that a fourth or fifth awaits them if they continue to serve.

Their equipment, from Abrams tanks to Bradley fighting vehicles to Stryker armored cars to Humvees and helicopters, is wearing out even faster than the soldiers are. The money to repair and rebuild those vehicles - Army Chief Gen. Peter J.

Schoomaker says he needs $17 billion for that right now - hasn't been forthcoming from this administration and the outgoing Congress.

Army officials say they're a total of some $25 billion short of what they need to sustain the current levels of operations. Because that's not available, they've been robbing Peter to pay Paul, then robbing Paul to pay Patrick. Money budgeted to repair family housing and mow the grass and open the recreation centers on our Army bases is going, instead, to pay for the wars.

It's also getting harder to fill the ranks of an Army that's dropped in total manpower from 1.2 million a decade or so ago to just 497,000 at present, even as the demands for its services have grown exponentially.

In a week when the San Francisco school board voted to bar junior reserve officer training from the high schools and to ban military recruiters from their campuses, the Army is scraping the bottom of the barrel trying find enough recruits to keep the all-volunteer Army afloat.

Only by lowering standards of mental acuity and ability, accepting recruits up to age 45, paying large cash bonuses to anyone who signs on the dotted line, taking in more high school dropouts and granting waivers to recruits with criminal records, bodies covered in tattoos or both can the Army fill the holes left by those who leave every year.

In this dangerous world, Americans must be willing to pay for an Army, and they must be willing to send their sons and daughters to serve in that Army. Nations that are unwilling to defend themselves and are governed by an elite that's unwilling to send its own children to be part of that defense, are doomed.

The Bush administration says we're embarked on what it defines as a long war - 40 or 50 or 60 years of struggle with the forces of Islamic fundamentalism - and if that's true, then it's long past time to begin making some sacrifices at home to prepare to fight and win that war.

Mr. Gates can begin his brief tour as secretary of defense by jacking up the most recent Quadrennial Defense Review, the Pentagon's 20-year look at the future and what will be funded in our defense budgets, and re-ordering its priorities. He must make the hard decisions that Mr. Rumsfeld promised to make but never did.

We cannot have business as usual in the Pentagon. We cannot continue to fund huge aircraft and ship purchases for the Air Force and Navy while starving the Army and Marines who are bearing the brunt of the fighting and dying in this brave new world of ours. Boots on the ground are not as glamorous - or as lucrative to defense contractors - as the high technology so beloved by Mr. Rumsfeld. But in places such as Iraq and Afghanistan, there is still no substitute for them.

My old friend Col. (ret.) T. R. Fehrenbach wrote in his landmark history of the Korean War that a nation that wants to hold the barbarians at bay must be willing to put its sons on the ground, in the mud and the blood. It also must be willing to pay the price for an Army and a Marine Corps that's fully manned, well trained, and equipped and supported with everything it needs.

Without that, this brave new century and millennium that were celebrated as America's will swiftly become someone's else's, and we will become no more than a footnote in history - a nation whose days of glory and power numbered only half a century or so.

Coalition Forces Are Dwindling As U.S. Mulls Next Move In Iraq (WT)

By David R. Sands

The Washington Times, November 17, 2006

Iraq's coalition of the willing is becoming an increasingly exclusive club.

As U.S. generals and lawmakers debated this week whether to cut, raise or hold steady the 141,000-strong U.S. troop contingent in Iraq, the coalition of foreign countries willing to deploy their forces in Iraq has shrunk steadily -- and soon could shrink even more.

Twenty-three countries remain in the U.S.-led coalition and the United Nations' mission serving in and around Iraq, down from a high of 42 that joined the United States in the invasion or the postwar occupation of Iraq. More than half of those contributors have fewer than 150 troops, engineers or military trainers in the Iraq theater.

Like President Bush, many leaders of the contributing countries are resisting intense domestic political pressures to bring the troops home, especially as the casualty levels rise and the problems of the embattled Iraqi government mount.

"We need to remember what is at stake here, not only for Iraq and the Middle East, but also for American power and prestige around the world," Australian Prime Minister John Howard said this week. Mr. Howard, a staunch U.S. ally, is scheduled to meet with Mr. Bush on the sidelines of an Asia-Pacific summit today in Vietnam.

Opposition leader Kim Beazley, citing opinion polls showing 60 percent disapproval of Australia's Iraq deployment, urged Mr. Howard to tell Mr. Bush that Australia's approximately 1,400 troops in Iraq would be leaving and that the United States should withdraw as well.

"When John Howard meets George Bush, he needs to be a statesman, not a sidekick," Mr. Beazley told reporters in Canberra.

Mr. Howard rejected that idea, but acknowledged in a speech this week that the Iraq mission was "the most poll-defiant thing I have done in the whole of my prime ministership."

Portugal, Hungary, the Netherlands and Ukraine were among the countries that pulled out of Iraq in 2005. This year, Japan announced it was withdrawing its noncombat troops from Iraq. Italy, one of the largest contributors to the multinational force, plans to have all its 1,785 soldiers home by the end of the year.

Poland, which was given overall command of Iraq's south-central region, has cut its forces from 2,400 to about 900.

Smaller parties in Poland's governing coalition are pressing for a quick withdrawal of the remaining troops. The government of President Lech Kaczynski has sent conflicting signals on how long the deployment will last.

Mr. Kaczynski and senior Polish generals have been quoted as saying that the country will remain in Iraq at least through mid-2007, but a government spokesman said this week that an earlier withdrawal -- perhaps by the end of this year -- hadn't been ruled out.

Like Mr. Howard and British Prime Minister Tony Blair, Mr. Kaczynski is confronting popular opinion polls that show more than three-fifths of his constituents support an immediate withdrawal.
